THE PREFACE.

HOW unfit and how unworthy a choice I have made of my self, to underiake a work of this mixture ; mine own reason, though exceeding weak, hath sufficiently resolv'd me. For had it been gotten then with my first dawn of day, when the light of common knowledge began to open it self to my younger yeers, and before any wound received, either from Fortune or Time : I might yet well have doubted that the darknesse of Age and Death would have covered over both It and Mee, long before the performance. For, beginning with the Creation, I have proceeded with the History of the World ; and lastly purposed (some few sallies excepted) to confine my Discourse, with this our renowned Island of Great Britain. I confesse that it had better sort'd with my disability, the better part of whose times are run out in other travells, to have set together (as I could) the unjoynted and scattered frame of our English affaires, than of the universall : in whom, had there been no other defect (who am all defect) than the time of the day, it were enough ; the day of a tempestuous life, drawn on to the very evening ere I began. But those inmost and soule-piercing wounds, which are ever aking while uncured : with the desire to satisfie those few friends, which I have tried by the fire of Adversity, the former enforcing, the later perswading ; have caused me to make my thoughts legible, and my self the subject of every opinion ; wise or weak.

To the World I present them, to which I am nothing indebted : neither have others that were, (Fortune changing) sped much better in any age. For Prosperity and Adversity have evermore tyed and untied vulgar affections. And as we see it in experience, That dogs do alwayes bark at those they know not, and that it is their nature to accompany one another in those clamours : so it is with the inconsiderate multitude ; who wanting that vertue which we call Honesty in all men, and that especiall gift of G O D, which we call Charity in Christian men ; condemn without hearing, and wound without offence given : led thereunto by uncertain report onely ; which His Majesty truly acknowledgeth for the Author of all lies. Blame no man (saith Siracides) before thou have enquired the matter : understand first, and then reforme righteously. Rumor, res sine teste, sine iudice, maligna, fallax ; Rumour is without witnesse, without judge, malicious and deceivable. This vanity of vulgar opinion it was, that gave Saint Augustine Argument to affirm, That he feared the praise of good men, and detested that of the evill. And herein no man hath given a better rule, than this of Seneca ; Conscientiæ satisfaciamus : nihil in famam laboremus, sequatur vel mala, dum bene merearis ; Let us satisfie our own consciences, and not trouble our selves with fame : be it never so ill, it is to be despised, so we deserve well.

For my self, if I have in any thing served my Country, and prized it before my private : the generall acceptance can yeeld me no other profit at this time, than doth a fair sun-shine day to a Sea-man after shipwreck; and the contrary no other harm, than an outrageous tempest after the Port attained. I know that I lost the love of many, for my fidelity towards Her, whom I must still honour in the dust; though further than the defence of her excellent person, I never persecuted any man. Of those that did it, and by what device they did it, He that is the Supreme Judge of all the world, hath taken the accompt : so as for this kinde of suffering, I must say with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parata, delectat.

As for other men; if there be any that have made themselves Fathers of that fame, which hath been begotten for them: I can neither envie at such their purchased glory, nor much lament mine own mishap in that kinde; but content my self to say with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars. To labour other satisfaction, were an effect of phrenzie, not of hope, seeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can travell the World without a pass-port. For were it otherwise; and were there not as many internall forms of the minde, as there are externall figures of men; there were then some possibility to persuade by the mouth of one Advocate, even Equity alone.

But such is the multiplying and extensive vertue of dead Earth, and of that breath-giving life which God hath cast upon slime and dust, as that among those that were, of whom we reade and hear; and among those that are, whom we see and converse with; every one hath received a severall picture of face, and every one a divers picture of minde; every one a form apart, every one a fancy and cogitation differing: there being nothing wherein Nature so much triumpheth as in dissimilitude. From whence it cometh that there is found so great diversity of opinions; so strong a contrariety of inclinations; so many naturall and unnaturall; wise, foolish, manly, and childish affections and passions in mortall men. For it is not the visible fashion and shape of plants, and of reasonable Creatures, that makes the difference of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the form internall.

And though it hath pleased God to reserve the Art of reading mens thoughts to himself; yet, as the fruit tells the name of the Tree; so do the outward works of men (so far as their cogitations are acted) give us whereof to ghesse at the rest. Nay, it were not hard to expresse the one by the other, very neer the life, did not craft in many, fear in the most, and the Worlds love in all, teach every capacity, according to the compassse it hath, to qualifie and maske over their inward deformities for a time. Though it be also true, Nemo potest diu personam ferre fictam; cito in naturam suam residunt, quibus veritas non subest: No man can long continue masked in a counterfeited behaviour: the things that are forced for pretences, having no ground of truth, cannot long dissemble their own natures. Neither can any man (saith Plutarch) so change himself, but that his heart may be sometimes seen at his tongues end.

In this great discord and dissimilitude of reasonable Creatures; if we direct our selves to the Multitude; Omnis honeste rei malus iudex est vulgus: The common people are evill Judges of honest things, and whose Wisdome (saith Ecclesiastes) is to be despised: if to the better sort; every understanding bath

bath a peculiar judgement, by which it both censureth other men, and valueth it self. And therefore unto me it will not seem strange, though I finde these my worthlesse papers torn with Rats: seeing the stobfull Censurers of all ages have not spared to taxe the Reverend Fathers of the Church, with Ambition, the severest men to themselves, with Hypocrisie; the greatest lovers of Justice, with Popularity; and those of the truest Valour and Fortitude, with Vain-glory. But of these natures which lie in wait to finde fault, and to turn good into evill, seeing Solomon complained long since: and that the very age of the world renders it every day after other more malicious; I must leave the professors to their easie wayes of reprehension, than which there is nothing of more facility.

To me it belongs in the first part of this Preface, following the common and approved custome of those, who have left the memories of time past to after-ages; to give, as neer as I can, the same right to History which they have done. Yet seeing therein I should but borrow other mens words; I will not trouble the Reader with the repetition. True it is that among many other benefits, for which it hath been honoured; in this one it triumpheth over all humane knowledge, That it hath given us life in our understanding, since the world it self had life and beginning, even to this day: yea; it hath triumphed over time, which besides it nothing but eternitie hath triumphed over: for it hath carried our knowledge over the vast and devouring space of many thousands of yeers, and given so fair and piercing eyes to our mind; that we plainly behold living now (as if we had lived then) that great world, Magni Dei lapsiens opus, The wise work (saith Hermes) of a great God, as it was then, when but new to it self. By it (I say) it is, that we live in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was governed: how it was covered with waters, and again re-peopled: How Kings and Kingdoms have flourished and fallen, and for what vertue and piety God made prosperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wretched, both the one and the other. And it is not the least debt which we owe unto History, that it hath made us acquainted with our dead Ancestors; and, out of the depth and darknesse of the earth, delivered us their memory and fame. In a word, we may gather out of History a policy no lesse wise than eternall; by the comparison and application of other mens fore-passed miseries with our own like errors and ill deservings. But it is neither of Examples the most lively instruction, nor the words of the wisest men, nor the terrour of future torments, that hath yet so wrought in our blinde and stupified mindes, as to make us remember, That the infinite eye and wisdom of God doth pierce thorow all our pretences, as to make us remember, That the justice of God doth require none other accuser, than our own consciences: which neither the false beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formality, which (to pacifie the opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the least kinde, cover from his knowledge. And so much did that beathen wisdome confesse, no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true God. If any (saith Euripides) having in his life committed wickednesse, think he can hide it from the everlasting gods, he thinks not well.

To repeat GODS judgements in particular, upon those of all degrees, which have played with his mercies; would require a volume apart: for the Sea of examples hath no bottom. The marks, set on private men, are with their bodies cast into the earth; and their fortunes, written onely in the memories of those that lived with them: so as they who succed, and have not seen the fall of others, doe not fear their own faults. GODS judgements upon the greater and greatest have been left to posterity; first, by those happy bands which the holy Ghost hath guided; and secondly, by their vertue, who have gathered the acts and ends of men mighty and remarkable in the world. Now to point far off, and to speak of the conversion of Angels into Devils, for Ambition: Or of the greatest and most glorious Kings, who have gnawed the grasse of the earth with beasts for pride and ingratitude towards GOD: Or of that wise working of Pharaoh, when he slew the Infants of Israel, ere they had recovered their Cradles: Or of the policy of Jezabel, in covering the murder of Naboth by a triall of the Elders, according to the law, with many thousands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopelesse prooffe, that far-off examples would not be left to the same far-off respects, as heretofore? For who hath not observed, what labour, practice, perill, bloodshed, and cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the world have undergone, exercised, taken on them, and committed; to make themselves and their issues masters of the world? And yet hath Babylon, Persia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, and the rest, no fruit, no flower, grasse, nor leaf, springing upon the face of the earth, of those seeds: No, their very roots and ruines doe hardly remain. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta sunt, vel manu hominum evertuntur, vel stando & durando deficiunt: All that the hand of man can make, is either overturned by the hand of man, or at length by standing and continuing consumed. The reasons of whose ruines, are diversly given by those that ground their opinions on second causes. All Kingdomes and States have fallen (say the Politicians) by outward and forraign force, or by inward negligence and dissention, or by a third cause arising from both. Others observe, That the greatest have sunk down under their own weight: of which Livie both a touch: eo crevit, ut magnitudine laboret sua: Others, That the divine Providence (which Cratippus objected to Pompey) hath set down the date and period of every Estate, before their first foundation and erection. But hercof I will give my self a day over to resolve.

For seeing the first books of the following story, have undertaken the discourse of the first Kings and Kingdomes: and that it is impossible for the short life of a Preface to trawell after, and over-take far-off Antiquity, and to judge of it; I will, for the present, examine what profit hath been gathered by our own Kings, and their Neighbour Princes: who having beheld, both in divine and humane letters, the successe of infidelity, injustice, and cruelty; have (notwithstanding) planted after the same pattern.

True it is, that the judgements of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more strange) the affection of any one man stirred up alike with examples of like nature: But every one is touched most with that which most nearly seemeth to touch his own private; Or otherwise best suited with his apprehension. But the judgements of GOD are for ever unchangeable; neither is he wearied by the long processe of time, and now to give his blessing in one age, to that which he hath cursed in another. Wherefore those that are wise, or whose wisdom of it be not great, yet is true and well grounded; will be able to discern the bitter fruits of irreligious policy, as well among those examples that are found in ages removed far from the present, as in those of later times. And that it may no lesse appear appear by evident prooffe, than by asseveration, That ill doing hath alwayes been attended with ill successe; I will here, by way of Preface, run over some examples, which the work ensuing hath not reached.

Among our Kings of the Norman race, we have no sooner passed over the violence of the Norman Conquest, than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of Gods Justice, upon the children of Henry the first. For that King, when both by force, craft and cruelty, he had dispossessed, over-reacht, and lastly made blinde and destroyed his elder brother Robert Duke of Normandy, to make his own sons Lords of this Land: GOD cast them all, Male and Female, Nephews and Nieces (Maud excepted) into the bottome of the Sea, with above a hundred and fifty others that attended them; whereof a great many were Noble, and of the King dearly beloved.

To passe over the rest, till we come to Edward the second; it is certain, that after the murder of that King, the issue of blood then made, though it had some times of stay and stopping, did again break out, and that so often and in such abundance, as all our Princes of the Masculine race (very few excepted) died of the same disease. And although the young years of Edward the third, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more than suspicious: yet in that he afterwards caused his own Uncle the Earle of Kent to die, for no other offence than the desire of his brothers redemption, whom the Earle as then supposed to be living; the King making that to be treason in his Uncle, which was indeed treason in himself, (had his Uncles intelligence been true) this I say made it manifest, that he was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to have had it otherwise; though he caused Mortimer to die for the same.

This cruelty the secret and unsearchable judgement of GOD revenged on the Grand-child of Edward the third: and so it fell out, even to the last of that line, that in the second or third descent they were all buried under the ruines of those buildings, of which the Mortar had been tempered with innocent blood. For Richard the second, who saw both his Treasurers, his Chancellour, and his Steward, with divers others of his Counsellors, some of them slaughtered by the people, others in his absence executed by his enemies; yet he alwayes took himself for over-wise, to be taught by examples. The Earles of Huntingdon and Kent, Montagu and Spencer, who thought themselves as great Politicians in those dayes, as others have done in these: hoping to please the King, and to secure themselves by the murder of Gloucester; died soon after, with many other: their adherents, by the like violent hands; and far more shamefully than did than Duke. And as for the King himself (who in regard of many deeds, unworthy of his Greatnesse, cannot be excused, as the disavowing himself by breach of Faith, Characters, Pardons and Patents:) He was in the prime of his youth deposed, and murdered by his Cousin-Germane and Vassall, Henry of Lancaster, afterwards Henry the fourth.

This King, whose Title was weak, and his obtaining the Crown traiterous: who brake faith with the Lords at his Landing, protesting to intend onely the recovery of his proper inheritance, brake faith with Richard himself; and brake faith with all the Kingdome in Parliament, to whom he swore that the deposed King should live. After that he had enjoyed this Realme some few years, and in that time had been set upon on all sides by his Subjects, and never free from conspiracies and rebellions : he saw (if souls immortall see and discern any things after the bodies death) his Grand-child Henry the sixth, and his son the Prince, suddenly and without mercy, murdered; the possession of the Crown (for which he had caused so much blood to be poured out) transferred from his race, and by the Issues of his enemies worn and enjoy'd: enemies, whom by his own practice he supposed that he had left no lesse powerlesse, than the succession of the Kingdome questionlesse, by entailing the same upon his own Issues by Parliament. And out of doubt, humane reason could have judg'd no otherwise, but that these cautious provisions of the father, seconded by the valour and signall victories of his son Henry the sixth, had buried the hopes of every Competitor, under the despaire of all reconquest and recovery. I say, that humane reason might so have judg'd, were not this passage of Causabon also true; quæ Adamantinis credebantur radicibus esse fundatæ; A day, an hour, a moment is enough to overturn the things that seemed to have been founded and rooted in Adamant.

Now for Henry the sixth, upon whom the great storm of his Grand-fathers grievous faults fell, as it formerly had done upon Richard the Grand-child of Edward: although he was generally esteemed for a gentle and innocent Prince, yet as he refused the daughter of Armagnac, of the House of Navarre, the greatest of the Princes of France, to whom he was affianced (by which match he might have defended his inheritance in France) and married the daughter of Anjou, (by which he lost all that he had in France) so in condescending to the unworthy death of his Uncle of Gloucester, the main and strong Pillar of the House of Lancaster; He drew on himself and his Kingdome the greatest joynt-losse and dishonour, that ever it sustained since the Norman Conquest. Of whom it may truly be said which a Counsellor of his own spake of Henry the third of France, Qu'il estoit une fort gentile Prince; mais son regne est advenu en une fort mauvais temps: That he was a very gentle Prince; but his reign happened in a very unfortunate season.

It is true that Buckingham and Suffolk were the practisers and contrivers of the Dukes death: Buckingham and Suffolk, because the Duke gave instructions to their authority, which otherwise under the Queen had been absolute; the Queen in respect of her personall wound, sprætæque injuria formæ, because Gloucester dissuaded her marriage. But the fruit was answerable to the seed; the successe to the counsell. For after the cutting down of Gloucester, York grew up so fast, as he dared to dispute his right both by arguments and arms; in which quarrell, Suffolk and Buckingham, with the greatest number of their adherents, were dissolved. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleased God to strike down York: yet his son the Earle of March, following the plain path which his father had troden out, despoiled Henry the father, and Edward the son, both of their lives and Kingdome. And what was the end now of that politick Lady the Queen, other than this, That she lived to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers: that she lived to look on, while her husband the King, and her only son the Prince, were hewn in sunder; while the Crown was set on his head that did it? She lived to see her self despoiled of her estate, and of her moveables: and lastly, her father, by rendring up to the Crown of France, the Earldome of Provence, and other places, for the payment of 50000. crowns for her Ransome, to become a stark Beggar.

The Preface.

Beggar. And this was the end of that subtilty, which Siracides calleth fine; but unrighteous: for other fruit hath it never yeelded since the world was. Sirach. 19.

And now it came to Edward the fourths turn (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the plants of Lancaster were rooted up, one onely Earl of Richmond excepted: whom also he had once bought of the Duke of Britain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward such a Plantation, as could any way promise it self stability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the slaughter which Gloucester, Dorset, Hastings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his own presence: of which tragicall Actiōs, there was not one that escaped the judgement of GOD in the same kinde. And he, which (besides the execution of his brother Clarence, for none other offence than he himself had formed in his own imagination) instructed Gloucester to kill Henry the sixth, his Predecessor; taught him also by the same art to kill his own sons and successors, Edward and Richard. For those Kings which have sold the blood of others at a low rate; have but made the market for their own enemies, to buy of theirs at the same price.

To Edward the fourth succeeded Richard the third, the greatest Master in mischief of all that fore-went him: who although, for the necessity of his Tragedy, he had more parts to play, and more to perform in his own person, than all the rest; yet he so well fitted every affection that plaid with him, as if each of them had but acted his own interest. For he wrought so cunningly upon the affections of Hastings and Buckingham, enemies to the Queen, and to all her kinned, as he easily allured them to condescend, that Rivers and Grey, the Kings Maternall Uncle and halfe brother, should (for the first) be severed from him: secondly, he wrought their consent to have them imprisoned: and lastly (for the avoiding of future inconvenience) to have their heads severed from their bodies. And having now brought those his chief instruments to exercise that common precept which the Devill hath written upon every post, namely, To depresse those whom they had grieved, and to destroy those whom they had deprest; He urged that argument so far and so forcibly; as nothing but the death of the young King himself, and of his brother, could fashion the conclusion. For he caused it to be hammered into Buckinghams head, That, whensoever the King or his Brother, should have able yeers to exercise their power, they would take a most severe revenge of that curelesse wrong offered to their Uncle and Brother; Rivers and Grey. Sceleris sce-ribus tuenda.
Sen. de clem.

But this was not his manner of reasoning with Hastings, whose fidelity to his Masters Sons was without suspect: and yet the Devill, who never dissuades by impossibility, taught him to try him. And so he did. But when he found by Catesby, who founded him, that he was not fordable, he first resolved to kill him sitting in councell: wherein having failed with his sword, he set the Hangman upon him, with a weapon of more weight. And because nothing else could move his appetite, he caused his head to be stricken off, before he eat his dinner. A greater judgement of God, than this upon Hastings, I have never observed in any story. For the self same day that the Earle Rivers, Grey, and others, were (without triall of law, or offence given) by Hastings advice executed at Pomfret: I say Hastings himself in the same day, and (as I take it) in the same houre, in the same lawlesse manner had his head stricken off in the Tower of London. But Buckingham lived a while longer; and with an eloquent oration perswaded

the Londoners to elect Richard for their King. And having received the Earldome of Hereford for reward, besides the high hope of marrying his daughter to the Kings only son; after many grievous vexations of minde, and unfortunate attempts; being in the end betrayed and delivered up by his trustiest servant; he had his head severed from his body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peers. And what successe had Richard himself after all these mischieves and murders, policies, and counter-policies to Christian Religion: and after such time as with a most mercilesse hand he had pressed out the breath of his Nephews and Naturall Lords, other than the prosperity of so short a life, as it took end, ere himself could well look over and discern it? the great out-cry of innocent blood, obtained at GODS hands the effusion of his; who became a spectacle of shame and dishonour, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruell King, Henry the seventh cut off; and was therein (no doubt) the immediate instrument of Gods Justice. A polick Prince he was, if ever there were any, who by the engine of his wisdom, beat down and overturned as many strong oppositions both before and after he wore the Crown, as ever King of England did: I say by his wisdom, because as he ever left the reins of his affections in the hands of his profit, so he alwayes weighed his undertakings by his abilities, leaving nothing more to hazard than so much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. He had well observed the proceedings of Loys the eleventh, whom he followed in all that was royall or royall-like; but he was far more just; and begun not their processes whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

He could never endure any mediation in rewarding his servants, and therein exceeding wise; for whatsoever himself gave, he himself received back the thanks, and the love, knowing it well that the affections of men (purchased by nothing so readily as by benefits) were trains that better became great Kings, than great subjects. On the contrary, in whatsoever he grieved his subjects, he wisely put it off on those, that he found fit ministers for such actions. Howsoever the taking off of Stanleys head, who set the Crown on his, and the death of the young Earl of Warwick, son to George Duke of Clarence, shewes, as the successe also did, that he held somewhat of the errors of his Ancestors; for his possession in the first line ended in his grand-children, as that of Edward the third, and Henry the fourth had done.

Now for King Henry the eighth, if all the pictures & patterns of a mercilesse Prince were lost in the World, they might all again be painted to the life, out of the story of this King. For how many servants did he advance in haste (but for what vertue no man could suspect) and with the change of his fancy ruined again; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others of more desert gave he abundant flowers from whence to gather hony, and in the end of harvest burnt them in the Hives? How many wives did he cut off, and cast off, as his fancy and affection changed? How many Princes of the blood (whereof some of them for age could hardly crawle towards the block) with a world of others of all degrees (of whom our common Chronicles have kept the account) did he execute? yea, in his very death-bed, and when he was at the point to have given his account to GOD for the abundance of blood already spilt: He imprisoned the Duke of Norfolk the father; and executed the Earle of Surrey the son; the one, whose deservings he knew not how to value, having never omitted any thing that concerned his own honour, now, and the Kings service; the other never having committed any thing worthy of his least displeasure: the one exceeding valiant and advised; the other no lesse valiant than learned, & of excellent hope. But besides the sorrows which he heaped upon the Fatherlesse and Widows at home: and besides the vain enterprises abroad, wherein it is thought that he consumed more treasure, than all our victorious Kings did in their severall Conquests: what causelesse and cruell wars did he make upon his own Nephew King James the fifth? What Laws and Wills did he devise to establish this Kingdom in his own Issues? using his sharpest weapons to cut off, and cut down those branches, which sprang from the same root that himself did. And in the end (notwithstanding these his so many irreligious provisions) it pleased God to take away all his own, without increase; though, for themselves in their severall kindes, all Princes of eminent vertue. For these words of Samuel to Agag King of the Amalekites, have been verified upon many others: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women. And that blood which the same King Henry affirmed, that the cold aire of Scotland had frozen up in the North, God hath diffused by the sun-beam of his grace: from whence His Majesty now living, and long to live, is descended. Of whom I may say it truly; That if all the malice of the world were infused into one eye: yet could it not discern in his life, even to this day, any one of those foul spots, by which the consciences of all the fore-named Princes (in effect) have been defiled; nor any drop of that innocent blood on the sword of his justice, with which the most that fore-went him have stained both their hands and fame. And for this Crown of England, it may truly be avowed: That he hath received it even from the hand of God, & hath staid the time of putting it on, howsoever he were provoked to hasten it: That he never took revenge of any man, that sought to put him beside it: That he refused the assistance of Her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as ever Prince did: That His Majesty entered not by a breach, nor by blood; but by the Ordinary gate, which his own right set open; and into which, by a generall love and obedience, He was received. And howsoever His Majesties preceding title to this Kingdom, was preferred by many Princes (witness the Treaty at Cambray in the year 1559.) yet he never pleased to dispute it, during the life of that renowned Lady his Predecessor; no, notwithstanding the injury of not being declared Heir, in all the time of Her long reign.

Neither ought we to forget, or neglect our thankfulness to GOD for the uniting of the Northern parts of Britany to the South, to wit, of Scotland to England, which though they were severed but by small brooks and banks, yet by reason of the long continued war, and the cruelties exercised upon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitely severed. This, I say, is not the least of Gods blessings which His Majesty hath brought with him unto this Land: No, put all our petty grievances together, and heap them up to their height, they will appear but as a Mole-hill, compared with the Mountain of this concord. And if all the Historians since then have acknowledged the uniting of the Red-Rose and the White, for the greatest happinesse (Christian Religion excepted) that ever this Kingdom received from GOD, certainly the peace between the two Lions of gold and gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former; for by it, besides the sparing of our Britisb blood, heretofore & during the difference, so often and abundantly shed, the state of England is more assured, the Kingdom more enabled enabled to recover her ancient honour and rights, and by it made more invincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies, and conquests. It is true, that hereof we do not yet find the effect. But had the Duke of Parma in the year 1588. joyned the Army which he commanded, with that of Spain, and landed it on the South coast; and had His Majesty at the same time declared himself against us in the North, it is easie to divine what had become of the liberty of England: certainly, we would then without murmure have brought this union a far greater praise than it hath since cost us. It is true, that there was never any Common-weal or Kingdome in the world, wherein no man had cause to lament. Kings live in the world, and not above it. They are not infinite to examine every mans cause, or to relieve every mans wants. And yet in the later, (though to his own prejudice) His Majesty hath had more compassion of other mens necessities, than of his own Coffers. Of whom it may be said, as of Solomon, Dedit Deus Solomoni latitudinem cordis: Which if other men do not understand with Pineda, to be meant by Liberality, but by Latitude of knowledge; yet may it be better spoken of His Majesty, than of any King that ever England had; who as well in divine, as humane understanding hath exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

I could say much more of the Kings Majesty, without flattery: did I not fear the imputation of presumption, and withall suspect, that it might befall these papers of mine, (though the losse were little) as it did the Pictures of Queen Elizabeth, made by unskilfull and common Painters, which by her own commandment were knockt in pieces, and cast into the fire. For ill Artists, in setting out the beauty of the externall; and weak writers, in describing the vertues of the internall; do often leave to posterity, of well formed faces a deformed memory; and of the most Perfect and Princely mindes, a most defective representation. It may suffice, and there needs no other discourse; if the honest Reader but compare the cruell and turbulent passages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbour-Princes (of whom for that purpose I have inserted this brief discourse) with His Majesties temperate, revengelesse, and liberall disposition: I say, that if the honest Reader weigh them justly, and with an even band: and withall but bestow every deformed childe on his true Parent; He shall finde, that there is no man that hath so just cause to complain, as the King himself hath. Now as we have told the successe of the trumperies and cruelties of our own Kings, and other great Personages: so we find, that GOD is every-where the same God. And as it pleased him to punish the usurpation and unnaturall cruelty of Henry the first, and of our third Edward, in their Children for many generations; so dealt he with the sons of Loys Debonaire, the son of Charles the Great, or Charlemaine. For after such time as Debonaire of France, had torn out the eyes of Bernard his Nephew, the son of Pepin the eldest son of Charlemaine, and Heire of the Empire, and then caused him to die in prison, as did our Henry to Robert his eldest brother: there followed nothing but murders upon murders, poisoning, imprisonments, and civill war; till the whole race of that famous Emperour was extinguished. And though Debonaire, after he had rid himself of his Nephew by a violent death; and of his bastard brothers by a civill death (having inclosed them with sure guard all the dayes of their lives, within a Monastery) held himself secure from all opposition: Yet God raised up against him (which he suspected not) his own sons, to vex him, to invade him, to take him prisoner, and to depose him; his own sons, with whom (to satisfy their ambition) he had shared his estate, and given them Crowns to wear, and Kingdoms to govern, during his own life. Yea, his eldest son Lothaire (for he had four, three by his first wife, and one by his second; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles) made it the cause of his deposition, That he had used violence towards his brothers and kinsmen; and that he had suffered his Nephew (whom he might have delivered) to be slain. Eo quod, saith the Text, fratribus, & propinquis violentiam intulerit, & nepotem suum, quem ipse liberare poterat, interfici permiserit; Because he used violence to his brothers and kinsmen, and suffered his nephew to be slain, whom he might have delivered.

Yet did he that which few Kings doe; namely, repent him of his cruelty. For, among many other things which he performed in the Generall Assembly of the States, it follows: Post hæc autem palam se errasse confessus, & imitatus Imperatoris Theodosii exemplum, pœnitentiam spontaneam suscepit, tam de his, quam quæ in Bernardum proprium nepotem gesserat: After this he did openly confess himself to have erred, and following the example of the Emperour Theodosius, he underwent voluntary penance, as well for his other offences, as for that which he had done against Bernard his own Nephew.

This he did, and it was praise-worthy. But the blood that is unjustly spilt, is not again gathered up from the ground by repentance. These Medicines, ministred to the dead, have but dead rewards.

This King, as I have said, had four sons. To Lothaire his eldest he gave the Kingdom of Italy, as Charlemaine his father had done to Pepin the father of Bernard, who was to succeed him in the Empire. To Pepin the second son he gave the Kingdome of Aquitaine: to Loys, the Kingdome of Bavier: and to Charles, whom he had by a second wife, called Judith, the remainder of the Kingdome of France. But this second wife, being a mother-in-law to the rest, perswaded Debonaire to cast his son Pepin out of Aquitaine; thereby to greater Charles, which, after the death of his son Pepin, he prosecuted to effect against his Grand-child bearing the same name. In the mean while, being invaded by his son Loys of Bavier, he dies for grief.

Debonaire dead, Loys of Bavier, and Charles afterwards called the bald, and their Nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, joyned in league against the Emperour Lothaire their eldest brother. They fight neer to Auxerre the most bloody battell that ever was stricken in France: in which, the marvellous losse of Nobility, and men of war, gave courage to the Saracens to invade Italy; to the Hunnes to fall upon Almaine; and the Danes to enter upon Normandy. Charles the bald by treason seizeth upon his Nephew Pepin, kills him in a Cloyster: Carloman rebels against his father Charles the bald, the father burns out the eyes of his son Carloman; Bavier invades the Emperour Lothaire his brother, Lothaire quits the Empire. He is assailed and wounded to the heart by his own conscience, for his Rebellion against his father, and for his other cruelties, and dies in a Monastery. Charles the bald the Uncle oppresseth his Nephews the Sons of Lothaire, he usurpeth the Empire to the prejudice of Loys of Bavier his elder brother; Baviers Armies and his son Carloman are beaten, he dies of grief, and the Usurper Charles is poisoned by Zedechias a Jew, his Physician, his son Loys le Beque dies of the same drink. Beque had Charles the simple, and and two Bastards, Loys and Carloman; they rebell against their Brother, but the eldest breaks his neck, the younger is slain by a wilde Bore; the son of Bavier had the same ill destiny, and brake his neck by a fall out of a window in sporting with his companions. Charles the grosse becomes Lord of all that the sons of Debonaire held in Germany; wherewith not contented, he invades Charles the simple: but being forsaken of his Nobility, of his wife, and of his understanding; he dies a distracted Beggar. Charles the simple is held in Wardship by Eudes Maior of the Pallace, then by Robert the brother of Eudes: and lastly, being taken by the Earle of Vermandois, he is forced to dye in the prison of Peron. Loys the son of Charles the simple breaks his neck in chasing a Wolfe, and of the two sons of this Loys, the one dies of poyson; the other dies in the prison of Orleans; after whom Hugh Capet, of another race, and a stranger to the French, makes himself King.

These miserable ends had the issues of Debonaire; who after he had once apparelled in justice with authority, his sons and successors took up the fashion, and wore that Garment so long without other provision, as when the same was torn from their shoulders, every man despised them as miserable and naked Beggars. The wretched successe they had, (saith a learned French-man) sewes, que en cest mort il y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la justice: That in the death of that Prince; to wit, of Bernard the son of Pepin, the true heir of Charlemaine, men had more meddling than either God, or Justice had.

But to come neerer home; it is certain that Francis the first, one of the worthiest Kings (except for that fact) that ever the French-men had, did never enjoy himself, after he had commended the destruction of the Protestants of Mirandol and Cabrières, to the Parliament of Provence, which poor people were thereupon burnt and murdered; men, women, and children. It is true that the said King Francis repented himself of the fact, and gave charge to Henry his son, to doe justice upon the Murderers, threatening his son with GODS judgements, if he neglected it. But this unseasonable care of his, GOD was not pleased to accept for payment. For after Henry himself was slain in sport by Montgomery, we all may remember what became of his foure sons, Francis, Charles, Henry, and Hercules. Of which, although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautifull and vertuous Ladies: yet were they, one after another, cast out of the world, without stock or seed. And notwithstanding their subtilty, and breach of faith; with all their Massacres upon those of the religion, and great effusion of blood, the Crown was set on his head, whom they all laboured to dissolve; the Protestants remain more in number than ever they were, and hold to this day more strong Cities than ever they had.

Let us now see if God be not the same God in Spain, as in England and France. Towards whom we will look no further back than to Don Pedro of Castile: in respect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicil, our Richard the third, and the great Evan Vasilowick of Moscovia, were but petty ones: this Castilian, of all Christian and Heathen Kings, having been the most mercilesse. For, besides those of his own Blood and Nobility, which he caused to be slain in his own Court and Chamber, as Sancho Ruis, the great Master of Calatrava, Ruis Gonfales, Alphonsio Tello, and Don John of Arragon, whom he cut in pieces, and cast into the street, denying him Christian buriall: I say, besides these, and the slaughter of Gomes Mauriques, Diego Peres, Alphonsio Gomes, and the great Commander of Castile; he made away the two Infants of Arragon his Cousin-germans, his brother Don Frederick, Don John de la Cerde, Albuquerque, Nugnes de Guzman, Cornel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo, Gutierrez his great Treasurer, and all his kindred; and a world of others. Neither did he spare his two youngest brothers, innocent Princes: whom after he had kept in close prison from their Cradles, till one of them had lived sixteen years, and the other fourteen; he murdered them there. Nay, he spared not his Mother, nor his Wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Lastly, as he caused the Archbishop of Toledo, and the Dean to be killed of purpose to enjoy their treasures; so did he put to death Mahomet Aben Alhamar King of Barbary, with 37. of his Nobility, that came unto him for succour, with a great summe of monye, to leviz (by his favour) some companies of souldiers to return withall. Yea, he would needs assist the Hangman with his own hand, in the execution of the old King; inasmuch as Pope Urban declareth him an enemy both to God & Man. But what was his end? Having been formerly beaten out of his Kingdome, and re-established by the valour of the English Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaster: He was stabbed to death by his younger brother the Earle of Astramara, who dispossesseth all his Children of their inheritance; which, but for the Fathers injustice and cruelty, had never been in danger of any such thing.

If we can parallel any man with this King, it must be Duke John of Burgoign, who, after his traiterous murder of the Duke of Orleans, caused the Constable of Armagnac, the Chancellor of France, the Bishops of Constance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reverend Church-men, the Earle of gran Pre, Hector of Chartres, and (in effect) all the Officers of justice of the Chamber of Accounts, Treasury, and Request, (with sixteen hundred others to accompany them) to be suddenly and violently slain. Hereby, while he hoped to govern, and to have mastered France: He was soon after stricken with an axe in the face, in the presence of the Dauphin; and, without any leisure to repent his misdeeds, presently slain. These were the Lovers of other mens miseries: and misery found them out.

Now for the Kings of Spain, which lived both with Henry the seventh, Henry the eighth, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon was the first: and the first that laid the foundation of the present Austrian greatness. For this King did not content himself to hold Arragon by the usurpation of his Ancestor; and to fasten thereunto the Kingdome of Castile and Leon, which Isabel his wife held by strong hand, and his assistance, from her own Neece: the Daughter of the last Henry: but most cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right, he also cast his own Neece out of the Kingdome of Navarre: and, contrary to faith, and the promise that he made to restore it, fortified the best places, and so wasted the rest, as there was no means left for any Army to invade it. This King, I say, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick Kings of Naples, Princes of his own blood, and by double alliance tied unto him; sold them to the French: and with the same Army, sent for their succour under Gonfialvo, cast them out; and shared their Kingdome with the French, whom afterwards he most shamefully betrayed.

This wife and politick King, who sold Heaven and his own Honour, to make his son the Prince of Spain, the greatest Monarch of the world : saw him die in the flower of his yeers; and his wife great with childe, with her untimely birth, at once and together buried. His eldest daughter married unto Don Alphonso, Prince of Portugal; beheld her first husband break his neck in her presence; and being with childe by her second, died with it. A just judgement of God upon the race of John, father to Alphonso, now wholly extinguished : who had not onely left many disconsolate Mothers in Portugal, by the slaughter of their children; but had formerly slain with his own hand, the son and onely comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Dutchesse of Viseo. The second daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-Duke Philip, turned fool, and died mad and deprived. His third daughter, bestowed on King Henry the eighth, he saw cast off by the King: the mother of many troubles in England; and the mother of a daughter, that in her unhappy zeal shed a world of innocent blood; lost Calice to the French; and died heart-broken without increase. To conclude, all those Kingdoms of Ferdinand have masters of a new name; and by a strange family are governed and posselt.

Charles the fifth, son to the Arch-Duke Philip, in whose vain enterprises upon the French, upon the Almans, and other Princes and States; so many multitudes of Christian Souldiers, and renowned Captains were consumed : who gave the while a most perillous entrance to the Turks, and suffered Rhodes, the Key of Christendom, to be taken; was in conclusion chased out of France, and in a sort out of Germany; and left to the French, Mentz, Toule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire, stole away from Insprug; and scaled the Alpes by torch-light, pursued by Duke Maurice; having hoped to swallow up all those Dominions, wherein he conceived nothing save his own disgraces. And having, after the slaughter of so many Millions of men, no one foot of ground in either: He crept into a Cloister, and made himself a Pensioner of an hundred thousand Duckets by the yeer, to his son Philip, from whom he very slowly received his mean and ordinary maintenance.

His son again King Philip the second, not satisfied to hold Holland & Zeland, wrested by his ancestors from Jaqueline their lawfull Princeesse) and to possesse in peace many other Provinces of the Netherlands : perswaded by that mischievous Cardinall of Granville, and other Romish Tyrants; not onely forgot the most remarkable services, done to his Father the Emperour, by the Nobility of those Countries, not onely forgot the Present made him upon his entry, of forty Millions of Florens, called the Novaile aide; nor onely forgot that he had twice most solemnly sworn to the Generall States, to maintain & preserve their ancient rights; priviledges, and customes, which they had enjoyed under their thirty and five Earles before him, Conditionall Princes of those Provinces : but beginning first to constrain them, and enthrall them by the Spanish Inquisition, and then to impoverish them by many new devised and intollerable impositions, he lastly, by strong hand and main force, attempted to make himself not onely an absolute Monarch over them, like unto the Kings and Soveraignes of England and France; but Turk-like, to tread under his feet all their Naturall and Fundamentall Laws, Priviledges, and ancient Rights. To effect which, after he had easily obtained from the Pope a Dispensation of his former Oaths (which Dispensation was the true cause of the War and Bloodshed since then;) and after he had tried what he could perform, by dividing of their own Nobility, under the government of his base sister, Margaret of Austria, and the Cardinall Granville; He employed that most mercilesse Spaniard, Don Ferdinand Alvarez of Toledo, Duke of Alva, followed with a powerfull Army of strange Nations : by whom he first slaughtered that renowned Captain the Earl of Egmont, Prince of Gavare : and Philip Montmorency Earl of Horn : made away Montigue, and the Marquesse of Bergues, and cut off in those six yeers (that Alva governed) of Gentlemen and others, eighteen thousand and six hundred, by the hands of the Hangman, besides all his other barbarous murders and massacres. By whose ministry when he could not yet bring his affairs to their wished ends, having it in his hope to work that by subtilty, which he had failed to perform by force : He sent for Governour his bastard brother Don John of Austria; a Prince of great hope, and very gracious to those people. But he, using the same Papall advantage that his Predecessors had done, made no scruple to take Oath upon the holy Evangelists, to observe the Treaty made with the Generall States; and to discharge the Low-Countries of all Spaniards, & other strangers therein garrison'd: Towards whose Pay & Passport, the Netherlands strained themselves to make payment of 600000 pounds. Which monies received, he suddenly surpris'd the Citadels of Antwerp and Nemures : not doubting (being unsuspected by the States) to have posselt himself of all the mastering places of those Provinces. For whatsoever he overtly pretended, he held in secret a contrary counsell with the Secretary Escovedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, and others; Ministers of the Spanish tyranny formerly practised, and now again intended. But let us now see the effect and end of this perjury, and of all other the Dukes cruelties. First, for himself; after he had murdered so many of the Nobility; executed (as aforesaid) eighteen thousand six hundred in six yeers, and most cruelly slain Man, Woman, and Childe in Mecklin, Zutphen, Naerden, and other places: and after he had consumed six and thirty millions of treasure in six yeers : notwithstanding his Spanish want, That he would suffocate the Hollanders in their own Butter-barrells, and Milk-tubs : He departed the Country no otherwise accompanied, than with the curse and detestation of the whole Nation; leaving his Masters affaires in a tenfold worse estate, than he found them at his first arrivall. For Don John, whose haughty conceit of himself overcame the greatest difficulties; though his judgment were over-weak to mannage the least: what wonders did his fearfull breach of faith bring forth, other than the King his brothers jealousie & distrust, with the untimely death that seized him, even in the flower of his youth? And for Escovedo his sharp-witted Secretary, who in his own imagination had conquered for his Master both England and the Netherlands; being sent into Spain upon some new project, he was at the first arrivall, and before any acceffe to the King, by certain Russians appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warrant than his) rudely murdered in his own lodging. Lastly, if we consider the King of Spains carriage, his counsell and successe in this businesse, there is nothing left to the memory of man more remarkable. For he hath paid above an hundred Millions, and the lives of above foure hundred thousand Christians, for the losse of all those Countries, which, for beauty, gave place to none; and for revenue, did equall his West-Indies: for the losse of a Nation which most willingly obeyed him; and who at this day, after forty yeers war, are in despright of all his forces become a free Estate, and far more rich and powerfull than they were, when he first began to impoverish and oppress them.

Oh by what plots, by what forswearings, betrayings, oppressions, imprisonments, tortures, poisonings, and under what reasons of State, and politick subtilty, have these fore-named Kings, both strangers; and of our own Nation, pulled the vengeance of GOD upon themselves, upon theirs, and upon their prudent ministers; and in the end have brought those things to passe for their enemies, and seen an effect so directly contrary to all their own counsels and cruelties; as the one could never have hoped for themselves; and the other never have succeeded; if no such opposition had ever been made. GOD hath said it, and performed it ever: Pec-dam sapientiam sapientum; I will destroy the wisdom of the wise.

But what of all this? and to what end do we lay before the eyes of the living, the fall and fortunes of the dead? seeing the world is the same that it hath been; and the children of the present time, will still obey their parents? It is in the present time, that all the wits of the world are exercised. To hold the times we have, we hold all things lawfull: and either we hope to hold them for ever; or at least we hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for. For as we are content to forget our own experience; and to counterfeit the ignorance of our own knowledge, in all things that concern our selves; or perswade our selves, that GOD hath given us letters patents to pursue all our irreligious affections, with a non obstante: so we neither look behinde us what hath been, nor before us what shall be. It is true, that the quantity which we have, is of the body: we are by it joyned to the earth: we are compounded of earth; and we inhabit it. The Heavens are high; far off, and unsearchable: we have sense and feeling of corporall things; and of eternall grace, but by revelation. No marvell then that our thoughts are also earthly: and it is lesse to be wondered at, that the words of mortlesse men cannot cleanse them: seeing their doctrine and instruction, whose understanding the Holy Ghost vouchsafed to inhabit, have not performed it. For as the Prophet Elay cried out long ago, Lord, who hath beleaved our reports? And out of doubt, as Elay complained then for himself and others: so are they lesse beleaved, every day after other. For although Religion, and the truth thereof be in every mans mouth, yea, in the discourse of every woman, who for the greatest number are but Idols of vanity: what is it other than an universall dissimulation? We profess that we know GOD: but by works we deny him. For Beatitude doth not consist in the knowledge of divine things, but in a divine life: for the Devils know them better than men. Beatitudo non est divinum cognitio, sed vita divina.

And certainly there is nothing more to be admired, and more to be lamented, than the private contention, the passionate dispute, the personall hatred, and the perpetuall war, massacres, and murders, for Religion among Christians: the discourse whereof hath so occupied the World, as it hath well neer driven the practice thereof out of the World. Who would not soon resolve, that took knowledge but of the religious disputations among men, and not of their lives which dispute, that there were no other thing in their desires, than the purchase of Heaven; and that the World it self were but used as it ought, and as an Inne, or place wherein to repose our selves in passing on towards our celestiall habitation? when on the contrary, besides the discourse and outward profession, the soule hath nothing but hypocrisie. We are all (in effect) become Comedians in Religion: and while we act in gesture and voice, divine vertues, in all the course of our lives we renounce our Persons, and the parts we play. For Charity, Justice, and Truth, have but their being in terms, like the Philosophers Materia prima.

Neither is it that wisdom, which Solomon defineth to be the School-Mistresse of the knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the world: it is enough that we give it our good word: but the same which is altogether exercised in the service of the World, as the gathering of riches chiefly, by which we purchase and obtaine honour, with the many respects which attend it. These indeed be the marks, which (when we have bent our consciences to the highest) we all shoot at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our own; the care our own in this life, the perill our own in the future: and yet when we have gathered the greatest abundance, we our selves enjoy no more thereof, than so much as belongs to one man. For the rest, He that had the greatest wisdom, and the greatest ability that ever man had, hath told us, that this is the use: When goods increace (saith Solomon) they also increace that eat them; and what good cometh to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes? As for those that devoure the rest, and follow us in faire weather: they again forsake us in the first tempest of misfortune, and steere away before the Sea and Winde; leaving us to the malice of our destinies. Of these, among a thousand examples, I will take but one out of Master Dannel, and use his own words: Whilst the Emperour Charles the fifth, after the resignation of his estates, stayed at Uloshing for winde, to carry him his last journey into Spain; He conferred on a time with Seldius, his brother Ferdinands Embassadour, till the deep of the night. And when Seldius should depart: the Emperour calling for some of his servants, and no body answering him, (for those that attended upon him, were some gone to their lodgings, and all the rest asleep) the Emperour took up the candle himself, and went before Seldius to light him down the staires; and so did, notwithstanding all the resistance that Seldius could make. And when he was come to the staires foot, he said thus unto him: Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperour, when he shall be dead and gone, That Him, whom thou hast known in thy time environed with so many mighty Armies and Guards of Souldiers, thou hast also seen alone, abandoned, and forsaken, yea even of his own domestickal servants, &c. I acknowledge this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of GOD, which I will by no means go about to withstand.

But you will say, that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first is, the reverend respect that is held of great men, and the Honour done unto them by all sorts of people. And it is true indeed: provided, that an inward love for their justice and piety, accompany the outward worship given to their places and power; without which what is the applause of the Multitude, but as the out-cry of an Herd of Animals, who without the knowledge of any true cause, please themselves with the noise they make? For seeing it is a thing exceeding rare to distinguish Vertue and Fortune: the most impious (if prosperous) have ever been applauded; the most vertuous (if unprosperous) have ever been despised. For as Fortunes man rides the Horse, so Fortune her self rides the Man. Who, when he is descended and on foot: the Man taken from his Beast, and Fortune from the Man; a base groom beats the one, and a bitter contempt spurnes at the other, with equall liberty.

The Preface.

The second is the greatning of our posterity, and the contemplation of their glory whom we leave behinde us. Certainly, of those which conceive that their souls departed take any comfort therein, it may truly be said of them, which Laetantius spake of certain Heathen Philosophers, quod sapientes sunt in re stulta. For when our spirits immortall shall be once separate from our mortall bodies, and disposed by G O D : there remaineth in them no other joy of their posterity which succeed, than there doth of pride in that stone, which sleepeth in the Wall of a Kings Palace, nor any other sorrow for their poverty, than there doth of shame in that, which beareth up a Beggars cottage. Nesciunt mortui, etiam sancti, quid agunt vivi, etiam eorum filii, quia animarum mortuorum rebus viventium non interfunt: The dead, though holy, know nothing of the living, no, not of their own children: for the souls of those departed, are not conversant with their affaires that remain. And if we doubt of Saint Augustine, we cannot of Job; who tells us, That we know not if our sons shall be honourable: neither shall we understand concerning them, whether they shall be of low degree. Which Ecclesiastes also confirmeth: Man walketh in a shadow, and disquieteth himself in vain: he heapeth up riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them. The living (saith he) know that they shall die, but the dead know nothing at all: for who can shew unto man what shall be after him under the Sunne? He therefore accounteth it among the rest of worldly vanities, to labour and travell in the world; not knowing after death, whether a foole or a wise man should enjoy the fruits thereof: which made me (saith he) endeavour even to abhorre mine own labour. And what can other men hope, whose blessed or sorrowfull estates after death God hath reserved? mans knowledge lying but in his hope, seeing the Prophet Elay confesseth of the Elect, That Abraham is ignorant of us, and Israel knows us not. But herof we are assured, that the long and dark night of death, (of whose following day we shall never behold the dawn till his return that hath triumphed over it) shall cover us over till the world be no more. After which, and when we shall again receive Organs glorified and incorruptible, the seats of Angelicall affections: in so great admiration shall the soules of the blessed be exercised, as they cannot admit the mixture of any second or lesse joy; nor any return of forgone and mortall affection towards friends, kinned, or children. Of whom whether we shall retain any particular knowledge, or in any sort distinguish them, no man can assure us; and the wisest men doubt. But on the contrary; If a divine life retain any of those faculties, which the soule exercised in a mortall body; we shall not at that time so divide the joyes of Heaven, as to cast any part thereof on the memory of their felicities which remaine in the World. No, be their estates greater than ever the World gave, we shall (by the difference known unto us) even detest their consideration. And whatsoever comfort shall remain of all forepast, the same will consist in the charity, which we exercised living: and in that Piety, Justice, and firm Faith, for which it pleased the infinite mercy of God to accept of us, and receive us. Shall we therefore value honour and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as unnecessary and vain? Certainly no. For that infinite wisdom of God, which hath distinguished his Angels by degrees: which hath given greater and lesse light and beauty to heavenly bodies: which hath made differences between beasts and birds: created the Eagle and the Flie; the Cedar and the Shrub; and among stones, given the fairest tincture to the Ruby, and the quickest light to the Diamond; hath also ordained Kings, Dukes, or Leaders of the people, Magistrates, Judges, and other degrees among men. And as honour is left to posterity, for a mark and ensigne of the vertue and understanding of their Ancestors; so (seeing Siracides preferreth Death before Beggary: and that titles, without proportionable estates, fall under the miserable succour of other mens pity,) I account it foolishnesse to condemn such a care: Provided, that worldly goods be well gotten; and that we raise not our own buildings out of other mens ruines. For, as Plato doth first preferre the perfection of bodily health; secondly, the forme and beauty, and thirdly, Divities nulla fraude quasitas: so Jeremy cries, Woe unto them that erect their houses by unrighteousnesse, and their chambers without equity: And Esay the same, Woe to those that spoile, and were not spoiled. And it was out of the true wisdom of Solomon, that he commandeth us, not to drink the wine of violence; not to lie in wait for blood, and not to swallow them up alive, whose riches we covet: for such are the wayes (saith he) of every one that is greedy of gain.

And if we could afford our selves but so much leisure as to consider, That he which hath most in the world, hath, in respect of the world, nothing in it: and that he which hath the longest time lent him to live in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, setting it either by that which is past, when we were not, or by that time which is to come, in which we shall abide for ever: I say, if both, to wit, our proportion in the world, and our time in the world, differ not much from that which is nothing, it is not out of any excellency of understanding, that we so much prize the one, which hath (in effect) no being: and so much neglect the other, which hath no ending: coveting those mortall things of the world, as if our soules were therein immortall, and neglecting those things which are immortall, as if our selves after the world were but mortall.

But let every man value his own wisdom, as he pleaseth. Let the Rich man think all fools, that cannot equall his abundance; the Revenger esteeme all negligent, that have not trodden down their opposites; the Politician all gross, that cannot merchandize their faith: Yet when we once come in sight of the Port of death, to which all winds drive us, & when by letting fall that fatal Anchor, which can never be weighed again, the navigation of this life takes end: Then it is, I say, that our own cogitations (those sad & severe cogitations, formerly beaten from us by our Health & Felicity) return again, & pay us to the uttermost for all the pleasing passages of our lives past. It is then that we cry out to God for mercy; then, when our selves can no longer exercise cruelty to others: and it is only then, that we are stricken through the soul with this terrible sentence, That God will not be mock't. For if according to S. Peter, The righteous scarcely be saved: and that God spared not his Angels: where shall those appear, who, having served their appetites all their lives, presume to think, that the severe Commandments of the All-powerfull God were given but in sport; & that the short breath, which we draw when death presseth us, if we can but fashion it to the sound of Mercy (without any kind of satisfaction or amends) is sufficient? O quam multi, saith a reverend Father, cum hac spe ad aternos labores & bella descendunt! I confesse that it is a great comfort to our friends, to have it said, that we ended well; for we all desire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But what shall we call a dis-esteeming, an opposing, or (indeed) a mocking of God: if those men do not oppose him, dis-esteem him, and mock him, that think it enough for God, to ask him forgiveness at leisure, with the remainder & last drawing of a malicious breath? For what do they otherwise, that die this kind of well-dying, but say unto God as followeth? We beseech thee, O God, that all the falsehoods, forswearings, and treacheries of our lives past, may be pleasing unto thee; that thou wilt for our sakes (that have had no leisure to do any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impossible) and forget to be a just God; that thou wilt love injuries and oppressions, call ambition wisdom, and charity foolishness. For I shall prejudice my son, (which I am resolved not to do) if I make restitution; and confesse my self to have been unjust, (which I am too proud to do) if I deliver the oppressed. Certainly, these wise worldlings have either found out a new God, or made One; and in all likelihood such a Leaden One, as Lewis the eleventh wore in his Cap; which when he had caused any that he feared or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his head and kisse it: beseeching it to pardon him this one evil act more, and it should be the last; which (as at other times) he did, when by the practice of a Cardinall and a falsified Sacrament, he caused the Earl of Armagnac to be stabbed to death: mockeries indeed fit to be used towards a Leaden, but not towards the Everliving God. But of this composition are all devout lovers of the World, that they fear all that is dwellese and ridiculous: they fear the plots and practices of their opposites, and their very whisperings: they fear the opinions of men, which beat but upon shadows: they flatter and forsake the prosperous and unprosperous, be they friends or Kings: yea, they dive under water, like Ducks, at every pebble stone, that is but thrown towards them by a powerfull hand: and on the contrary, they shew an obstinate and Giant-like valour, against the terrible judgements of the All-powerfull God: yea, they shew themselves gods against God, and slaves towards men; towards men whose bodies and consciences are alike rotten.

Now for the rest: If we truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate; and of the poor & oppressed, whom we account wretched: we shall finde the happiness of the one, and the miserable estate of the other, so tied by God to the very instant, and both so subject to interchange (witness the sudden downfall of the greatest Princes, and the speedy uprising of the meanest persons) as the one hath nothing so certain, whereof to boast; nor the other so uncertain, whereof to bewail it self. For there is no man so assured of his honour, of his riches, health, or life; but that he may be deprived of either, or all, the very next houre or day to come. Quid vesp̄er vehat, incertum est; What the evening will bring with it, it is uncertaine. And yet ye cannot tell (saith S. James) what shall be to morrow. To day he is set up, and to morrow he shall not be found; for he is turned into dust, and his purpose perisheth. And alibough the aire which compasseth adversity, be very obscure: yet therein we better discern God, than in that shining light which environeth worldly glory; through which, for the cleernesse thereof, there is no vanity which escapeth our sight. And let adversity seem what it will; to happy men ridiculous, who make themselves merry at other mens misfortunes; and to those under the crosse, grievous: yet this is true, That for all that is past, to the very instant, the portions remaining are equall to either. For be it that we have have lived many yeers, and (according to Solomon) in them all we have rejoiced; or be it that we have measured the same length of dayes, and therein have evermore sorrowed: yet looking back from our present being, we finde both the one and the other, to wit, the joy and the woe, sailed out of sight; and death, which doth pursue us, and hold us in chase, from our infancy, hath gathered it. Quicquid erat retro est, mors tenet: Whatsoever of our age is past, death holds it. So as whosoever be, to whom Fortune hath been a servant; and the Time a friend: let him but take the account of his memory (for we have no other keeper of our pleasures past) and truly examine what it hath reserved either of beauty and youth, or fore-gone delights; what it hath saved, that it might last, of his dearest affections, or of whatever else the amorous Spring-time gave his thoughts of contentment, then unvaluable; and he shall finde that all the Art which his elder yeers have, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions, than heavie, secret, and sad sighes. He shall finde nothing remaining, but those sorrows, which grow up after our fast-springing youth, over-take it, when it is at a stand; and over-top it utterly, when it begins to wither: in so much as looking back from the very infant time, and from our now being, the poor, diseased, and captive creature, hath as little sense of all his former miseries and pains, as he, that is most blest in common opinion, hath of his fore-passed pleasure and delights. For whatsoever is cast behinde us, is just nothing: and what is to come, deceitfull hope hath it: Omnia quæ eventura sunt, in incerto jacent. Only those few black Swans I must except: who having had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their own price; do, by retaining the comfortable memory of a well-led life, behold death without dread, and the grave without fear; and embrace both; as necessary guides to endlesse glory.

For my self, this is my consolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the sorrows of this life are but of two sorts: whereof the one hath respect to GOD; the other to the World. In the first we complain to GOD against our selves, for our offences against him; and confesse, Et tu justus es in omnibus quæ venerunt super nos; And thou, O Lord, art just in all that hath befallen us. In the second we complain to our selves against GOD: as if he had done us wrong, either in not giving us worldly goods and honours, answering our appetites: or for taking them again from us having had them; forgetting that humble and just acknowledgement of Job, The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken. To the first of which S. Paul hath promised blessednesse; to the second, death. And out of doubt he is either a fool, or ungratefull to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how mean soever his estate be, that the same is yet far greater, than that which God oweth him: or doth not acknowledge, how sharp soever his afflictions be, that the same are yet far lesse, than those which are due unto him. And if an Heathen wise man call the adversities of the world but tributa vivendi; the tributes of living: a wise Christian man ought to know them, and bear them but as the tributes of offending. He ought to bear them man-like, and resolvedly, and not as those whining Souldiers do, qui gementes sequuntur Imperatorem.

For seeing God, who is the Author of all our tragedies, hath written out for us, and appointed us all the parts we are to play: and hath not, in their distribution, been partiall to the most mighty Princes of the World; That gave unto Darius the part of the greatest Emperour, and the part of the most miserable beggar, a beggar a beggar begging water of an Enemy, to quench the great drought of death; That appointed Bajazet to play the Grand Signior of the Turks in the morning, & in the same day the Footstool of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerian had also plaid, being taken by Saporess;) that made Bellisarius play the most victorious Captain, and lastly the part of a blind beggar, of which examples many thousands may be produced: why should other men, who are but as the least worms, complain of wrongs? Certainly there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous world, than to resolve, That the change of fortune on the great Theater, is but as the change of garments on the lesse. For when on the one and the other, every man wears but his own skin, the Players are all alike. Now if any man out of weaknes prize the passages of this world otherwise (for saith Petrarch, Magni ingenii est revocare mentem a sensibus) it is by reason of that unhappy fantasie of ours, which forgeth in the brains of Man all the miseries (the corporall excepted) whereunto he is subject. Therein it is, that Misfortune and Adversity work all that they work. For seeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, whatsoever Fortune or Force takes from any one; it were a foolish madnesse in the shipwreck of worldly things, where all sinks but the Sorrow, to save it. That were, as Seneca saith, Fortunæ succumbere, quod tristius est omni fato: To fall under Fortune, of all other the most miserable destinie.

But it is now time to sound a retreat, and to desire to be excused of this long pursuit: and withall, that the good intent, which hath moved me to draw the picture of time past (which we call History) in so large a Table, may also be accepted in place of a better reason.

The examples of divine Providence, every where found (the first divine Histories being nothing els but a continuation of such examples) have perswaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things; to wit, Creation. For though these two glorious actions of the Almighty be so neer, and (as it were) linked together, that the one necessarily implieth the other: Creation inferring Providence (for what father forsaketh the childe that he hath begotten?) Providence presupposing Creation: Yet many of those that have seemed to excell in worldly wisdom, have gone about to dis-joyn this coherence; the Epicure denying both Creation and Providence, but granting that the World had a Beginning; the Aristotelian granting Providence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning.

Now although this doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time (for by faith we understand, that the world was made by the word of God) be too weighty a work for Aristotles rotten ground to bear up; upon which he hath (notwithstanding) founded the Defences and Fortresses of all his Verball Doctrine: Yet that the necessity of infinite power, and the Worlds beginning, and the impossibility of the contrary, even in the judgement of Naturall reason, wherein he beleeved, had not better informed him; it is greatly to be marvelled at. And it is no lesse strange, that those men which are desirous of knowledge (seeing Aristotle hath failed in this main point; and taught little other than terms in the rest) have so retrencht their minds from the following and overtaking of truth, and so absolutely subjected themselves to the law of those Philosophicall principles; as all contrary kinde of teaching, in the search of causes, they have condemned either for phantasticall, or curious. But doth it follow, that the Positions of Heathen Philosophers are undoubted grounds and principles indeed, because so called? Or that ipsi dixerunt, doth make them to be such? Certainly no. But this is true, That where naturall reason hath built any thing so strong against it self, as the same reason can hardly assail it, much lesse batter it down: the same in every question of Nature, and infinite power, may be approved for a fundamentall law of humane knowledge. For saith Charron in his Book of Wisdome, Tout proposition humaine a autant d'autorité quel'autre, si la raison n'ou fait la difference; Every humane proposition hath equall authority, if reason make not a difference; the rest being but the fables of principles. But hereof how shall the upright and unpartiall judgement of man give a sentence, where opposition and examination are not admitted to give in evidence? And to this purpose it was well said of Laërtius, Sapientiam sibi adimunt, qui sine ullo judicio inventa majorum probant, & ab aliis pecudum more ducuntur: They neglect their owne wisdom, who without any judgement approve the invention of those that fore-went them; and suffer themselves, after the manner of beasts, to be led by them. By the advantage of which sloth and dullnesse, ignorance is now become so powerfull a Tyrant, as it hath set true Philosophy, Physick, and Divinity in a Pillory; and written over the first, Contra negantem Principia; over the second, Virtus specifica; and over the third, Ecclesia Romana.

But for my self, I shall never be perswaded, that God hath shut up all light of Learning within the lantern of Aristotles brains: or that it was ever said unto him; as unto Eldras, Accendam in Corde tuo Lucernam intellectus: that God hath given invention but to the Heathen, and that they onely invaded Nature, and found the strength and bottom thereof; the same Nature having consumed all her store, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That these and these be the causes of these and these effects, Time hath taught us; and not reason: and so hath experience without Art. The Cheese-wife knoweth it as well as the Philosopher, that sower Rennet doth coagulate her milk into a curd. But if we aske a reason of this cause, why the sowrenesse doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I think that there is nothing to be found in vulgar Philosophy, to satisfie this and many other like vulgar questions. But man to cover his ignorance in the least things, who cannot give a true reason for the Grasse under his feet, why it should be green rather than red, or of any other colour; that could never yet discover the way and reason of Natures working, in those which are far lesse noble creatures than himself; who is far more noble than the Heavens themselves: Man (saith Solomon) that can hardly discern the things that are upon the Earth, and with great labour finde out the things that are before us; that hath so short a time in the world, as he no sooner begins to learn, than to die; that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his understanding nothing truly; that is ignorant of the Essence of his own soul, and which the wisest of the Naturalists (if Aristotle be he) could never so much as define, but by the Action and Effect, telling us what it works (which all men know as well as he) but not what it is, which neither he, nor any else doth know, but GOD that created it; (For though I were perfect, yet I know not my soule, saith Job.) Man, I say, that is but an idiot in the next cause of his own life, and in the cause of all actions of his life: will (notwithstanding) examine the Art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD, who (saith Job) is so excellent as we know him not; and and examine the beginning of the worke, which had end before Mankinde had a beginning of being. He will disable Gods power to make a world, without matter to make it of. He will rather give the mores of the Aire for a cause; cast the work on necessity or chance; bestow the honour thereof on Nature; make two powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of the Forme; and lastly, for want of a work-man, have it Eternall: which latter opinion Aristotle, to make himself the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World: and his Sectators have maintained it; parati ac conjurati, quos sequuntur Philosophorum animis invidiis opiniones tueri. For Hermes, who lived at once with, or soon after Moses, Zoroaster, Musæus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Melissus, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleanthes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whose opinions are exquisitely gathered by Steuchius Eugubinus) found in the necessity of invincible reason, One eternall and infinite Being, to be the Parent of the universall. Horum omnium sententia quamvis sit incerta, eodem tamen spectat, ut Providentiam unam esse consentiant: five enim Natura, five Æther, five Ratio, five Mens, five fatalis Necessitas, five divina Lex, idem est quod a nobis dicitur Deus: All these mens opinions, (saith Laſtantius) though uncertain, come to this; That they agree upon one Providence, whether the same be Nature, or Light, or Reason, or Understanding, or Destinie, or divine Ordinance, that it is the same, which we call G O D. Certainly, as all the Rivers in the world, though they have divers risings, and divers runnings; though they sometimes hide themselves for a while under ground, and seem to be lost in Sea-like Lakes; do at last finde, and fall into the great Ocean: so after all the searches that humane capacity hath; and after all Philosophicall contemplation and curiosity, in the necessity of this infinite power, all the reason of man ends and dissolves it self.

As for others; and first touching those which conceive the matter of the World to have been eternall, and that God did not create the World ex nihilo, but ex materia præexistente; the Supposition is so weak, as is hardly worth the answering. For (saith Eusebius) Mihi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annexere; They seem unto me, which affirm this, to give part of the work to God, and part to Fortune: inſomuch as if God had not found this first matter by chance, He had neither been Author, nor Father, nor Creatour, nor Lord of the Univerſall. For were the Matter or Chaos eternall: it then follows, That either this supposed Matter did fit it self to God, or God accommodate himself to the matter. For the first; it is impossible, that things without sense could proportion themselves to the Work-mans will. For the second; it were horrible to conceive of God, That as an Artificer he applied himself, according to the proportion of matter which he lighted upon.

But let it be supposed, That this matter hath been made by any Power, not Omnipotent, & infinitely wise: I would gladly learn how it came to passe, that the same was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent & infinitely wise; and no more, nor no lesse, than served to receive the form of the Univerſall. For had it wanted any thing of what was sufficient; then must it be granted, That God created out of nothing so much of new matter, as served to finish the work of the World: Or had there been more of this matter than sufficed, then God did dissolve and annihilate whatsoever remained and was superfluous. And this must every reasonable sonable soul confesse, That it is the same work of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing. And by the same art and power, and by none other, can those things, or any part of that eternall matter, be again changed into Nothing; by which those things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Again; to say that this matter was the cause of it self; this, of all other, were the greatest Idiotism. For, if it were the cause of it self at any time; then there was also a time when it self was not; at which time of not being, it is easie enough to conceive, that it could neither procure it self, nor any thing else. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impossible. Nihil autem seipsum præcedit, neque seipsum componit corpus: There is nothing that doth precede it self, neither do bodies compound themselves.

For the rest, Those that feign this matter to be eternall, must of necessity confesse, that Infinite cannot be separate from Eternity. And then had infinite matter left no place for infinite form; but that the first matter was finite, the form which it received proves it. For conclusion of this part, whoſoever will make choice, rather to beleve in eternall deformity, or in eternall dead matter, than in eternall light and eternall life; let eternall death be his reward. For it is a madnesse of that kind, as wanteth terms to expresse it. For what reason of man (whom the curse of presumption hath not stupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which we can comprehend but a kind of shadow, quia comprehensio est intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it self, either for matter or form; yea for as many worlds (if such had been Gods will) as the Sea hath sands? For where the power is without limitation, the work hath no other limitation, than the workmans will. Yea, Reason it self finds it more easie for infinite power, to deliver from it self a finite world, without the help of matter prepared; than for a finite man, a fool and dust, to change the form of matter made to his hands. They are Dionysius his words, Deus in una existentia omnia præhabet: and again, Esse omnium est ipsa Divinitas, omne quod videt, & quod non videt; to wit, causaliter, or in better terms, non tanquam forma, sed tanquam causa universalis. Neither hath the World univerrſall closed up all of G O D: For the most part of his works (saith Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his wisdom be opened by the glorious work of the World: which never brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded, and made finite. And hereof it comes, That we seldome entitle G O D the all-shewing, or the all-willing; but the Almighty, that is, infinitely able.

But now for those, who from that ground, That out of nothing, nothing is made, inferre the Worlds eternity; and yet not so salvage therein, as those are, which give an eternall being to dead matter: It is true, if the word [Nothing] be taken in the affirmative; and the making, imposed upon Naturall Agents and finite power; That out of nothing, nothing is made. But seeing their great Doctor Aristotle himself confesseth, quod omnes Antiqui decreverunt quasi quoddam rerum principium, ipsumque infinitum: That all the Ancient decree a kind of beginning, and the same to be infinite: and a little after, more largely and plainly, Principium ejus est nullum, sed ipsum omnium cernitur esse principium, ac omnia complexi ac regere: it is strange, that this Philosopher, with his followers, should rather make choice out of falshood, to conclude falshly; than out of truth, to resolve truly. For if we compare the World Univerſall, and all the unmeasurable ble Orbs of Heaven, and those marvellous bodies of the Sun, Moon, and Stars, with ipsum Infinitum : it may truly be said of them all, which himself affirms of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum ; and therefore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui destruit omnem proportionem) is no wonder in Gods power. And therefore Anaximander, Melissus, and Empedocles, call the world universall, but particulam Universitatis & infinitatis ; a parcell of that which is the universality and the infinity it self. And Plato, but a shadow of God. But the other to prove the worlds eternity, urgeth this Maxime, That, A sufficient and effectuell cause being granted, an answerable effect thereof is also granted. Inferring, that God being for ever a sufficient and effectuell cause of the world, the effect of the cause should also have been for ever ; to wit, the world universall. But what a strange mockery is this in so great a Master, to confesse a sufficient and effectuell cause of the world (to wit, an almighty God) in his Antecedent ; and the same God to be a God restrained in his Conclusion ; to make God free in power, and bound in will ; able to effect, unable to determine ; able to make all things, and yet unable to make choice of the time when ? For this were impiously to resolve of God, as of natural necessity ; which hath neither choice, nor will, nor understanding ; which cannot but work matter being present : as fire, to burn things combustible. Again he thus disputeth, That every Agent which can work, and doth not work ; if it afterward work, it is either thereto moved by it self, or by somewhat else : & so it passeth from power to acti. But God (saith he) is immovable, and is neither moved by himself, nor by any other : but being alwayes the same, doth alwayes work. Whence he concludeth, If the world were caused by God, that he was for ever the cause thereof : and therefore eternall. The answer to this is very easie, For that Gods performing in due time that, which be ever determined at length to perform, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather constancy in him. For the same action of his will, which made the world for ever, did also with-hold the effect to the time ordained. To this answer, in it self sufficient, others adde further, that the Pattern or Image of the world may be said to be eternall : which the Platonicks call, spirituale mundum ; and do in this sort distinguish the Idea and Creation in time. Spiritus ille mundus, mundi huius exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vira æquali est Architecto, fuit semper cum illo, eritque semper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod secundum opus est Dei, decedit jam ab opifice ex parte una, quia non fuit semper : retinet alteram, quia fit semper futurus : That representative, or the intentionall word (say they) the sampler of this visible world, the first work of GOD, was equally ancient with the Architect ; for it was for ever with him, and ever shall be. This materiall world, the second work or creature of GOD, doth differ from the worker in this, That it was not from everlasting, and in this it doth agree, that it shall be for ever to come. The first point, That it was not for ever, all Christians confesse : The other they understand no otherwise, than that after the consummation of this world, there shall be a new Heaven and a new Earth, without any new creation of matter. But of these things we need not here stand to argue : though such opinions be not unworthy the propounding, in this consideration, of an eternall and unchangeable cause, producing a changeable and temporall effect, Touching which point Proclus the Platonist disputeth, That the compounded essence of the World (and because compounded, ounded, therefore dissapable) is continued, & knit to the Divine Being, by an individuell & inseparable power, flowing from Divine unity ; and that the Worlds naturall appetite of God sheweth, that the same proceedeth from a good & understanding divine ; and that this vertue, by which the World is continued and knit together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and everlastingly continue & preserve the same. Which infinite Vertue, the finite World (saith he) is not capable of, but receiveth it from the divine infinite, according to the temporall Nature it hath, successively every moment by little and little ; even as the whole materiall World is not altogether : but the abolished parts are departed by small degrees, and the parts yet to come, do by the same small degrees succeed, as the shadow of a tree in a River, seemeth to have continued the same a long time in the water, but it is perpetually renewed, in the continuall ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to return to them, which denying that ever the World had any beginning, withall deny that ever it shall have any end, & to this purpose affirm, That it was never heard, never read, never seen, no not by any reason perceived, that the Heavens have ever suffered corruption ; or that they appear any way the older by continuance ; or in any sort otherwise than they were ; which had they been subject to finall corruption, some change would have been discerned in so long a time. To this it is answered, That the little change as yet perceived, doth rather prove their newnesse, & that they have not continued so long, than that they will continue for ever as they are. And if conjecturall arguments may receive answer by conjectures : it then seemeth that some alteration may be found. For either Aristotle, Plinie, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were grossly mistaken : or else those parts of the World, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the Suns heat, neither were the Seas under the Equinoctiall navigable. But we know by experience, that those Regions so situate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate ; and the Sea, over which we navigate, passable enough. We reade also many Histories of Deluges : and how that in the time of Phaeton, divers places in the World were burnt up, by the Suns violent heat.

But in a word, this observation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certain, That stone-walls, of matter moldring and friable, have stood two or three thousand yeers : that many things have been digged up out of the earth, of that depth, as supposed to have been buried by the generall Flood ; without any alteration either of substance or figure : yea, it is beleevved, and it is very probable, that the gold which is daily found in Mines, and Rocks, under ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldest times have not invaded and corrupted : what great alteration should we look for in celestially and quintessentiall bodies ? And yet we have reason to think, that the Sun, by whose help all creatures are generate, doth not in these later Ages assist Nature, as heretofore. We have neither Giants, such as the eldest world had, nor mighty men, such as the elder world had ; but all things in generall are reputed of lesse vertue which from the Heavens receive vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface would permit a larger discourse, we might easily fetch store of proove ; as that this world shall at length have end, as that once it had beginning.

And I see no good answer that can be made to this objection : if the World were eternall ; why not all things in the World eternall ? If there were no first, no cause, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehensible wisdom, but that every Nature had been alike eternall; and Man more rationall than every other Nature: Why had not the eternall reason of Man, provided for his eternall being in the World? For if all were equall, why not equall conditions to all? why should heavenly bodies live for ever, and the bodies of Men rot and die?

Again, who was it that appointed the Earth to keep the centre, and gave order that it should hang in the Air: that the Sun should travell between the Tropicks; and never exceed those bounds; nor fail to perform that Progresse once in every year: the Moon to live by borrowed light: the fixed Stars (according to common opinion) to be fastned like nails in a Cart-wheel; and the Planets to wander at their pleasure? Or if none of these had power over other: was it out of Charity and Love, that the Sun by his perpetuall travell within those two Circles, hath visited, given light unto, and relieved all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turns and times? Out of doubt, if the Sun have of his own accord kept this course in all eternity: He may justly be called eternall Charity, and everlasting Love. The same may be said of all the Stars: who being all of them most large and cleer fountains of vertue and operation, may also be called eternall Vertues: the Earth may be called eternall Patience, the Moon, an eternall Borrower and Beggar; and Man of all other the most miserable, eternally Mortall. And what were this, but to believe again in the old Play of the gods? Yea, in more gods by millions, than ever Hesiodus dream'd of. But in stead of this mad folly, we see it well enough with our feeble and mortall eyes: and the eyes of our reason discern it better. That the Sun, Moon, Stars, and the Earth, are limited, bounded, and constrained: themselves they have not constrained, nor could. Omne determinatum causam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinaverit: Every thing bounded hath some efficient cause, by which it is bounded.

Now for Nature; As by the ambiguity of this name, the school of Aristotle hath both commended many errors unto us, and sought also thereby to obscure the glory of the high Moderatour of all things, shining in the Creation, and in the governing of the World: so if the best definition be taken out of the second of Aristotles Physicks, or primo de Cælo, or out of the fifth of his Metaphysicks, I say that the best is but nominall, and serving onely to difference the beginning of Naturall motion from Artificiall: which yet the Academicks open better; when they call it, A Seminary strength, infused into matter by the Soule of the World: who give the first place to Providence, the second to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Providentia (by which they understand G O D) dux & caput; Fatum, medium ex providentia prodiens; Natura postremum. But be it what he will, or be it any of these (God excepted) or participating of all: yet that it hath choice or understanding (both which are necessarily in the cause of all things) no man hath avowed. For this is unanswerable of Lactantius, Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut scientiam: He onely can be said to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

Pin. de Plat.

But the will and science of Nature, are in these words truly exprest by Ficinus: Potest ubique Natura, vel per diversa media, vel ex diversis materiis, diversa facere: sublata vero mediorum materialiumque diversitate, vel unicum, vel simillimum operatur, neque potest quando adest materia non operari; It is the power

power of Nature by diversity of meanes, or out of diversity of matter, to produce divers things: but taking away the diversity of meanes, and the diversity of matter, it then works but one or the like work; neither can it but work, matter being present. Now if Nature made choice of diversity of matter, to work all these variable works of Heaven and Earth, it had then both understanding and will; it had counsell to begin; reason to dispose; vertue and knowledge to finish, and power to govern: without which all things had been but one and the same: all of the matter of Heaven; or all of the matter of Earth. And if we grant Nature this will, and this understanding, this counsell, reason, and power: Cur Natura potius quam Deus nominetur? Why should we then call such a cause rather Nature, than God? God, of whom all men have notion, and give the first and highest place to Divine power: Omnes homines notionem deorum habent, omneque summum locum divino cuidam numini assignant. And this I say in short, that it is a true effect of true reason in man (were there no authority more binding than reason) to acknowledge and adore the first and most sublime power. Vera Philosophia, est ascensus ab his quæ fluunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vere sunt, & semper eadem: True Philosophy is an ascending from the things which flow, and arise, and fall, to the things that are for ever the same.

For the rest; I do also account it not the meanest, but an impiety monstrous, to confound God and Nature: be it but in terms. For it is God, that onely disposeth of all things according to his own will, and maketh of one Earth, Vessels of honour and dishonour. It is Nature that can dispose of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God that commandeth all: it is Nature that is obedient to all. It is God that doth good unto all, knowing and loving the good he doth. It is Nature, that secondarily doth also good, but it neither knoweth nor loveth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himself: Nature, nothing in it self. It is God, which is the Father, and hath begotten all things: It is Nature, which is begotten by all things, in which it liveth and laboureth, for by it selfe it existeth not. For shall we say, that it is out of affection to the Earth, that heavie things fall towards it? Shall we call it Reason, which doth conduct every River into the salt Sea? Shall we term it knowledge in fire, that makes it to consume combustible matter? If it be Affection, Reason, and Knowledge in these: by the same Affection, Reason, and Knowledge it is, that Nature worketh. And therefore seeing all things work as they do, (call it by Form, or Nature, or by what you please) yet because they work by an impulsion, which they cannot resist; or by a faculty, infused by the supremest power: we are neither to wonder at, nor to worship, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lies the wonder: and to him is the worship due, who hath created such a Nature in things, and such a faculty, as neither knowing it selfe, the matter, wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which it hath; do yet work all things to their last and uttermost perfection. And therefore every reasonable man, taking to himself for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquity, and by all men truly learned that ever the World had, to wit; That there is a power infinite, and eternall (which also necessity doth prove unto us, without the help of Faith, and Reason; without the force of Authority) all things do as easily follow which have been delivered by divine letters, as the waters of a running River do successively pursue each other from the first fountains.

Thus much I say it is, that Reason it self hath taught us: and this is the beginning of knowledge. Sapientia præcedit, Religio sequitur: quia prius est Deum scire, consequens colere; Sapientia goes before, Religion follows: because it is first to know God, and then to worship him. This Sapientia Plato calleth absoluti boni scientiam, The science of the absolute good: And another, Scientiam rerum primarum, sempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (saith Isidore) is not extorted by violence; but by reason and examples perswaded: Fides nequaquam vi extorquetur, sed ratione & exemplis luadetur. I confesse it, That to enquire further, as of the Essence of God, of his power, of his Art, and by what mean he created the world: Or of his secret judgement, and the causes, is not an affect of Reason: Sed cum ratione infantiunt; but they grow mad with reason, that enquire after it: For as it is no shame nor dishonour (saith a French Author) de faire ar- rest au but qu'on naiceu surpasser; For a man to rest himself there, where he findes it impossible to passe on further: so whatsoever is beyond, and out of the reach of true reason, it acknowledgeth it to be so; as understanding it self not to be infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, to be a Teacher, that best knows the end of his own Art. For seeing both Reason and Necessity teach us (Reason, which is pars divini spiritus in corpus humanum merfi) that the world was made by a power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach us: and seeing the same Reason and Necessity make us know, that the same infinite power is every where in the world; and yet how every where, it cannot inform us: our belief hercof is not weakened, but greatly strengthened by our ignorance, because it is the same Reason that tells us, That such a Nature cannot be said to be God, that can be in all conceived by man.

I have been already over-long, to make any large discourse either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine own excuse: especially in the excuse of this or that passage; seeing the whole is exceeding weak and defective. Among the grossest, the unsutable division of the books, I could not know how to excuse, had I not been directed to enlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the first part finished. All men know that there is no great Art in the dividing evenly of those things, which are subject to number and measure. For the rest, it sutes well enough with a great many Books of this Age, which speak too much, and yet say little; Ipsi nobis turto subducimur; We are stolen away from our selves, setting a high price on all that is our own. But hercof, though a late good Writer make complaint, yet shall it not lay hold on me, because I beleeeve as he doth; That who so thinks himself the wisest man, is but a poor and miserable ignorant. Those that are the best men of war, against all the vanities and fooleries of the World, do al- ways keep the strongest guards against themselves, to defend them from them- selves; from self love, self estimation, and self opinion.

Generally concerning the order of the Worke, I have onely taken counsell from the Argument. For of the Assyrians, which after the down-fall of Babel take up the first part, and were the first great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of posterity: some few enterprises, greater in fame than faith, of Ninus and Semiramis, excepted.

It was the story of the Hebrews, of all before the Olympiads, that overcame the consuming disease of time, and preserved it self from the very cradle and be- ginning

gining to this day: and yet not so entire, but that the large discourses thereof (to which in many Scriptures we are referred) are no where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the actions of those Kings and Princes which shot up here and there in the same time, I am driven to relate by way of digression: of which we may say with Virgil:

Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto;

They appear here and there floating in the great gulf of time.

To the same first Ages do belong the report of many Inventions therein found, and from them derived to us; though most of the Authors Names have perished in so long a Navigation. For those Ages had their Laws; they had diversity of Government; they had Kingly rule; Nobility; Policy in war; Navigation, and all, or the most of needfull Trades. To speak therefore of these (seeing in a generall History we should have left a great deal of Nakedness, by their omission) it cannot properly be called a digression. True it is, that I have made also many others: which if they shall be laid to my charge, I must cast the fault into the great heap of humane error. For seeing we digresse in all the waies of our lives: yea, seeing the life of man is nothing else but digression; I may the better be excused, in writing their lives and actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Laws of History, and of the Kindes.

The same hath been taught by many, but by no man better, and with greater brevity, than by that excellent learned Gentleman Sir Francis Bacon. Christian laws are also taught us by the Prophets and Apostles; and every day preach't unto us. But we still make large digressions: yea, the Teachers themselves do not (in all) keep the path which they point out to others.

For the rest, after such time as the Persians had wrested the Empire from the Chaldeans, they had raised a great Monarchy, producing actions of more importance than were elsewhere to be found: it was agreeable to the Order of Story, to attend this Empire; whilst it so flourished, that the affairs of the Nations adjoining had reference therunto. The like observance was to be used towards the fortunes of Greece, when they again began to get ground upon the Persians; as also towards the affairs of Rome, when the Romans grew more mighty than the Greeks.

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations who resisted the beginnings of the former Empires, and afterwards became but parts of their composition and enlargement: it seemed best to remember what was known of them from their several beginnings, in such times and places as they in their flourishing estates opposed those Monarchies, which in the end swallowed them up. And herein I have followed the best Geographers: who seldom give names to those small brooks, whereof many, joyned together, make great Rivers; till such time as they become united, and run in main stream to the Ocean Sea. If the Phrase be weak, and the Stile not every-where like it self; the first shews their legitimation and true Parent; the second will excuse it self upon the Variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, gracili avena, used stronger pipes, when he sounded the wars of Aeneas. It may also be laid to my charge, that I use divers Hebrew words in my first book, and elsewhere; in which language others may think, and I my self acknowledge it, that I am altogether ignorant: but it is true, that some of them I finde in Montanus, others in Latine Character in S. Senensis; and of the rest I have borrowed the interpretation of some of my friends. But say I had been beholding to neither, yet were it not to be wondered at having had an eleven yeers leasure, to attain the knowledge of that, or of any other tongue ; Howsoever, I know that it will be said by many, That I might have been more pleasing to the Reader, if I had written the Story of mine own times, having been permitted to draw water as neer the Well-head as another. To this I answer, that who soever in writing a modern History, shall follow truth too neer the heels, it may haply strike out his teeth. There is no Mistresse or Guide, that hath led her followers and servants into greater miseries. He that goes after her too far off, loseth her sight, and loseth himself : and he that walks after her at a middle distance ; I know not whether I should call that kinde of course, Temper, or Baseness. It is true, that I never travelled after mens opinions, when I might have made the best use of them : and I have now too few dayes remaining, to imitate those, that either out of extreme ambition, or extreme cowardise, or both, do yet (when death hath them on his shoulders) flatter the world, between the bed and the grave. It is enough for me (being in that state I am) to write of the eldest times : wherein also why may it not be said, that in speaking of the past, I point at the present, and taxe the vices of those that are yet living, in their persons that are long since dead ; and have it laid to my charge ? But this I cannot help, though innocent. And certainly if there be any, that finding themselves spotted like the Tigers of old time, shall finde fault with me for painting them over anew, they shall therein accuse themselves justly, and me falsely.

For I protest before the Majesty of God, That I malice no man under the Sun. Impossible I know it is to please all : seeing few or none are so pleased with themselves, or so assured of themselves, by reason of their subjection to their private passions, but that they seem divers persons in one and the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so do I : Unus mihi pro populo erat : and to the same effect Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis, sed tibi ; (or as it hath since lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the resolution of an ancient Philosopher, Satis est unus, Satis est nullus. For it was for the service of that inestimable Prince Henry ; the successive hope, and one of the greatest of the Christian World, that I undertook this Work. It pleased him to peruse some part thereof, and to pardon what was amisse. It is now left to the World without a Master : from which all that is presented, hath received both blons and thanks : Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus : hic exitus est omnis iudicii, in quo lis secundum plures datur. But these discourses are idle. I know that as the charitable will judge charitably ; so against those, qui gloriantur in malitia, my present adversity hath disarmed me. I am on the ground already ; and therefore have not far to fall : and for rising again, as in the Naturall privization, there is no recession to habit ; so it is seldome seen in the privization politick. I do therefore forbear to stile my Readers Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beg their good opinions, or to promise a second and third volume (which I also intend) if the first receive grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough ; and too much : and it is certain, let us claw the Reader with never so many courteous phrases, yet shall we evermore be thought fools that write foolishly. For conclusion, all the hope I have lies in this, That I have already found more ungenile and uncourteous Readers of my Love towards them, and well-deserving of them, than ever I shall do again. For had it been otherwise ; I should hardly have had this leasure to have made my self a fool in print.

That the Invisible God is seen in his Creatures.

OD, whom the wisest men acknowledge to be a Power uneffable, and Vertue infinite, a Light by abundant claritie invisible; and Understanding which it self can onely comprehend, an Essence eternall and spirituall, of absolute purenesse and simplicity; was, and is pleased to make himself known by the work of the World: in the wonderfull magnitude wher-of, (all which he imbraceth, filleth and sustaineth) we behold the Image of that glory which cannot be measured, and withall that one, and yet universall Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glorious Lights of Heaven, we perceive a sha-

40 dow of his divine Countenance; in his mercifull provision for all that live, his manifold goodnes: and lastly, in creating and making existent the World universall, by the absolute Art of his own Word, his Power and Almightines; which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisedome, and Goodnes, being all but Attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part discern per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and variety of Celestiall and Terrestriall bodies: Terrestriall, in their strange and manifold diversities; Celestiall, in their beauty and magnitude; which in their continuall and contrary motions, are neither repugnant, intermixt, nor confounded. By these potent effects, we approach to the knowledge of the omnipotent cause, and by these motions, their Almighty Maker.

50 In these more than wonderfull works, God (saith * Hugo speaketh unto man, and it is true, that these be those discourses of God, whose effects, those that live, witness in themselves; the sensible, in their sensible natures; the reasonable, in their reasonable souls: for according to S. * Gregory; Omnis homo eo ipso quod rationalis conditus est, ex ipso rationalis, illum qui se condidit, Deum esse colligere debet; Every man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he which made him, is God. This God all men behold (saith Job) which is according to the Fathers, Dominacionem illius conspiceret in Creaturis, To discern him in his providence by his creatures. That God hath been otherwise seen, to wit, with corporal eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my understanding, ding, grounded on these places of S. John and S. Paul, re have not heard his voice at any time, neither have seen his shape. And again, in hominem non sum, nec can feci. And this I am sure agreeeth with the nature of Gods simplicity, of which S. Augustine, Ipse enim natura, vel substantia, vel quolibet alio nomine appellandum est, id ipsum quod Deus est, corporaliter videri non potest; That nature, or that substance, or by whatsoever name that is to be called which is God, whatsoever that be, the same cannot be corporally perceived. And of this opinion were Origen, Cyril, Chrysostome, Gregory Nazianzenus, Hieronimus, Augustine, Gregory the great, Evaristus, Alcuinus, Dionysius Areopagita, Aquinas, and all others of authority. But by his own Word, and by this visible World, is God perceived of men; which is also the understood language of the Almighty, vouchsafed to all his Creatures, whose Hieroglyphicall Characters are the unnumbered Stars, the Sun and Moon; written on these large Volumes of the Firmament: written also on the Earth and the Seas, by the letters of all those living creatures, and plants, which inhabit and reside therein. Therefore said that learned Cusanus, Mundus universus nihil aliud est, quam Deus explicatus; The World universall is nothing else but God exprest. And the invisible things of God (saith S. Paul) are seen by creation of the World, being considered in his creatures. Of all which, there was no other cause preceding, than his own Will, no other matter than his own Power, no other Workman than his own Word, no other consideration than his own infinite goodness. The example and pattern of these his Creatures, as he beheld the same in all eternity in the abundance of his own love, so was it at length in the most wise order, by his unchanged Will moved, by his high Wisdom disposed, and by his Almighty Power perfected, and made visible. And therefore (saith Mirandula) we ought to love God, ex fide, & ex effectibus; (that is) both persuaded by his Word, and by the effects of the Worlds Creation: Negz enim qui causa caret, ex causa & origine sciri, cognoscique potest, sed vel ex rerum, quae factae sunt, quaeque sunt & gubernantur observatione & collatione, vel ex ipsius Dei verbo: For he of whom there is no higher cause, cannot be known by any knowledge of cause or beginning (saith Montanus) but either by the observing and conferring of things, which he hath, or doth create and govern, or else by the word of God himself.

§. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose authority is not to be despised, have acknowledged the World to have been created by God.

His work and creation of the World, did most of the ancient and learned Philosophers acknowledge, though by divers terms, and in a different manner exprest. I mean all those who are intitled by S. Augustine, Summi Philosophi, Philosophers of highest judgment and understanding. Mercurius Trismegistus calleth God, Principium universorum; The original of the universall: to whom hee giveth also the attributes of Mchs, Natura, Aetns, Necessitas, Fimix, & Renovatio. And wherein hee truly with S. Paul, calleth upon God all powers, confessing also, that the World was made by Gods Almighty Word, and not by hands: Verbo, non manibus fabricatus est mundus. Zoroaster (whom Herodotus followed in opinion) took the word Fire, to expresse God by (as in Deuteronomy, and in S. Paul it is used) Omnia ex uno igne genita sunt; All things (saith he) are caused or produced out of one fire.

So did Orpheus plainly teach, that the World had beginning in time, from the Will of the most High God; whose remarkable words are thus converted: Cum abscondisset omnia Jupiter summus, deinde in lumen gratum emisit, ex sacro corde operans cogitata & mirabilia: Of which I conceive this sense: When great Jupiter had hidden all things in himself, working out of the love of his sacred heart, he sent thence, or brought forth into grateful light, the admirable works which he had fore-thought.

Pindarus the Poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledged also one God, the most High, to be the Father and Creator of all things: Unus Deus, Pater, Creator summus. PLATO calleth God the cause and original, the nature and reason of the universall: Totius rerum natura, causa, & origo Deus. But hereof more at large hereafter.

Now, although the curiosity of some men have found it superfluous, to remember the opinions of Philosophers in matters of Divinity: (it being true, that the Scripture hath hath not want of any forrain testimony) yet as the Fathers, with others excellently learned are my examples herein, so S. Paul himself did not despise, but thought it lawful and profitable, to remember whatsoever he found agreeable to the word of God among the Heathen, that he might thereby take from them all escape, by way of ignorance, God rendering vengeance to them that know him not: as in the Epistle to Titus he cryeth Epimenides against the Cretians, and to the Corinthians, Menander; and in the seventeenth of the Acts, Aratus &c. For, Truth (saith S. Ambrose by whomsoever uttered is of the holy Ghost: Veritas a quocumque dicitur, a spiritu sancto est: and lastly, let those kind of men learne this rule; Quae scribuntur, propheta non sunt; Nothing is prophane so that serveth to the use of holy things.

§. III.

Of the meaning of In Principio, Genes. 1. 1.

His visible world of which Moses writeth, God created in the beginning, or, first of all: in which (saith Tertullian) things began to be. This word Beginning (in which the Hebrews seeke some hidden mysterie, and which in the Jewes Targum is converted by the word Sapientia) cannot be referred to succession of time, nor to order, as some men have conceived, both which are sublequent: but only to Creation then. For before that Beginning, there was neither primarie matter to be informed, nor forme to informe, nor any being, but the Eternall. Nature was not, nor the next Parent of Time begotten, Time properly and naturally taken: for if God had but disposed of Matter already in being, then as the word Beginning could not be referred to all things, so must it follow, that the institution of Matter proceeded from a greater power, than that of God. And by what name shall we then call such an One (saith Lancianus) as exceedeth God in potency: for it is an act of more excellencie to make, than to dispose of things made? whereupon it may be concluded, that Matter could not be before this Beginning: except we faine a double creation, or allow of two powers, and both infinite, the impossibility whereof cometh defence. Nam impossibile plura esse infinita: quoniam Causae de Mente alterum esset in alio finitum; There cannot be more infinites than one: for one of them would limit the other.

§. IV.

Of the meaning of the words Heaven and Earth, Genes. 2. 1.

The Universal matter of the world (which Moses comprehendeth under the names of Heaven and Earth) is by divers diversly understood: for there are that conceive, that by those words was meant the first matter, as the Peripatetickes understand it; to which S. Augustine and Isidore seeme to adhere. Fecisti mundum (saith S. Augustine) de materia informi, quam fecisti de nulla re, penè nullam rem: that is, I have made the world of a matter without forme; which matter then made of nothing, and being made, it was little other than nothing.

But this potential and imaginative materia prima, cannot exist without forme. Peter Lombard, the Schoolemen, Beck, Lyranus, Comestor, Tostatus, and others affirme that it pleased God first of all to create the Emphyrean Heaven: which at the succeeding instant (saith Beda and Strabo) he filled with Angels. This Emphyrean Heaven Stenchi Eugubinus Beda Hex. Strabo calleth Divine clarity, and uncreated: an error, for which he is sharply charged by Eug. Cos. & de Paverius, though (as I conceive) he rather failed in the subsequent, when he made it to be a place, and the seat of Angels and just soules, than in the former affirmation: for of the first, That God liveth in eternall Light, it is written; Mysende, praise thou the Lord Psal. 104. 12. that covereth himselfe with light: and in the Revelation; and the City hath no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it: for the glory of God did light it. And herein also it, sed sapientia John Mercer upon Genesis, differeth not in opinion from Eugubinus: for as by Heaven created, created in the beginning, was not meant the invisible or supercelestial, so in his judgement, because it was in all eternitie the glorious fire of God himselfe, it was not necessary to be created; Quem mundum super calistem meo judicio creari (saith Mercer) non erat necesse.

But as Moses forbore to speake of Angels, and of things invisible and incorporate, for the the weakness of their capacities, whom he then cared to inform of those things which were more manifest, (to wit) that God did not only by a strong hand deliver them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promise made to their forefathers; but also that he created, and was the sole cause of this aspectable and perceivable Universe: so on the other side I dare not thinke, that any supercelestial Heaven, or whatsoever else (not himselfe) was increate and eternal: and as for the place of God before the world created, the finite wisdom of mortal men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the seat of infinite power, no more than infinite power it self can be limited: for his place is in himselfe, whom no magnitude else can containe: How great is the house of God (saith Baruch) how large is the place of his possessions, it is great, and hath no end, it is high and unmeasurable.

But leaving multiplicity of opinion, it is more probable and allowed, that by the words Heaven and Earth, was meant the solid matter and substance, aswell of all the Heavens, and Orbs supernal, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which covered it over, (to wit) that very matter of all things, matéria, Chaos, possibilis, sine posse fieri. Which matter (saith Calvin) was so called, quod totius mundi semen fuerit; Because it was the seed of the Universal: an opinion of ancient Philosophers long before.

§. V.

That the substance of the waters, as mixt in the body of the earth, is by Moses understood in the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the attributes of unformed and void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

Moses first nameth Heaven and Earth (putting waters but in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word Earth; but afterwards he nameth them apart, when God by his Spirit began to distinguish the confused Masse, and (as Basil saith) preparare naturam aque ad fecunditatem vitalem; to prepare the nature of water to a vital fruitfulness.

For under the word Heaven, was the matter of all heavenly bodies, & natures exprest: and by the name of Earth and Waters, all was meant, whatsoever is under the Moon, and subject to alteration. Corrupt seeds bring forth corrupt plants; so which the pure heavens are not subject, though subject to perishing. They shall perish (saith David) and the heavens shall vanish away like smoke. Neither were the waters the matter of Earth: for it is written, Let the waters under the heavens be gathered into one place, and let the dry land appear: which proveth, that the dry land was mixt and covered with the waters and not yet distinguished; but no way, that the waters were the matter or seed of the Earth, much lesse of the Universal. Initio in Domine terram fundisti, Thou, O Lord, in the beginning hast founded the Earth: and againe, The Earth was covered with the Deep meaning with waters; as with a garment; saith David. And if by natural arguments it may be proved, that water by condensation may become earth, the same reason teacheth us also, that earth rarified may become water: water, aire, fire; and so on the contrary. Dens ignis substantiam per ævum in aquam convertit, God turneth the substance of fire by aire into water. For the Heavens and the Earth remained in the same state, in which they were created, as touching their substance, though there was afterwards added multiplicity of perfection, in respect of beauty and ornament. Cælum verò & terra in statu creationis remanserunt quantum ad substantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis postmodum superaddita est. And the word which the Hebrews call Mayim, is not to be understood according to the Latine translation simply, and as specificall water; but the same more properly significth liquor. For (according to Montanus) Est autem Mayim liquor geminus, & hoc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero aquas fecit. For Mayim (saith he) is a double liquor (that is, of divers natures) and this so name or word the Latines, wanting a voyce to expresse it, call it in the plural, Aquas, Waters.

This Masse, or indigested matter, or Chaos created in the beginning, was without forme, that is, without the proper forme, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had separated the Earth, and digested it from the waters. And the Earth was void: that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, fruits, or flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and wrought this indigested matter into that form, which it now retaineth, then did the earth bud forth the beards, which feedeth seeds, and the fruitful tree according to his kinde, and God saw that it was good; which attribute was not given to the Earth, while it was confused; nor to the Heavens, before they had motion, and adornment. God saw that it was good; that is, made perfect: for perfection is that to which nothing is wanting. Et perfecti Dei perfecta sunt opera; The works of the perfect God, are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect Matter had the ancient Poets their invention of Demogorgon; Hefiodus and Anaxagoras the knowledge of that Chaos: of which Ovid;

Ante Mare, & Terras, & (quod regit omnia) Cælum,

Unus erat toto nature vultus in Orbe,

Quem dixere Chaos, rudis indigestaque moles.

Ovid in Met. lib. 1.

Before the Sea and Land was made, and Heaven, that all doth hide,

In all the World one only face of Nature did abide:

Which Chaos hight, a huge rude heap.

§. VI.

How it is to be understood, that the Spirit of God moved upon the waters, and that this is not to be searched curiously.

After the Creation of Heaven and Earth, then void and without form, the Spirit of God moved upon the Waters. The Seventy Interpreters use the word superferebatur, moved upon or over: incubabat, or fovebat (saith Hierome) out of Basil; and Basil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non meam tibi, sed viri cuiusdam Syri sententiam recensebo (saith Basil Hæmam. Basil;) which words incubare or fovere, importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, have a special likenesse. Verbum translatus est ab avibus pulitica sue incubantibus, quoniam spirituali, & plane inenarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of birds: hatching their young, not corporally, but in a spiritual and unexpressible manner.

Some of the Hebrews convert it to this effect, Spiritus Dei volitabat; The Spirit of God did flutter: the Chaldaean Paraphrast in this sense. Ventus à conspectu Dei sufflavit: or as other understand the Chaldaean, Flabat, pellebat, removebat: The wind from the face of God did blow under, drive, or remove, or did blow upon; according to the 147 Psalme, He caused his winde to blow, and the waters increase: but there was yet no winde nor exhaling. Arias Montanus in these words, Et Spiritus Elohimi Merachsefer, id est, efficaciter moti-ans, convulsus, ac agitant super facies gentium liquoris; The Spirit of God effectually and often moving, keeping warm, and cherishing, quickning and stirring upon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh four originals, whereof three are agents, and the last passive and material, to wit, Causa, which is the divine goodness: Jehi, which is, fiat, sine erit, Let it be, or it shall be. Que vox verbo Dei prima prolata fuit: Which voice (saith he) was the first that was uttered by the Word of God. The third, Spiritus Elohimi, the Spirit of God, id est, vis quædam divina, agilis ac presens, per omnia pertingens, omnia complexus; that is, A certain divine power, or strength everywhere, active and extending, and stretching through all, filling and finishing all things. The fourth he calleth Matum, id est, materies ad omnem rem conficiendam habilis; Matter apt to become every thing. For my self, I am resolved (Cùm Deus sit supernaturalis omni ratione; Seeing God is in all reason above reason) that although the effects which follow his wonderful waies of working, may in a measure be perceived by mans understanding, yet the manner and first operation of his divine power, cannot be conceived by any minde, or spirit, compassed with a mortal body. Animalis homo que Dei sunt, non percipit: For my thoughts (saith the Lord in Esa) are not your thoughts, neither are your waies my waies. And as the world hath not known God himself: so are his waies (according to S. Paul) past finding out. O righteous Father, the world hath not known thee, saith Christ. And therefore, whether that motion, vitality and operation, were by incubation or how else, the manner is onely known to God. Quomodo in omnibus sit rebus vel per essentiam, vel per potentiam, intellectus noster non capit; For, how God (saith S. Augustine, speaking of his Ubiquity) is in all things, either by essence, presence, or power, our understanding cannot comprehend. Nihil inter Deum hominemque distaret, si consilia, & dispositiones illius Majestatis eterne, cogitatio assequeretur humanis: There would be no difference between God and man, if man's understanding could conceive the counsels and disposing of that eternal Majesty; and therefore to be over-curious in searching how the all-powerful Word of God wrought in the Creation of the World, or his all-piercing and operative spirit distinguishing, gave form to the Matter of the Universal, is a labour and search like unto his, who not contented with a known and safe Foord, will presume to pass over the greatest River in all parts, where he is ignorant of their depths: for so doth the one lose his life, and the other his understanding. We behold the Sun, and enjoy his light, as long as we look towards it, but tenderly, and circumspectly: we warm our selves safely, while we stand near the fire; but if we seek to out-face the one, to enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt.

But to eschew curiosity: this is true, that the English word (moved) is most proper and significant: for of motion proceedeth all production, and all whatsoever is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truly called, Principium motus, 10 and with Miracula, Vis cause efficientis, The force of the efficient cause; S. Augustine sometimes taketh for the holy Ghost; sometimes for a wind or breath, Sub nomine Spiritus, under the name of a Spirit, which is sometimes so taken: or for virtualis creatura, For a created virtuality: Tertullian and Theodore call it also a breath or wind: Mercurius nameth it, Spiritum tenuem intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible Spirit: Anaxagoras, Mentem: Tostatus, Voluntatem & mentem Dei; The will and minde of God; which wens, Plato in Timæo, maketh Animam mundi, The soule of the world: and in his sixth Book de Republica, he calleth it the Law of Heaven; in his Epistles, The Leader of things to come, and the presence of things past. But as Cyprian wrote of the incarnation of Christ our Saviour, Mens deficit, vox silet, & non mea tantum, sed etiam Angelorum; My minde faileth, 20 my voice is silent, and not mine only, but even the voice of Angels: so may all men else say in the understanding and utterance of the waies and works of the Creation; for to him (saith Nazianzenus) there is not one substance by which he is, and another, by which he can, Sed consubstantialis illi est, quicquid ejus est, & quicquid est; Whatsoever attribute of him there is, and whatsoever be it, it is the very same substance that himself is.

Nazian. lib. 2.
Theol.

But the Spirit of God which moved upon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or wind, nor for any other creature, separate from the infinite active power of God, which then formed and distinguished, and which now sustaineth, and giveth continuance to the Universal. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all the worlds, and the same is it which maintaineth all things, saith Solomon. If thou send forth thy Spirit (saith David) they 30 are created: And Gregory, Deus suo presentialis esse, dat omnibus rebus esse, ita quod si se rebus subtraheret, sicut de nihilo facta sunt omnia, sic in nihilum deficerent universa; God giveth being to all things, by being present with all things, so as if he should withdraw himself from them, then as of nothing the world was made, it would again fall away and vanish into nothing. And this working of Gods Spirit in all things, Virgil hath exprest excellently:

Virg. Æneid.
lib. 8. 724.

*Principio Cælum ac Terras, camposque liquentes, Lucentemq; globum Lunæ, Titaniaq; astra,
Spiritus intus alit: totamq; insula per artem,
Mens agit atq; molem, & magno se corpore miscet.*

The Heaven, and Earth, and all the liquid Mayn,
The Moons bright Globe, and Stars Titanian,
A Spirit within maintains: and their whole mass,
A mind, which through each part insus'd doth pass,
Fashions, and works, and wholly doth transpierce
All this great Body of the Universe.

Job c. 26. v. 13.

And this was the same Spirit, which moved in the Universal, and thereby both distinguished and adorned it. His Spirit hath garnished the Heavens, saith Job. So then the Spirit of God moved upon the waters, and created in them their spirituality, and natural motion; motion brought forth heat; and heat rarification, and subtilty of parts. By this Spirit (which gave heat and motion, and thereby, operation to every nature, while 40 it moved upon the waters, which were in one indigested lump, and Chaos, disposed to all forms alike) was begotten Aire: an element superiour, as lighter than the waters, through whose vast, open, subtile, Diaphanick, or transparent body, the light afterwards created, might easily transpierce: Light for the excellency thereof being the first creature which God called good, whose creation immediately followed. This Spirit Chrysostome calleth a vital Operation. Agens à Deo instans, ex qua aqua non solum motiorem, sed & vim procreantia animalia habuerint. He calleth it, A vital Operation given by God unto the waters, whereby the waters had not onely motion, but also power to procreate or bring forth living Creatures.

§. VII.

§. VII.

Of the light created, as the material substance of the Sun, and of the nature of it, and diffusion of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and use of it: and of motion, and heat annexed unto it.

These waters were afterwards congregated, and called the Sea: and this Light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and united, and called the Sun, the Organ and Instrument of created light. For this first and dispersed light did not (as I conceive) distinguish the night from the day, but with a reference to the Suns creation, and the uniting of the dispersed light therein. This is proved by these words, 10 Let there be lights in the Firmament, to separate the day from the night: which lights in the Firmament of Heaven, were also made for signes, and for seasons, and for daies, and for years, implying a motion instantly to follow, by which, daies and years are distinguished; after which succeeded time, or together with which, that Time (which was the measure of motion) began. For that space of the first three daies which preceded the Suns creation, or formal perfection, when as yet there was not any motion to be measured, and the day named in the fifth Verse; was but such a space, as afterwards by the Suns motion made a civil or natural day. And as Waters were the matter of Aire, of the firmament, and of the lower and upper waters, and of the Seas, and Creatures therein: Earth, the matter of Beasts, Plants, Minerals, and Mans body: so may Light 20 (for exprefion sake) be called the Chaos, or material substance of the Sun, and other lights of heaven: Howbeit, neither the Sun, nor any thing sensible, is that light it self. Quæ causa est lucidorum, quæ est causa quæ things are lightsome (though it make it self Lux dicitur, quæ se, & omnia visibilia facit. Cusan. in Compens. cap. 7. & exercit. lib. 5.) but a body most illighted, which illuminateth the Moon, by whom the neighbouring Region (which the Greeks call Aether, the place of the supposed Element of fire) is affected and qualified, and by it all bodies living in this our aire. For this light Avicenna calleth vehiculum & fomentum omnium celestium virtutum, & impressiorem: The conductor, and preserver, or nourisher of all celestiall virtues and impressions, nothing depending of heavenly influences, but by the medium, or means of light. Aristotle calleth light a quality, inherent, or cleaving to a Diaphanous body, 30 Lumen est qualitas inherens Diaphano: but this may be better avouched of the heat, which it transporteth and bringeth with it, or conducteth: which heat (say the Platonicks) Absente lumine residet in subjecto, The light being departed, doth reside in the subject, as warmth in the air, though the same be deprived of light. This light Platonius and all the Academicks make incorporal, and so doth Montanus, Cui nec duritia resistit, nec spatium; Which neither hardness resisteth, nor space leaveth.

Aristotle findeth corporality in the beams of light; but it is but by way of repetition of other mens opinions, saith Picolomineus. Democritus, Leucippus, and Epicurus, give materiality to light it self, but improperly: for it passeth at an instant from the Heaven to the Earth, nor is it resisted by any hardness, because it pierceth through the solid body of glaſs, or other Crystalline matters; and whereas it is withstood by unclean and unpure earthy substances, less hard, and more easie to invade then the former, the same is, Quid obſtaculum naturæ terrenæ atq; fordium, non capit candidam luminis puritatem: Because an obstacle by nature earthy and foule, doth not receive the pure clearness of light: alluding to that most divine Light, which only shineth on those minds, which are purged from all worldly dross, and humane uncleannesses.

But of this created light, there is no agreement in opinion; neither do I marvel at it, for it cannot be found either in the Fathers, Philosophers, or School-men, or other ancient or later Writers, that any of them understood either it or themselves therein: 40 all men (to cast off ignorance) have disputed thereof, but there is no man that hath been taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferior to any in wit) as he hath shewed little strength of argument in refuting the opinions of Beda, Hugo, Lombard, Lyranus, and others: so is his own judgement herein, as weak as any mans; and most of the School-men were rather curious in the nature of terms, and more subtile in distinguishing upon the parts of doctrine already laid down, than discoverers of any thing hidden, either in Philosophy or Divinity: of whom it may be truly said, Nihil sapientie odiosius acuminis nimio; Nothing is more odious to true wisdom, than too acute sharpness. Neither hath the length of time, and the search of many learned men, (which the same time hath brought brought forth and devoured) resolved us, whether this light be substantial, corporal, or incorporeal: Corporal they say it cannot be, because then it could neither pierce the aire, nor thofe hard, folid, and Diaphanous bodies; which it doth, and yet every day we fee the aire illightned: incorporeal it cannot be, because it fometime affecteth the fight of the eye with offence, and therefore by moft of the Fathers fo esteemed. Others fay (as Patricius) that it cannot be matter, becaufe no form fo excellent as it felt to inform it: neither can it be any accident, which is not feparable without the destruction of the fubject: for light being taken from the Sun, the Sun is no more the Sun in exiftence. Secondly, if light were proceeding from matter and forme, then either, or both mult be one of thefe, lucide or bright, darke or opake, Diaphanous or transparent; but darkenneffe cannot be parent of light; and things Diaphanous (being neither light, nor darkenneffe, but capable of either) cannot be the caufe of either, and therefore mult the matter, or form, or both, be lucide and fhining. Lucide and fhining obtaine their fo being of the lights; and therefore, if wee derive this being of light from a former, then would the progreffe goe on infinitely and againft nature; and therefore he concludeth that light in the Sun hath his being primarily, and immediately of it felfe, and is therefore the Suns form, and the form of all lucide and fhining bodies: but what is taught hereby, let others judge.

Lucida corpora sunt plena sua luce, alienis tenebris impervia. Opaca sunt plena suis tenebris aliena lumine. Transparencia seu Diaphana, carent suis et lumine et tenebris: alienis et lumine et tenebris permeantur. Scilicet, sub. ex. 71.

But in my understanding, Lumen (which may be Englifhed by the word Shine) is an intentional Species of that, which may be Englifhed by Light, and fo, this fhining which proceedeth from the Sun, or other lights of Heaven, or from any other light, is an Image, or intentional Species thereof; and an intentional Species may be understood by example of a red, or green colour, occasioned by the fhining of the Sun through red or green glaffe: for then we perceive the fame colour caft upon any thing oppofite; which redneffe or other colour, we call the intentional Species of the colour in that glaffe. And again, as this light, touching his fimple nature, is no way yet understood: fo it is difpured, whether this light firft created, be the fame which the Sun inholdeth and cafteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer than til the Suns creation.

But by the moft wife and unchanged order, which God observed in the works of the World, I gather, that the Light, in the firft day created, was the fubftance of the Sun: for Mofes repeateth twice the maine parts of the Univerfal: firft, as they were created in matter; fecondly, as they were adorned with forme: firft, naming the Heavens, the Earth, the Waters, all confused; and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made drie Land, and the Heavens diftinguifhed from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, was earth, before it was uncovered, and before it was called Arida, or drie Land; and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or enriched with their vidual formes: So the Sun although it had not his formal perfection, his circle, beauty, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day; yet was the fubftance thereof in the firft day (under the name of Light) created; and this Light formerly difperfed, was in the fame fourth day united, and fet in the Firmament of Heaven: for, to Light created in the firft day God gave no proper place or fixation; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation, (which was to feparate day from night) were precifely performed, after this Light was congregated and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wifedom of God finde caufe why it fhould move (by which motion, days and nights are diftinguifhed) till then: becaufe there was not yet any Creature produced, to which, by moving, the Sun might give light, heate and operation.

But after the Earth (diftinguifhed from Waters) began to bud forth the bud of the herbe, &c. God caufed the Sun to move, and (by enterchange of time) to vifite every part of the inferiour world; by his heate to ftir up the fire of generation, and to give activity to the feeds of all natures: For, as a King, which commandeth fome goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the fame to that ufe and end, to which it was ordained; fo it pleased God (faith Procopius) to command the Light to be; which by his all-powerful Word he approved, and approving it, difpofed thereof, to the ufe and comfort of his future Creatures.

But in that it pleased God to alke of Job, By what way is the light parted, and where is the way where light dwelleth? we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not under man's understanding; and therefore let it fuffice, that by God's grace we enjoy the effects fects thereof. For this light is of the treasure of God (faith Esdras): And those which inhabit the Heavens, do only know the Essence thereof. Nihil ignotum in celo, nihil notum in terra: Nothing unknowne in Heaven, nothing perfectly known on earth. Res vero sunt in mundo invisibiles; in mundo visibiles umbræ rerum: Things themselves are in the invisible world, in the world visible, but their shadowes. Surely, if this Light be not spiritual; yet it approacheth nearest unto spiritualitie; and it fite have any corporalitie, then of all other the moft fubtile and pure; for howfoever, it is of all things feen, the moft beautiful, and of the fwiftelt motion, of all other the moft neceffary and beneficiall. For it miniftreth to men, and other creatures, all celestiall influences; it difpatcheth thofe fad thoughts and sorrowes, which the darkenneffe both begetteth and maintaineth; it difcovereth unto us the glorious works of God, and carrieth up with an Angelical fwiftneffe, our eyes unto Heaven, that by the fight thereof, our minds being informed of his vifible marvails, may continually travail to furmount these perceived Heavens, and to finde out their omnipotent Cause and Creator. Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis; Our knowledge doth not fift. quiescit in rebus creatis. Et ipsa lux facit, ut cetera mundi membra digna sint laudibus, cum suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicat; It is the Light (faith Saint Ambrose) that maketh the other parts of the world fo worthy of praife, seeing that it felfe communicateth its goodneffe and beauty unto all. Of which Ovid out of Orpheus:

*Ille ego sum, qui longum metior annum,
Omnia qui video, per quem videt omnia mundus,

Ovid. Met. lib. 1.

The World difcerns it felfe, while I the World behold,
By me the longeft years, and other times are told,
I the worlds eye.

Laftly, if we may behold in any creature, any one fparke of that eternall fire, or any far-off dawning of Gods glorious brightneffe, the fame in the beauty, motion, and virtue of this Light, may be perceived. Therefore was God called Lux ipsa, and the Light, by Hermes named Lux sancta, and Christ our Saviour faid to be that Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. Yet in refpect of Gods incomprehensible fublimitie, and puritie, this is alfo true, that God is neither a minde, nor a Spirit of the nature of other fpirits; nor a light, fuch as can be difcerned. Deus profecto non mens est, at verum sit mens causa est; nec spiritus, sed causa quæ spiritus extat; nec lumen, sed causa quæ lumen existit: God (faith Hermes in Poemandro) certainly is not a minde, but the cause that the minde hath his being; nor spirit, but the cause by which every spirit is; nor light, but the cause by which the light existeth.

So then the Mais and Chaos being firft created, void, dark, and unformed, was by the operative Spirit of God, pierced and quickned; and the Waters, having now received Spirit and motion, resolved their thinner parts into Aire, which God illightned: the Earth alfo by being contiguous, and mixt with waters (participating the fame divine virtue) brought forth the bud of the hearb that feedeth seed &c. and for a mean and organ, by which this operative virtue might be continued, God appointed the Light to be united, and gave it alfo motion and heat, which heat caufed a continuance of thofe feveral Species, which the Earth (being made fruitfull by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begat the time and times fucceeding.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any Crystalline Heaven, or any Primum mobile.

After that the Spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and light was created, God faid, Let there be a Firmament in the middest of the waters, and let it feparate the waters from the waters: that is, thofe waters which by rarification and evaporation were afcended, and thofe of the Earth and Sea.

But these waters feparate above this extension, which the Latine Translation calleth Firmamentum, or expansum (for fo Vatablus, Pagninus, and Junius turne it) are not the Crystalline Heavens created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Basilus Magnus calleth a childifh fuppofition, making in the fame place many learned arguments againft against this infancie. For the waters above the firmament, are the waters in the ayre above us, where the same is more solid and condense, which God separated from the neather waters by a firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space: the words Raquia, which Montanus writeth Rakia, and Shamajim, being indifferently taken for the heaven and for ayre, and more properly for the ayre and Aether, than for the heavens, as the best Hebricians understand them, Quo suprema ac tenuia ab infimis crassius diducuntur, intersected; distant, for that whereby the supreme and thin bodies were placed in distance, being severed and cut off from low and grosse matters: and the waters above the firmament, exprest in the word Majim, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters above the ayre, or in the uppermost region of the same.

And that the word Heaven is used for the Ayre, the Scriptures every where witness; as in the blessings of Joseph, and in the 104 Psalm: * By these Springs shall the fowle of the Heaven dwell; and upon Sodome and Gomorrah it rained brimstone and fire out of the Heaven; and in Isaacs blessing to Jacob: God give thee therefore of the dew of Heaven: and in Deuteronomy the 11. But the land whither you go to possess it, is a land that drinketh water of the rayne of Heaven; and in Job. Who hath ingendered the frosts of Heaven; and in S. Matthew, Behold the Fowles of Heaven, for they sow not. So as in all the Scriptures of the Old Testament throughout, is the word Heaven very often used for Ayre, and taken also hyperbolically for any great height, as, Let us build us a Tower, whose top may reach to Heaven &c. And in this very place Basil avoucheth, that this appellation of Heaven for the Firmament, is but by way of similitude: his owne words be these; Et vocavit Deus firmamentum celum. Hæc appellatio alii quidem propriè accommodatur, huic autem nunc ad similitudinem; And God called the firmament Heaven: This appellation (saith Basil) is properly applied to another (that is to the Starrie Heaven) but to this (that is, to the Firmament dividing the waters) it is imposed by similitude. And if there were no other proofe, that by the firmament was meant the Ayre, and not the Heaven, the words of Moses in the eighth verse, conferred with the same word Firmament in the twentieth verse, make it manifest: for in the eighth verse it is written, that God called the Firmament, which divided waters from waters, Heaven; and in the twentieth verse he calleth the Firmament of Heaven, Ayre in these words: And let the Fowle flye upon the earth in the open firmament of Heaven. And what use there should be of this ycie or crystalline, or waterie Heaven, I conceive not, except it be to moderate and temper the heate, which the primum mobile would otherwise gather and increase: though in very truth, instead of this help, it would add an unmeasurable greatnes of circle, whereby the swiftnesse of that first Moveable would exceed all possibilitie of belief. Sed nemo tenetur ad impossibilia; but no man ought to be held to impossibilities: and faith it self (which surmounteth the height of all humane reason) hath for a forcible conductor, the Word of Truth, which also may be called lumen omnis rationis & intellectus; the light of all reason and understanding. Now that this supposed first Moveable, turneth it selfe so many hundred thousand miles in an instant (seeing the Scriptures teach it not) let those that can beleve mens imagination, apprehend it, for I cannot. But of these many Heavens, let the Reader that desireth satisfaction, search Orontius, and of this waterie Heaven, Basilus Magnus, in his Hexam. fol. 40, 41 &c. and Matth. Beroaldus, his second Book and sixt chapter. For my selfe, I am perswaded, that the waters called, The waters above the Heavens, are but the clouds and waters engendered in the uppermost ayre.

A conclusion, repeating the summe of the works in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter, The forming of it, The finishing of it.

TO conclude, it may be gathered out of the first Chapter of Genesis, that this was the order of the most wise God in the beginning, and when there was no other nature, or being, but Gods incomprehensible eternitie. First, hee created the matter of all things: and in the first three dayes he distinguished and gave to every nature his proper forme; the forme of levitie to that which ascended; to that which descended, the form of gravitie: for he separated light from darkenesse, divided waters from waters, and gathered the waters under the firmament into one place. In the last three three dayes, God adorned, beautified, and replenished the World: he set in the Firmament of Heaven, the Sun, Moone, and Stars; filled the Earth with Beasts, the Aire with Fowle, and the Sea with Fish, giving to all that have life a power generative, thereby to continue their Species and kindes; to Creatures vegetative and growing, their feeds in themselves; for he created all things, that they might have their being: and the generation of the world are preserved.

That Nature is no Principium per se; nor Forme the giver of being: and of our ignorance how second causes should have any proportion with their effects.

AND for this working power, which we call Nature, the beginning of motion and rest, according to Aristotle, the same is nothing else, but the strength and faculty, which God hath infused into every creature, having no other selfe-ability, than a Clocke, after it is wound up by a mans hand, hath. These therefore that attribute unto this faculty, any first or sole power, have therein no other understanding, than such a one hath, who looking into the Stern of a Ship, and finding it guided by the Helme and Rudder, dorch ascribe some absolute vertue to the peece of wood, without all consideration of the hand that guides it, or of the judgement, which also directeth and commandeth that hand: forgetting in this and in allelle, that by the vertue of the first act, all Agents worke whatsoever they worke: Virtute primi actus agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt: for as the minde of man seeth by the Organ of the eye, heareth by the eares, and maketh choyce by the will: and therefore we attribute sight to the eye, and hearing to the eares, &c. and yet it is the minde only, that giveth ability, life, and motion to all these his instruments and Organs; so God worketh by Angels, by the Sun, by the Starres, by Nature, or infused properties, and by men as by severall Organs, severall effects; all second causes whatsoever, being but instruments, conduites, and pipes, which carry and disperse what they have received from the head and fountaine of the Univerfall. For as it is Gods infinite power, and everiewhere presence (compassing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giveth to the Sun power to draw up vapours, to vapours to be made clouds, cloudes to containe rain, and rain to fall: so all second and instrumentall causes, together with Nature it selfe, without that operative faculty which God gave them, would become altogether silent, vertuelesse, and dead: of which excellently ORPHEUS; Per te virescunt omnia, All things by thee spring forth in youth, full Greene. I enforce not these things, thereby to annihilate those variable vertues which God hath given to his creatures, animate and inanimate, to heavenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all his workes in their vertues prayse him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in, or with each other, which the Heathen Philosophers, and those that follow them have taken on them to teach: I say, there is not any one among them, nor any one among us, that could ever yet conceive it, or expresse it, ever enrich his owne understanding with any certaine truth, or ever edifie others (not foolishly by selfe-flattery) therein. For (saith Laërtius, speaking of the wisdom of the Philosophers) Si facultas inveniende veritatis huic studio subjaceret, aliquando esset inventa; cum vero tot temporibus, tot ingeniis in ejus inquisitione contritis, non sit comprehensa, apparet nullam ibi esse sapientiam; If in this studie (saith he) were meanes to find out the truth, it had ere this bin found out: but seeing it is not yet comprehended, after that so much time, and so many wits have been worn out in the inquiry of it, it appeareth, that there is no wisdom there to be had. Nam si de vi prædicta scientia haberetur, omnium rerum scientia necessario haberetur: If the precise knowledge of any one thing were to be had, it should necessarily follow, that the knowledge of all things were to be had. And as the Philosophers were ignorant in Nature, and the waies of her working: so were they more curious, than knowing, in their first matter and Physical form. For if their first matter had any being, it were not then the first matter: for, as it is the first matter, it hath onely a power of being, which it altogether leaveth, when it doth subsist. And seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor a substance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other substance should thence take consercence, it hath not been taught, neither are these formes (saith a learned Author) any thing, si ex ea exprimatur potentia, quæ nihil est. Again, how this first matter should be sub-jectum jeſum formarum, and paſſive, which is underſtood to precede the forme, it is hard to conceive: for to make form, which is the cauſe, to be ſubſequent to the thing cauſed (to wit, to the firſt matter) is contrary to all reaſon, divine and humane: only it may be ſaid, that originally there is no other difference between matter and forme, than between heate and fire, of which the one cannot ſubſiſt without the other, but in a kinde of rationall conſideration. Leaving therefore theſe Riddles to their Lovers, who by certain ſcholaiſtical diſtinctions wiew and pervert the truth of all things, and by which Ariſtole hath laboured to prove a falſe eternitie of the World, I thinke it farre ſafer to aſſume with Saint AUGUSTINE, That all ſpecies and kindes are from God, from whom, whatſoever is naturall proceedeth, of what kinde or eſtimation ſoever, from whence are the ſeeds of all formes, and the formes of all ſeeds and their motions; A quo eſt omnis ſpecies, a quo eſt quicquid naturaliter eſt, cuiuscuq; generis eſt, cuiuscuq; eſtimationis eſt, a quo ſunt ſemina formarum, formæ ſeminum, motus ſeminarum atq; formarum. And thus much Auerrois is forced to confeſſe, For all forms (ſaith he) are in primo motore; which is alſo the opinion of Ariſtole in the twelfth of his Metaph. and of Albericus upon Dionyſius.

Of Fate, and that the Starres have great influence: and that their operations may diverſly be prevented or furthered.

AND, as of Nature, ſuch is the diſpute and contention concerning Fate or Deſtiny, of which the opinions of thoſe learned men that have written thereof, may be ſafely received, had they not thereunto annexed and faſtened an inevitable neceſſity, and made it more general, and univerſally powerful than it is, by giving it Domini- on over the mind of man, and over his will, of which Ovid and Juvenal:

An error of the Chaldeans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharifees, Priſcillianiſts, the Bardianiſts, and others, as Baſil, Auguſtine, and Thomas have obſerved: but that Fate is an obedience of ſecond cauſes to the firſt, was well conceived of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platonist. Plotinus out of the Aſtronomers calleth it a diſpoſition from the acts of celeſtiall Orbs, unchangeably working in inferiour bodies, the ſame being alſo true enough, in reſpect of all thoſe things which a rational minde doth not order nor direct. Ptolomie, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chryſippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, ſome of them more largely, others more ſtrictly, aſcribe to Fate a binding and inevitable neceſſity; and that it is the ſame which is ſpoken and determined by God (quod de unoquoq; noſtrum fatum eſt Deus) and the definite lot of all living. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the Stars are inſtruments of far greater uſe, than to give an obſcure light, and for men to gaze on after Sun-ſet: it being manifeſt, that the diverſity of ſeaſons, the Winters, and Summers, more hot and cold, are not ſo uncertained by the Sun and Moon alone, who alway keep one and the ſame courſe, but that the Stars have alſo their working therein.

And if we cannot deny, but that God hath given vertues to Springs and Fountains, to cold earth, to plants and ſtones, Mineralls, and to the excrementall parts of the baſeſt living creatures, why ſhould we robbe the beautiful Starres of their working powers? for ſeeing they are many in number, and of eminent beauty and magnitude, we may not thinke, that in the treaſury of his wiſedom, who is infinite, there can be wanting (even for every Starre) a peculiar vertue and operation; as every herbe, plant, fruit, and flower adorning the face of the Earth, hath the like. For as theſe were not created to beautifie the earth alone, and to cover and ſhadow her duſtie face, but otherwiſe for the uſe of man and beaſt, to feed them and cure them; ſo were not thoſe uncountable glorious bodies ſet in the Firmament, to no other end, than to adorne it, but for inſtruments and Organs of his divine providence, ſo farre as it hath pleaſed his juſt will

to determine. Origen upon this place of Geneſis, Let there be light in the Firmament, &c. af- Gen. 1. 5. firmeth, that the Stars are not cauſes (meaning perchanſe binding cauſes); but are as open Books, wherein are contained and ſet down all things whatſoever to come; but not to be read by the eyes of humane wiſedom: which latter part I beleve well, and this ſaying of Syracides withall: That there are hid yet greater things than theſe be, and we have Eccl. 42. c. 32. ſeeme but a few of his workes. And though, for the capacity of men, we know ſomewhat, yet in the true and uttermoſt vertues of hearbs and plants, which our ſelves ſow and ſet, and which grow under our feet, we are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of celeſtiall bodies. For hardly (ſaith Solomon) can we diſcerne the things Wſl. 9. 16. that are upon the Earth, and with great labour finde we out thoſe things that are before us: who can then inveſtigate the things that are in Heaven? Multum eſt de rebus celeſtibus aliquid Ariſtole. cognoscere: It is much to know a little of heavenly things. But in this queſtion of Fate, the middle courſe is to be followed, that as with the Heathen wee doe not binde God to his creatures, in this ſuppoſed neceſſity of deſtiny; ſo on the contrary, we do not rob thoſe beautiful creatures of their powers and offices. For had any of theſe ſecond cauſes deſpoiled God of his prerogative, or had God himſelfe conſtrained the minde and will of man to impious acts by any celeſtiall inforcements, then ſure the impi- ous excuſe of ſome, were juſtifiable; of whom S. Auguſtine: Impi perverſitate in malis Aug. 20. ſuper factis rectiſſime reprehendendis ingerunt accuſandum potius auctorem ſyderum, quàm commiſſ. Gen. ad lin. ſorem ſcelerum. Where we reprehend them of evil deeds, they againe with wicked perverſeſſe urge, that rather the Author and Creator of the Stars, than the doer of the evil, it is to be accuſed.

But that the Stars and other celeſtiall bodies incline the will by mediation of the ſenſitive appetite, which is alſo ſtirred by the conſtitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted. Corpora celeſtia (ſaith DAMASCENE) conſtitunt in nobis habitus, complexi- Gal. 1. 12. et. ar. ones, & diſpoſitiones. The heavenly bodies (ſaith he) make in us habitus, complexion, and diſpoſitions. For the body (though Galen inforce it further) hath undoubtedly a kinde of drawing after it the affections of the minde, eſpecially bodies ſtrong in humour, and weak in vertues: for thoſe of cholericke complexions are ſubject to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they ſuffer themſelves to be tranſported, where the mind hath not reaſon to remember, that paſſions ought to be her Vaſſals, not her Ma- 30 ſters. And that they wholly direct the reaſonleſſe minde, I am reſolved: For all thoſe which were created mortall, as birds, beaſts, and the like, are left to their natural appetites; over all which, celeſtiall bodies (as inſtruments and executioners of Gods providence) have abſolute dominion. What we ſhould judge of men, who little differ from beaſts, I cannot tell: for as he that contendeth againſt thoſe inforcements, may eaſily prepared, putteth himſelfe altogether under the power of his ſenſuall appetite; Vincitur Quint. ſatum ſi reſiſtas, vincis ſi contempſeris: Fate will be overcome, if thou reſiſt it; if thou neglect it, it conquereth.

But that either the Stars or the Sun have any power over the mindes of men imme- 40 diately, it is abſurd to thinke, other than as aforeſaid, as the ſame by the bodies temper may be effected. Lumen ſolis ad generationem ſenſibilitum corporum conſert, & ad vitam ip- Aug. de Civit. ſam movet, & nutrit, & auget, & perſicit: The light of the Sun (ſaith *S. But howſoever we are by the Stars inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in Nature and Art, that encounter the ſame, and weaken their operations; and Ariſtole himſelfe confeſſeth, that the Heavens do not alwayes worke their effects in inferi- our bodies no more than the ſignes of raine and winde do alwayes come to paſſe. And it is divers times ſeene, that paternall vertue and vice hath his counter-working to theſe inclinations. Eſt in juvenis patrum virtus: In the young off-ſpring the Fathers vertue is, 30 and ſo the contrary, patrum vitia: and herein alſo there is often found an enterchange; the Sons of vertuous men, by an ill conſtellation become inclinable to vice, and of vici- ous men, to vertue.

Egredia est soboles scelerato nata parente :

A worthy son is borne of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after Gods reserved power) that so much setteth this art of influence out of square and rule, as education doth: for there are none in the World so wickedly inclined, but that a religious instruction and bringing up may fashion anew and reforme them; nor any so well disposed, whom (the reins being let loose) the continuall fellowship and familiarity, and the examples of dissolute men may not corrupt and deforme. Vessels will ever retain a favour of their first liquor: it being equally difficult either to cleanse the minde once corrupted, or to extinguish the sweet savour of vertue first received, when the minde was yet tender, open, and easily seasoned; but where a favourable constellation (allowing that the Stars incline the will) and a virtuous education doe happily arrive, or the contrary in both, thereby it is that men are found to exceeding virtuous or vicious, Heaven and Earth (as it were) running together and agreeing in one: for as the seeds of vertue may by the art and husbandry of Christian counsaile produce better and more beautiful fruit, than the strength of self-nature and Kind could have yeilded them; so the plants apt to grow wilde, and to change themselves into weeds, by being set in a soyle sutable, and like themselves, are made more unfavoury and filled with poyson. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapientis adjuvabit opus asporum, quemadmodum agricola terre naturam; A wise man assisteth the work of the Stars as the Husbandman helpeth the nature of the soyle. And Ptolemie himselfe confesseth thus much, Sapientis, & omnia sapientis medici dominabuntur astris; A wise man, and the omniscient art of a wise Physician shall prevayle against the Stars. Lastly, we ought all to know, that God created the Stars, as he did the rest of the Universal, whose influences may be called his reserved and unwritten Lawes. But let us consider how they bind: even as the Lawes of men doe; for although the Kings and Princes of the World have by their Lawes decreed, that a Thiefe and a Murderer shall suffer death; and though their Ordinances are daily by Judges and Magistrates (the Stars of Kings) executed accordingly; yet these Lawes doe not deprive Kings of their naturall or religious compassion, or binde them without prerogative, to such a severe execution, so as that there should be nothing left of liberty to judgment, power, or conscience: the Law in his owne nature, being no other than a deafe Tyrant. But seeing that it is otherwise, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) doe sometimes for causes to themselves knowne, and by mediation, pardon offences both against others and themselves, it were then impious to take that power and liberty from God himselfe, which his Substitutes enjoy; God being mercy, goodnesse, and charity itself. Otherwise that example of Prayer by our Saviour taught; And let us not be led into temptation, but deliver us from evill, had been no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which only knoweth the operation of his owne creatures truly) hath assured us, that there is no inclination or temptation so forcible, which our humble Prayers and Desires may not make frustrate and breake asunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceive) that Fate or Destiny, though depending upon eternall power, yet being once ordered and disposed, had such a connexion and immutable dependency, that God himself should in a kinde have but upon himselfe therein: How miserable then were the condition of men (saith S. Augustine) left altogether without hope.

And if this strength of the Stars were so transferred, as that God had quitted unto them all dominion over his creatures; be he Pagan or Christian that so beleeveth, the only true God of the one, and the imaginary gods of the other, would thereby be despoyled of all worship, reverence, or respect.

And certainly, God which hath promised us the reward of well-doing, which Christ so himself claimed at the hands of the Father, (I have finished the work which thou gavest mee to doe:) and the same God, who hath threatened unto us the sorrow and torment of offences, could not, contrary to his merciful nature, be so unjust, as to bind us inevitably to the Destinies or influences of the Stars, or subject our soules to any imposed necessity. But it was well said of Plotinus, that the Stars were significant, but not efficient, giving them yet something lesse than their due: and therefore as I doe not consent with them, who would make those glorious creatures of God vertuelesse: so I thinke that wee derogate from his eternall and absolute power and providence, to ascribe to them them the same dominion over our immortal soules, which they have over all bodily substances, and perishable natures: for the soules of men, loving and fearing God, receive influence from that divine light it self, whereof the Suns clarity, and that of the Stars, is by Plato called but a shadow. Lumen est umbra Dei, Deus est lumen luminis; Light is the shadow of Gods brightness, who is the light of light: But to end this question, because this Destiny, together with Providence, Prefcience, and Predetermination, are often confounded, I thinke it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two; for every man hath not observed it, though all learned men have.

§. XII.

Of Prefcience.

Prefcience, or fore-knowledge (which the Greeks call Prognosis, the Latines præcognitio, or præscientia) considered in order and nature (if we may speak of God after the manner of men) goeth before Providence: for God fore-knew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Prefcience is no other than an infallible fore-knowledge. For whatsoever our selves fore-know, except the same be to succeed accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Prefcience of God (as it is Prefcience only) is not the cause of any thing futurely succeeding: neither doth Gods fore-knowledge impose any necessity, or binde. For in that we fore-know that the Sun will rise, and set; that all men born in the World shall die again; that after Winter, the Spring shall come; after the Spring, Sommer and Harvest; and that according to the several seeds that we sow, we shall reap several sorts of grain; yet is not our fore-knowledge the cause of this, or any of these: neither doth the knowledge in us binde or constrain the Sun to rise and set, or men to die; for the causes (as men perwade themselves) are otherwise manifest and known to all. The eye of man (saith Boetius) beholdeth those things subject to sense, as they are; the eye seeth that such a beast is an horse, it seeth men, trees, and houses, &c. but our seeing of them (as they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such they be in their own natures. And again out of the same Author; Divina providentia rebus generandis non imponit necessitatem, quia si omnia evenirent ex necessitate, premia bonorum, & pœna malorum periret; Divine Providence (saith he) imposeth no necessity upon things that are to exist; for if all come to pass of necessity, there should neither be reward of good, nor punishment of evil.

§. XIII.

Of Providence.

NOW Providence (which the Greeks call Provoia) is an intellectual knowledge, both fore-seeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not onely behold all past, all present, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which Prefcience (simply taken) is not: and therefore Providence by the Philosophers (saith S. Augustine) is divided into Memory, Knowledge, and Care: Memory of the past; Knowledge of the present, and Care of the future: and we our selves account such a man for provident, as, remembering things past, and observing things present, can by judgement, and comparing the one with the other, provide for the future, and times succeeding. That such a thing there is as Providence, the Scriptures every where teach us; Moses in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions, Christ himself and his Apostles assure us hereof: and besides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Empirides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledge the Providence of God: yea the Turks themselves are so confident therein, as they refuse not to accompany and visit each other in the most pestilent diseases, nor shun any peril whatsoever, though death therein do manifestly present it self.

The places of Scripture proving providence, are so many, both in general and particular, as I shall need to repeat but a few of them in this place: Sing unto God (saith David) which covereth the Heavens with clouds, and prepareth rain for the earth, and maketh the grass to grow upon the Mountain; which giveth the beasts their food, and feedeth the young Raven that cries: All these wait upon thee, that thou mayest give them food in due season: And thou shalt drink of the River Cheareth (saith God to Eliab) and I have commanded the Ravens to feed thee there. Behold, the Fowles of the Ayre, they sow not, nor reap, and yet your heavenly Father feedeth them: Again, are not two Sparrowes sold for a farthinge and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea, all the hayres of your head are numbered: And S. Peter, Cast all your care on him, for he careth for you: And his judgments are written, saith David.

God therefore, who is every where present, who filleth the Heavens and the Earth, whose eyes are upon the Righteous, and his countenance against them that do evil, was therefore by Orpheus called oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things; and cannot therefore be esteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his power to any other: for it is contrary to his own word: Gloriam meam alteri non dabo: I will not give my glory to another. No man commandeth in the Kings preface, but by the Kings direction; but God is every-where present, and King of kings. The example of Gods universall Providence is seen in his creatures. The Father provideth for his children: beasts and birds and all living for their young ones. If Providence be found in second Fathers, much more in the first and Universall: and if there be a naturall loving care in men, and beasts much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whose Divine love was the beginning, and is the bond of the Universall: Amor divinus rerum omnium est principium, & vinculum universi (saith Plato) Amor Dei est nodus perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumque ejus immobilis sustentaculum, ac universe machina fundamentum: The love of God is the perpetuall knot, and link or chain of the world, and the immovable pillar of every part thereof, and the Basis and foundation of the universall. God therefore who could only be the cause of all, can only provide for all, and sustain all; so as to absolute power; to every-where presence; to perfect goodness; to pure and divine love; this attribute transcendent hability of Providence is onely proper and belonging.

NOW for Predestination, we can difference it no otherwise, from Providence and Prescience, than in this, that Prescience onely fore-seeth; Providence fore-seeth and careth for, and hath respect to all creatures, even from the brightest Angels of Heaven, to the unworthiest Worms of the Earth: and Predestination (as it is used specially by Divines) is onely of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their salvation properly, in the common use of Divines, or perdition, as some have used it. Yet Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernardus Theologus, and others, take the word Predestination more strictly, and for a preparation to felicity: divers of the Fathers take it more largely sometimes: among whom Saint Augustine speaking of two Cities, and two Societies, useth these words, Quarum est una, que predestinata est in eternum regnare cum Deo, altera eternam supplicium subire cum Diabolo: Whereof one is it, which is predestinated to reign for ever with God, but the other is to undergo everlasting torment with the Devil: for according to Nonius Marcellus, destinare, est preparare; and of the same opinion are many Protestant Writers, as Calvin, Beza, Buchanan, Danvers, and such like: and as for the manifold questions hereof arising, I leave them to the Divines; and why it hath pleased God to create some vessels of honour, and some of dishonour, I will answer with Gregory, who saith, Qui in salute Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem suam considerans, cur non videat, rationem videt: He that seeth no reason in the actions of God, by consideration of his own infirmity, perceiveth the reason of his blindness. And again with S. Augustine, Occulta esse causa potest, injusta esse non potest: Hidden the cause of his Predestination may be, unjust it cannot be.

§. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seem to be by fortune, and against Reason and Providence.

Lastly, seeing Destiny or Necessity is subsequent to Gods Providence, and seeing that the Stars have no other dominion, than is before spoken, and that Nature is nothing, but as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificiosum Dei organum; The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and Cusanus, Divini precepti instrumentum; The

The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and Cusanus, Divini precepti instrumentum; The instrument of the divine precept: we may then with better reason reject that kind of Idolatry, or God of fools, called Fortune or Chance: a Goddes, the most revered, and the most reviled of all other, but not ancient; for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus, as Pausanias witnesseth in his Messeniacus. The Greekes call her tyche, signifying a relative being, or betiding, so as before Homers time this great Lady was scarce heard of; and Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfeit gods, hath not a word of Fortune: yet afterward she grew to great and omnipotent, as from Kings and Kingdoms, to Beggars and Cottages, she ordered all things, resisting the wisdom of the wisest, by making the Poissessor thereof miserable: valuing the folly of the most foolish, by making the success prosperous; in so much as the actions of men were said to be but the sports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens lives, but her pastimes: of which Palladius, Vita hominum ludus fortuna est; The life of man is the play of Fortune: and because it often falleth out, that enterprises guided by ill counsels, have equal success to those by the best judgment conducted, therefore had Fortune the same externall figure with Sapience; whereof Athenens:

Longissimè à sapientia Fors disfidet, Sed multa perficit tamen similis.
From Wisedome Fortune differs far,
And yet in works most like they are.

But I will forbear to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly understood) is nothing else but a power imaginary, to which the success of humane actions and endeavours were for their variety ascribed; for when a manifest cause could not be given, then was it attributed to fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant; contrary to this true ground of Plato: Nihil est ortum sub Sole, cujus causa legitima non preceperit; Nothing ever came to pass under the Sun, of which there was not a just preceding cause. But Aquinas hath herein answered in one distinction, whatsoever may be objected; for many things there are (saith he) which happen, besides the intention of the Inferior, but not besides the intention of the Superior; Præter intentionem Inferiorem, sed non præter intentionem Superiorem (to wit, the Ordinance of God); and therefore (saith Melancthon) Quod Poete fortunam, nos Deum appellamus; whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God. And that this is true, the Scripture in many places teacheth us; as in the Law of Murder, He that smiteth a man, and he dye, shall dye the death; and if a man hath not laid wait, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. Now, where the Scripture hath these words, God hath offered him into his hands, we say, If he hurt him by Chance; and in Deuteronomy the nineteenth, where the flipping of an Axe from the helve, whereby another is slain, was the work of God himself, we in our phrase attribute this accident to Chance or Fortune: and in the Proverbs the sixteenth, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord: so as that which seemeth most casual and subject to Fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as all things else; and hereof the wiser fort, and the best learned of the Philosophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his Sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academics, to this effect, That the same power which they called animam mundi; The soul of the World, was no other than that incomprehensible wisdom, which we express by the name of God, governing every being as well in heaven as in earth; to which wisdom and power they sometime gave the title of Necessity or Fate, because it bindeth by inevitable ordinance: sometime, the style of Fortune, because of many effects there appear unto us no certain causes. To this effect speaketh S. Augustine in his questions upon Genesis the first Book: the same hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits; which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which Sect he was: For whatsoever (saith he) thou callest God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the same, differenced by divers termes, according as he useth, and exerciseth his power diversly.

But it may be objected, That if Fortune and Chance were not sometimes the causes of good and evil in men, but an idle voice, whereby we express success; how comes it then, that so many worthy and wise men depended upon so many unworthy and empty-headed fools; that riches and honour are given to external men, and without kernell : and so many learned, vertuous, and valiant men weare out their lives in poore and dejected estates. In a word, there is no other inferiour, or apparent cause, beside the partiality of mans affection, but the flahioning and not flahioning of our selves according to the nature of the time wherein we live : for whosoever is most able, and best sufficient to discern, and hath withal an honest and open heart and loving truth ; if Princes, or those that governe, endure no other discourse than their owne flatteries, then I say such an one, whose vertue and courage forbiddeth him to be base and a dissembler, shall evermore hang under the wheele ; which kinde of deservng well and receiving ill, we alwayes fallily charge Fortune withal. For whosoever shall tell any great Man or Magistrate, that he is not Just ; the General of an Army, that he is not valiant, and great Ladies that they are not faire, shall never be made a Counsellor, a Capitaine, or a Courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wise with a wife Prince, valiant with a valiant, and just with him that is just, for such a one hath no estate in his prosperity ; but he must also change with the succesor, if he be of contrary qualities ; faile with the tyde of the time, and alter forme and condition, as the Estate or the Estates Master changeth : Otherwise how were it possible, that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could so often attaine to honour and riches, but by such an ob-servant slavish course ? These men having nothing else to value themselves by, but a counterfeit kinde of wondring at other men, and by making them believe that all their vices are vertues, and all their dusty actions crystalline, have yet in all ages prospered equally with the most vertuous, if not exceeded them. For according to Menander, Omnis insipiens arrogantia & planities capitis ; Every foole is wonne with his owne pride, and others flattering applaus : so as whosoever will live altogether out of himselfe, and study other mens humours, and observe them, shall never be unfortunate ; and on the contrary, that man which prizeth truth and vertue (except the season wherein he liveth be of all these, and of all sorts of goodnesse fruitful) shall never prosper by the possession or profession thereof. It is also a token of a worldly wise man, not to warre or contend in vaine against the nature of times wherein he liveth : for such a one is often the author of his own misery ; but best it were to follow the advice, which the Pope gave the Bishops of that age, out of Ovid, while the Arian Heresie raged :

Ovid. Metam.
lib. 1.

Dum furor in cursu est, currenti cede furori.

While fury gallops on the way,
Let no man furies gallop stay.

And if Cicero (than whom that world begat not a man of more reputed Judgement had followed the counsell of his brother Quintus, Potuisse (saith Petrarch in lethale suo mori, potuisse integro & devoto speliiri ; he might then have died the death of nature, and bene with an watorne and undissolved body buried ; for as Petrarch in the same place noteth : Quid stultius quam desperantem presertim de effectu) littibus perpetuis implicari : What more foolish than for him that desperes (especially of the effect) to be intangled with endless contentions ; Whosoever therefore will set before him Machiavels two marks to shoot at (to wit) Riches, and Glory, must set on and take off a back of yron to a weak wooden Bow, that it may fit both the strong and the feeble ; for as he that first devised to adde sayls to rowing vessels, did either so proportion them as being fastened aloft, and towards the head of his Mast, he might abide all windes and stormes, or else he sometime or other perished by his owne invention : so that man which prizeth vertue for it selfe, and cannot endure to hoise and strike his sayles, as the divers natures of calmes and stormes require, must cut his sayles and his cloth of meane length and breadth, and content himselfe with a slow and sure navigation, (to wit) a meane and free estate. But of this dispute of Fortune, and the rest, or of whatsoever Lords or Gods, imaginary powers, or causes, the wit (or rather foolishnesse) of man hath found out : let us resolve with S. Paul, who hath taught us, that there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him ; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him ; there are diversities of operations, but God is the same which worketh all in all.

Met. lib. 7. 6.

Of this Image and Similitude of God, there is much dispute among the Fathers, Schoole-men, and late Writers : Some of the Fathers conceive, that man was made after the Image of God, in respect chiefly of Empire and Dominion, as S. Chrysostome, Ambrose, and some others : which S. Ambrose denieth to the woman in these words, Ux fuit Deus unus, ab eo fieret homo unus, & quomodo ex Deo uno omnia, ita ex uno homine omne genus esset super faciem totius terre : unus igitur, unum fecit, qui unitatis ejus habere imaginem ; That as God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kinde should be upon the face of the whole earth : Therefore he being one, made one, that should have the Image of his unity. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the same Verse ; that man was after the Image of God in respect of rule and power, it is written Dominamini in the plurall number, and let them rule over the fish in the Sea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceive, that man is said to be after the Image of God in respect of his immortal soule onely, because as God is invisible, so the soule of man is invisible ; as God is immortal and incorporeal, so is the soule of man immortal and incorporeal ; and as there is but one God which governeth the world ; so but one soul which governeth the body of man ; and as God is wholly in every part of the world, so is the soule of man wholly in every part of the body : Anima est tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte ; The soule is wholly in the whole body, and wholly in every part thereof, according to Aristotle ; though Chaldeians, and other learned men deny that doctrine, which that it is otherwise than potentially true, all the Aristotelians in the world shall never prove. These and the like arguments do the Jewes make (saith Toftatus) and their resemblances, between the infinite God, and the finite Man.

The Schoole-men resemble the Minde or Soule of Man to God, in this respect especially ; because that as in the Minde there are three distinct powers, or faculties (to wit) Memory, Understanding and Will ; and yet all these, being of real differences, are but one minde : so in God there are three distinct persons, the Father, Son, the holy Ghost, and yet but one God. They also make the Image and Similitude divers ; and againe, they distinguish between Imaginem Dei, and ad Imaginem Dei, and spinne into small threads with subtile distinctions, many times the plainnesse and sincerity of the Scriptures : their wits being like that strong water, that eateth thorow and dissolveth the purest gold. Viciorum also maketh the Image of God to be substantiall, but not the the similitude : sed in substantia nomen qualitatibus declaraturum ; A word declaring quality in the substance. Out of which words, and that which followeth, it is inferred, that as the image and similitude doe greatly differ, so the sinful soule doth not therefore leave to be the image of God ; but it hath not his similitude, except it be holy and righteous. S. Augustine also against Adimantum the Manichee affirmeth, that by sinne, the perfection of this image is lost in man ; and in his Retractions maintaineth the same opinion, and also affirmeth that the similitude is more largely taken, than the Image.

But howsoever the Schoolmen and others distinguish, or whatsoever the Fathers conceive, sure I am that S. Paul maketh the same sense of the Image, which Victricius doth of the similitude, who saith : As we have borne the image of the earthly, so shall we bear the image of the heavenly ; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, that the words Image and Similitude were used but in one sense, and in this place the better to express each other ; whatsoever Lombard hath said to the contrary. For God knows, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himself in the Scriptures, which neither Moses, the Prophets, or Apostles, ever conceived. Now as S. Paul useth the word (Image) for both : so Saint James useth the word (Similitude) for both in these words : Therewith bless we God even the Father, and therewith curse we Men, which are made after the similitude of God. Howsoever therefore S. Augustine seemeth, out of a kind of elegance in writing, to make some difference : as where he writeth, Constituimus imaginem in eternitate, similitudinem in moribus inveniri ; we confesse that this image is found in eternity, but his similitude in manners, that is, in the spiritual dispositions and qualities of the minde ; yet thus he elsewhere speaketh plainly : Quasi verò possit esse imago aliqua, in qua similitudo non sit : si enim omnino similis non est, procul dubio nec imago est ; As if (saith he) there could be any image, where the similitude is not : no, out of doubt, where there is no likeness, there is no image. The very words of the Text make this most manifest, as Let us make man in our image, according to our likeness : which is, Let us make man in our image, that he may be like us : and in the next Verse following, God himself maketh it plaine ; for there he useth the word (Image) only as thus : God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all dispute or ambiguity, in the first Verse of the fifth Chapter, the word (Similitude) is used againe by it selfe, as, In the day that God created Adam, in the likeness of God made he him. And this similitude S. Paul Coloss. the third, calleth the Image. In omni (saith he) the new man which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him. And in Syracides it is written, He made them according to his image. Now if we may believe Saint Paul before Peter Lombard and other Schoolmen, then it is as manifest as words can make it, that the image and similitude is but the same ; for S. Paul useth both the words directly in one sense. For they turned the glory of the incorruptible God, to the similitude of the image of a corruptible man.

Zanchinus laboureth to prove, that man was formed after the image of God, both in body and mind : Nulla pars in homine que non fuerit huiusce imaginis particeps ; No part in a man (saith he) which was not participating Gods image : for God said, Let us make man according to our owne image. But the soule alone is not man, but the Hypostasis or whole Man compounded of body and soule. The body of man (saith he) is the image of the world, and called therefore Microcosmus ; but the Idea and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his body, must needs be the image of God. Against which opinion of this learned man, his owne objection seemeth to me sufficient, where he allegeth that it may be said, that Moses spake by the figure Synecdoche, as when a man is called a mortall man, yet is not the whole man mortall, but the body only : so when God said, Let us make man after our image, he meant the soule of man, and not the body of earth and dust : Maledictus qui Deitatem ad hominis lineamenta refert (saith Saint Augustine) : Cursed is he that reserveth the Deity of God to the lineaments of mans body : Deus enim non est humane forme particeps, neque corpus humanum divine (saith Philo) ; God is not partaker of humane form, nor humane body of the forme divine. The Hebrew word for image, is Tselem, which signifieth a shadow or obscure resemblance : In imagine pertransit homo, Man passeth away in a shadow : Let us then know and consider, that God, who is eternall and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition : for it is both against his Nature and his Word ; an error of the Anthropomorphite, against the very essence and Majesty of God.

Surely

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more divine understanding than these gross Hereticks : Ad similitudinem Dei propriis accedebat humana virtus, quam figura ; The virtue which is in man (saith he) came nearer the similitude of God, than the figure. For God is a spirituall substance, invisible, and most simple ; God is a just God : God is Merciful : God is Charity it self, and (in a word) Goodness it self, and none else simply good. And thus much it hath pleased God himself to teach us, and to make us know of himself. What then can be the shadow of such a substance, the image of such a nature, or wherein can man be said to resemble his unexcogitable power and perfectness : certainly, not in Dominion alone : for the Devil is said to be the Prince of this World, Eph. 5. 12. and the Kingdom of Christ was not thereof, who was the true and perfect image of his Father ; neither because man hath an immortal soul, and therein the faculties of Memory, Understanding, and Will ; for the Devils are also immortal, and participate those faculties, being called Demonies, because scientes of Knowledge, and subtilty ; neither because we are reasonable creatures, by which we are distinguished from beasts : for who have rebelled against God ? who have made gods of the vilest beasts, of Serpents, of Cats, of Owles, yea, even of shameful parts, of lusts and pleasures, but reasonable men ? yet do I not condemn the opinion of Saint Chrysostome and Ambrose, as Officiis de Just. touching dominion, but that, in respect thereof, man was in some sort after the image of God, if we take Dominion, such as it ought to be, that is, accompanied with Justice and Piety : for God did not only make man a Ruler and Governour over the Fishes of the Sea, the Fowles of Heaven (or of the aire) and over the Beasts of the Field ; But God gave unto man a dominion over men, he appointed Kings to govern them ; and Judges to judge them in equity. Neither do I exclude Reason, as it is the ability of Understanding. For I do not conceive, that Irenaeus did therefore call man, the image of God, because he was animal rationale onely ; but that he understood it better, with Syllia : Imago mea est homo, rectam rationem habens : Man that is endued with right reason is said to resemble God, (that is) by right reason to know and confesse Gods his Creator, and the same God to serve, love, and obey : and therefore said S. Augustine (who herein came nearer the Truth) Fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem & similitudinem suam in mente ; God made man, in respect of the intellect, after his own Image and similitude ; and Reynierius, Homo, quod habet mentem, factus est ad imaginem Dei ; Man was made after the Image of God, in minde, or in that he had a minde. Reyn. de men.

§. II.

Of the intellectuall minde of man, in which there is much of the Image of God : and that this Image is much deformed by Sin.

BUT Mens is not taken here for anima physica, according to Aristotle, which is forma, vel natura hominis : The form or nature of man ; but this faculty or gift of God, called Mens, is taken for prima vis animi : the principall strength of the minde, or soul, cujus actus est perpetua veritatis contemplatio ; whose act, exercise, or office, is the perpetuall contemplation of truth ; and therefore it is also called intellectus divinus, intellectus contemplativus, & anima contemplativa. A divine understanding, and an intellect or minde contemplative. Audem enim nostra (saith Cusanus) vis comprehendendi, & totum virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus compositum : Our intellectuall minde (saith he) is a De mente. Idem. l. 3. power of comprehending, even the whole, that is in this kinde powerfull, compounded of all the powers of comprehension : unto which Mercurius attributeth so much (if his meaning accompany his words) that he esteemeth it to be the very essence of God (which was also the error of the Manichees, and others) and no otherwise separate from God (saith he) than the light from the Sun : for this Mens or understanding (saith Mercurius) est Deus in hominibus : Is God in men, or rather (and which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For, as the Sun is not of the same essence or nature with the divine light, but a body illightned, and an illumination created ; so is this Mens or understanding in men, not of the essence of Gods infinite understanding, but a power and faculty of our soules the purest ; or the lumen anime rationalis, by the true and eternall light illightned. And this Mens, others call animam animæ, The soul of the soul, or with Saint Augustine, the eye of the soul, or receptacle of Sapience and divine knowledge, que amorem sapientia tanquam ducem sequitur, Which followeth after after the love of sapience as her guide (saith Philo) between which a and reason, between which and the mind, called anima, between which and that power which the Latines call animus, there is this difference. Reason is that faculty by which we judge and discourse; Anima, by which we live. Hereof it is said, Anima corpus animat, id est, vivificat; or the soul is that which doth animate the body, that is, giveth it life: for death is the separation of body and soul; and the same strength (saith Philo) which God the great Director hath in the World, the same hath this Anima, or mind, or soul in man. Animus, is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Basil agreeth, which called this Mens, or divine understanding, perceptive animi partem, the perceiving part of the mind, or the light by which the soul discerneth: dormientium mens non anima, spiritus, & in furiosis mens extinguuntur, anima manet: In men that sleep it is this (mens) or understanding, and not the mind or soul, which resteth, during which time it is but habitual in wise men, and in mad men this (Mens) is extinguished, and not the soul: for mad men do live, though distracted.

Therefore this word being often used for the soule giving life, is attributed abusively to mad men, when we say that they are of a distracted minde, in stead of a broken understanding: which word (Minde) we use also for opinion, as, I am of this minde, or that minde: and sometimes for mens conditions or virtues, as, He is of an honest minde, or a man of a just minde: Sometimes for affection, as, I do this for my mind's sake; and Aristotle sometimes useth this word (Mens) for the phantasie, which is the strength of the imagination: sometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we have without discourse: oftentimes for Spirits, Angels and Intelligences: but as it is used in the proper signification, including both the understanding agent and possible, it is described to be a pure, simple, substantial act, not depending upon matter, but having relation to that which is intelligible, as to his first object: or more at large thus; A part or particle of the Soul, whereby it doth understand, not depending upon matter, nor needing any organ, free from passion coming from without, and apt to be differed, as, eternal from that which is mortal. Hereof excellently Mercurius: Anima est imago mentis, mens imago Dei. Deus menti præst, mens animæ, anima corpori; The Soul (meaning that which giveth life) is the Image of this understanding, or Mens, and this (Mens) or understanding is the Image of God. God is Prefident or Ruler over this understanding, this understanding over the Soule, and this Soule over the body. This division and distinction out of the Platonicks and Peripateticks, I leave to the reader to judge of. That, Mens humana hath no need of any organ, Marfilus Ficinus in his ninth Book of the Soul's immortality, laboureth to prove. Zanchius doth not differ from Ficinus in words: for (saith he) *Ad facultatem intelligentem exercendam non eget Mens organo; tanquam medio, per quod intelligat: quantum eget objecto in quod intuat, & ex quo intellectionem concipiat: hoc autem objectum sunt phantasmata, seu rerum à sensibus perceptarum simulacra ad phantasiam prolata: To exercise the faculty of understanding, the minde of man (saith he) needeth no instrument, as a meane, by which it may understand: but it needeth an object, whereon to look, and whence to conceive the act of understanding. This object are the phantasmes, or the resemblances of things received from the sense, and carried to the phantasie. But in effect, his conclusion seemeth to carry a contrary sense, when he maketh the Phantasie, in representing the object to the understanding, to be a corporal Organum; neither can it be understood to be an Organum of any thing, but of the understanding. And he addeth, that the resemblance of things in mans imagination, are to his understanding and minde, as colours are to the sight: whence it so followeth, that the imagination or phantasie it self is to the faculty of understanding, as the eye is to the faculty of seeing; and as this is an organum, so that. Of this question, How the mind in all her actions maketh use of the body, and hath communion with the body, I refer the Reader to a most grave and learned Discourse in the last Reply of M.D. Bilson, late Bishop of Winchester, unto Henry Jacob. Howsoever the Truth be determined, we must conclude, that it is neither in respect of reason alone, by which we discourse, nor in respect of the minde it self, by which we live, nor in respect of our souls simply, by which we are immortal, that we are made after the Image of God. But most safely may we resemble our selves to God in mente, and in respect of that pure faculty, which is never separate from the contemplation and love of God. Yet this is not all; For Saint Bernard maketh a true difference between the nature and faculties of the Minde or Soule, and between the infusion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which, being* being added to the nature, essence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to be after the Image of God, whose words are these: Non propterea imago Dei est, quia sui meminit Mens, sed; intelligit & diligit (which also was the opinion of Saint AUGUSTINE) sed quia potest meminit, intelligere ac diligere eum à quo facta est, (that is) The Minde (or Mens) was not therefore the Image of God, because it remembereth, understandeth, and loveth it self, but because it can remember, understand, and love God, who created it. And that this Image may be deformed and made unprofitable, hear BASIL: Homo ad imaginem & similitudinem Dei factus est, peccatum vero imaginis huius pulchritudinem deformavit, & inutilem reddidit, dum animam corruptis concupiscentiæ affectibus immergit: Man was made after the Image and similitude of God, but sin hath deformed the beauty of this Image, and made it unprofitable, by drawing our minds into corrupt concupiscentie.

It is not therefore (as aforesaid) by reason of Immortality, nor in Reason, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of these by it self, nor in all these joyned, by any of which, or by all which we resemble, or may be called the shadow of God, though by reason and understanding, with the other faculties of the Soule, we are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of Original righteousness, most perfectly infused by God into the Mind and Soule of man in his first Creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberality, that we were printed with the seal of Gods Image (though Reason may be said to be of her gift, which joyned to the soul, is a part of the Essential Constitution of our proper Species) but from the bountiful grace of the Lord of all goodnes, who breathed life into Earth, and contrived within the Trunk of Dust and Clay, the inimitable hability of his own Piety and righteousness.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which Dominion hath) do those that are powerful retain the Image of God, as according to his Commandments they exercise the Office or Magistracy to which they are called, and sincerely walk in the ways of God, which in the Scriptures is called, walking with God; and all other men so long retain this Image, as they feare, love and serve God truly, that is, for the love of God alone, and do not bruise and deface his Seal by the weight of manifold and voluntary offences, and obstinate sins. For the unjust minde cannot be after the Image of God, seeing God is Justice it self; The blood-thirsty hath it not; for God is Charity, and Mercy it self: Falshood, cunning practice, and ambition, are properties of Satan; and therefore cannot dwell in one soul, together with God: and to be short, there is no likelihood between pure light and black darkness, between beauty and deformity, or between righteousness and reprobation. And though Nature, according to common understanding, have made us capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receive this Image of Gods goodnes, which the sensual souls of Beasts cannot perceive; yet were that aptitude natural more inclinable to follow and imbrace the false and durlous pleasures of this Stage-play World, than to become the shadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanship of God's Wisdom, and the liberality of his Mercy, formed eyes to our souls, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impurity of our flesh, behold the highest Heavens, and thence bring Knowledge and Object to the Minde and Soule, to contemplate the ever-during Glory, and termless Joy, prepared for those which retain the Image and similitude of their Creator, preserving undefiled and unrent the garment of the new man, which, after the Image of God, is created in Righteousness, and Holiness, as saith Saint Paul. Now whereas it is thought by some of the Fathers, as by S. Augustine, with whom S. Ambrose S. Ambrose joyneth, that by sin, the perfection of the Image is lost, and not the Image it self; both opinions by this distinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the Image of God, in man, may be taken two ways; for either it is considered, according to natural gifts, and consisteth therein: namely, to have a reasonable and understanding nature, &c. and in this sense, the Image of God is more lost by sin, than the very reasonable or understanding nature &c. is lost, (or sin doth not abolish and take away these natural gifts:) or, the Image of God is considered, according to supernatural gifts, namely, of Divine grace and heavenly Glory, which is indeed the perfection and accomplishment of the natural Image; and this manner of similitude and Image of God is wholly blotted out and destroyed by sin.

§. III.

Of our base and fraile bodies : and that the care thereof should yeeld to the immortal Soule.

THe externall man God formed out of the dust of the Earth, or according to the signification of the word, Adam, of Adamath, of red Earth, or ex limo terre, out of the slime of the Earth, or a mixed matter of Earth and Water. Non ex qualibet humo, sed ex ghabbar adamath (ideft) ex pinguiſſima & molliſſima : Not that God made an Image or Statue of Clay, but out of Clay, Earth or dust God formed and made flesh, blond, and bone, with all parts of man.

That man was formed of Earth and Dust did Abraham acknowledge, when in humble fear he called unto God, to save Sodome : Let not my Lord now be angry, if I speak, I that am but dust and ashes : And, In these Houses of Clay, whose foundation is in the dust, do our souls inhabit, according to Job. And though our own eyes do every where behold the sudden and resistless assaults of death, and Nature assureth us by never-failing experience, and Reason by infallible demonstration, that our times upon the Earth have neither certainty nor durability ; that our Bodies are but the Anvils of pain and diseases, and our Minds the Hives of unnumbered cares, sorrows and passions : and that (when we are most glorified) we are but those painted posts, against which Envie and Fortune direct their darts ; yet such is the true unhappiness of our condition, and the dark ignorance which covereth the eyes of our understanding, that we only prize, to pamper, and exalt this Vassall and Slave of death, and forget altogether (or only remember at our cast-away leisure) the imprisoned immortal Soule, which can neither die with the Reprobate, nor perish with the mortal parts of virtuous men : seeing Gods justice in the one, and his goodness in the other is exercised for evermore, as the ever-living subjects of his reward and punishment. But when is it that we examine this great account ? Never while we have one vanity left us to spend : we plead for Titles, till our breath fail us ; dig for Riches, while our strength inableth us exercise malice, while we can revenge ; and then when time hath beaten from us both youth, pleasure, and health, and that Nature it self hateth the house of old age, we remember with Job, that we must go the way from whence we shall not return, and that our bed is made ready for us in the dark : And then, I say, looking over-late into the bottom of our conscience (which Pleasure and Ambition had locked up from us all our lives,) we behold therein the fearful Images of our actions past, and withal this terrible Inscription : That God will bring every work into judgement, that man hath done under the Sun.

But what examples have ever moved us ? what persuasions reformed us ? or what threatnings made us afraid ? we behold other men's Tragedies plaid before us, we hear what is promised and threatened : but the World's bright glory hath put out the eyes of our minds, and these betraying lights, (with which we only see) do neither looke up towards termless joyes, nor down towards endless sorrows, till we neither know, nor can look for any thing else at the World's hands. Of which excellently Marius Victor :

Egerunt, sumus, qui nunc sumus, iſq; periculis
Tentati, nibilo meliores reddimur unquam, Sub vitis nullo culpam sine manentes.*

Diseases, Famine, Enemies, in us no change have wrought,
What erst we were, we are ; still in the same snare caught :
No time can our corrupted manners mend,
In Vice we dwell, in Sin that hath no end.

But let us not flatter our immortal souls herein : for to neglect God all our lives, and know that we neglect him ; to offend God voluntarily, and know that we offend him, casting our hopes on the Peace, which we trust to make at parting, is no other than a rebellious presumption, and (that which is the worst of all) even a contemptuous laughing to scorn, and deriding of God, his Laws and Precepts. Fruſtra sperant qui sic de miſericordia Dei ſibi blandiuntur : They hope in vain, saith BERNARD, which in this sort flatter themselves with Gods mercy.

§. IV.

§. IV.

Of the Spirit of Life, which God breathed into man in his Creation.

IN this frame and carcass God breathed the breath of life ; and the man was a living Soul : (that is) God gave a body of Earth and of corruptible matter, a Soul spiritual and incorruptible ; not that God had any such bodily instruments as men use, but God breathed the Spirit of Life and Immortality into man, as he breathed his grace daily into such as love and fear him. The Spirit of God (saith ELIHU in Job) hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life : In qua ſententia (saith RABANUS) vitanda est paupertas ſenſus carnalis, ne forte putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formiſſe corpus hominis, vel ſaucibus aut labiis ſuis inſpiriſſe in faciem formati, ut vivere poſſit & ſpiraculum vitæ habere : Nam & Prophetæ cum ait, Manus tuæ fecerunt me, &c. Tropica hac locutione magis quàm propria, (id est) juxta conſuetudinem, qua ſolent homines operari, loquutus est : In which ſentence (saith he) the beggarlineſs of carnal ſenſe is to be avoided, least perhaps we should think, either that God with bodily hands made mans body of slime, or breathed with jaws or lips upon his face (being formed) that he might live, and have the Spirit of life : for the Prophet also when he saith ; Thy hands have made me, spake this Tropically, rather than properly (that is) according to the custome which men use in working. Quantum est periculi his, qui Scripturas ſenſu corporeo legunt ? In what danger are they that read the Scriptures in a carnal ſenſe ? By this breath was infused into man, both life and soule, and therefore this (Soule) the Philosophers call Animam, que vivificat corpus, & animat ; Which doth animate and give life to the body. The inspiration of the Almighty giveth understanding, saith Job ; and this spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable soule of man, returneth againe to God that gave it, as the body returneth unto the Earth, out of which it was taken ; according to Ecclesiastes : And dust shall returne to the Earth, out of which it was taken, and the spirit shall return to God that gave it. Neither is this word (Spirit) usually otherwise taken in the Scriptures, than for the soule ; as when Stephen cried unto God : Domine, ſuſcipe ſpiritum : and Jesus received my spirit : and in S. JOHN, And Jesus bowed his head and gave up the Ghost, or Spirit ; (which was) that his life and soule left his body dead. And that the immortal soule of man differeth from the Soules of beasts, the manner of creation maketh it manifest : for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance every creeping thing, and let the Earth bring forth the living thing, according to his kinde, the beast of the Earth, &c. But of man it is written, Let us make man in our owne Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, as from the Water and Earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence received life ; so shall they again be dissolved into the same first matter, whence they were taken : but the life of breath everlasting, which God breathed into man, shall according to Ecclesiastes, return again to God that gave it.

§. V.

That man is (as it were) a little World : with a digression touching our mortality.

MAN, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or model, or brief Story of the Universal : in whom God concluded the Creation, and work of the World, and whom he made the last and most excellent of his Creatures, being internally endued with a divine understanding, by which he might contemplate and serve his Creator, after whose image he was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of Reason and other abilities, that thereby also he might govern and rule the World, and all other God's creatures therein. And whereas God created three sorts of living natures, (to wit) Angelical, Rational, and Brutal ; giving to Angels an intellectual, and to Beasts a sensual nature, he vouchsafed unto Man, both the intellectual of Angels, the sensitive of Beasts, and the proper rational belonging unto man : and therefore (saith GREGORY NAZIANZENE), Homo est utriusque nature vinculum, Man is the bond and chaine which tieth together both Natures : and because in the little frame of man's bodie there is a representation of the Universal, and (by allusion) a kinde of participation of all the parts there, therefore was man called Microcosmos, or the little World. Dens igitur hominem factum, velut alterum quendam mundum, dnm, dum in brevi magnum atq; exiguu totum in terris statuit; God therefore placed in the Earth the man whom he had made, as it were another World; the great and large World in the small and little World: for out of the Earth and Duft was formed the flesh of man, and therefore heavie and lumpish: the bones of his body we may compare to the hard Rockes and Stones, and therefore strong and durable; of which OVID:

Ovid. Met. l. 1.

*Inde genus durum sumus, experientq; laborum,
Et documenta damus qua sumus origine nati:*

From thence our Kind hard-hearted is, enduring pain and care, Approving, that our bodies of a stony nature are.

His blood, which disperfeth it self by the branches of veines through all the body, may be resembled to those waters, which are carried by Brooks and Rivers over all the Earth; his breath to the Aire, his naturall heat to the inclosed warmth which the Earth hath in it self, which, stirred up by the heat of the Sun, assisteth Nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth; Our radical moisture, Oyl, or Balsamum (whereon the naturall heat feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertility of the Earth; the hairs of mans body, which adorns or over-shadows it, to the grass, which covereth the upper face and skin of the Earth; our generative power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the light, wandering and unstable clouds, carried every where with uncertain winds; our eyes, to the light of the Sun and Moon; and the beauty of our youth, to the flowers of the Spring, which, either in a very short time, or with the Suns heat, dry up and wither away, or the fierce puffs of wind blow them from the stalkes; the thoughts of our mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure understanding (formerly called Mens, and that which alwayes looketh upwards) to those intellectuall natures, which are alwayes present with God; and lastly our immortall soules (while they are righteous) are by God himself beautified with the title of his own Image and similitude. And although in respect of God, there is no man just, or good, or righteous: for in Angels deprehenſa est ſuſtitiſſia, behold, he found fully in his Angels (saith Job) yet with such a kind of difference, as there is between the substance and the shadow, there may be found a goodness in man: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called man, the image and similitude of his own righteousness. In this also is the little World of man compared, and made more like the universall (man being the measure of all things; Homo est mensura omnium rerum, saith Aristotle and Pythagoras) that the four Complexions resemble the four Elements, and the seven Ages of man the seven Planets: Whereof our infancie is compared to the Moon, in which we seem onely to live and grow, as Plants; the second Age to Mercurie, wherein we are taught and instructed; our third Age to Venus, the dayes of Love, Desire, and Vanitie; the fourth to the Sun, the strong, flourishing, and beautiful age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which we seek honour and victory, and in which our thoughts travail to ambitious ends; the sixth Age is ascribed to Jupiter, in which we begin to take account of our times, judge of our selves, and grow to the perfection of our understanding; the last and seventh to Saturne, wherein our dayes are sad and over-caſt, and in which we find by dear and lamentable experience, and by the loss which can never be repaired, that of all our vain passions and affections past, the sorrow onely abideth: Our attendants are sicknesses, and variable infirmities, and by how much the more we are accompanied with plenty, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whom when Time hath made unfociable to others, we become a burthen to our selves: being of no other use, than to hold the riches we have from our Successors. In this time it is, when (as aforesaid) we, for the most part, and never before, prepare for our eternall habitation, which we passe on unto with many sighes, groanes, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanſhip of death, finish the sorrowfull business of a wretched life; towards which we alwayes travel both sleeping and waking: neither have those beloved companions of honour and riches any power at all to hold us any one day, by the glorious promise of entertainments; but by what crooked path soever we walk, the same leadeth on directly to the house of death, whose doors lye open at all hours, and to all persons. For this cycle of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, ever runneth with a perpetuall Ebbe and falling Stream, but never floweth again: our Leaf once fallen, springeth no more,

For if there were any baiting place, or rest, in the course or race of mans life, then according to the doctrine of the Academicke, the same might also perpetually be maintained; but as there is a continuance of motion in naturall living things, and as the sap and juyce, wherein the life of Plants is preserved, doth evermore ascend or descend; so is it with the life of man, which is alwayes either increaseth towards ripenesse and perfection, or declining and decreaseth towards rottenness and dissolution.

§. VI.

Of the free power, which man had in his first Creation, to dispose of himself.

THESE be the miseries which our first Parents brought on all Mankind, unto whom God in his creation gave a free and unconstrained will, and on whom he bestowed the liberal choice of all things, with one onely prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God set before him, a mortall and immortall Life, a nature celestiall and terrene, and (indeed) God gave man to himself, to be his own Guide, his own Workman, and his own Painter, that he might frame or describe unto himself what he pleased, and make election of his own form. God made man in the beginning (saith SIRACIDES), and left him in the hands of his own counsel. Such was the liberality of God, and mans felicity: whereas beasts, and all other creatures reasonless, brought with them into the World (saith Lucilius) and that even when they first fell from the bodies of their Dams, the nature, which they could not change; and the supernall Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or soon after, of that condition, in which they remain in perpetuall eternity. But (as aforesaid) God gave unto man all kind of Seeds and Grafts of life (to wit) the vegetative life of Plants, the sensual of Beasts, the rational of Man, and the intellectuall of Angels; whereof which soever he took pleasure to plant and cultivate, the same should futerely grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his own choice and plantation. This freedom of the first man Adam, and our first Father, was enigmatically described by Aesclepius Atheniensis (saith Mirandula) in the person and Fable of Proteus, who was said, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphoses among the Pythagorians, and ancient Poets, wherein it was fained, that men were transformed into divers shapes of beasts, thereby to shew the change of mens conditions, from Reason to Brutality, from Vertue to Vice, from Meekness to Cruelty, from Justice to Oppression. For by the lively Image of other creatures did those Ancients represent the variable passions, and affections of mortall men; as by Serpents were signified Deceivers; by Lyons, Oppressors, and cruell men; by Swine, Men given over to lust and sensuality; by Wolves, ravening, and greedy men; which also Saint Matthew resembleth to false Prophets, which come to you in sheepes clothing, but inwardly they are ravening Wolves: by the images of Stones and stocks, foolish and ignorant Men; by Vipers, ungratefull Men: of which St. JOHN BAPTIST, O ye generation of Vipers, &c.

Gen. 1. 28. 22. 24.

IN this work of Man, God finished the Creation; not that God laboured as a man, and therefore rested: for God commanded, and it was finished, Cui voluisse est fecisse; with whom, to will is to make, saith Beda. Neither did God so rest, that he left the World made, and the Creatures therein to themselves: for my Father worketh to this day (saith Christ) and I work; but God rested (that is) he created no new species or kinds of creatures, but (as aforesaid) gave unto man a power generative, and so to the rest of living creatures, and to Plants and Flowers their seeds in themselves; and commanded man to multiply and fill the Earth, and the Earth and Sea to bring forth creatures according to their severall kinds: all which being finished, God saw that his workes were good; not that he foreknew not, and comprehended not the beginning and end before they were; for God made every Plant of the field before it was in the Earth; but he gave to all things which he had created the name of good, thereby to teach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good, and from whose simple purity and from so excellent a cause there could proceed no impure or imperfect effect. For man having a free will and liberall choice, purchased by disobedience his own death and mortality, and for the cruelty of mans heart, was the Earth afterward cursed, and all creatures of the first Age destroyed, but the righteous man Noah and his Family, with those creatures which the Ark contained, reserved by God to replenish the Earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

§. I.

That the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no marvell that men should erre.

Concerning the first Habitation of man, we read, that the Lord God planted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made, GEN. 2. 6. Of this seat and place of Paradise, all Ages have held dispute; and the opinions and judgments have been in effect, as divers, among those that have written upon this part of Genesis, as upon any one place therein, seeming most obscure: some there are, that have conceived the being of the terrestriall Paradise, without all regard of the Worlds Geographic, and without any respect of the East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the Heavens) the way, how to find out and judge, in what Region of the World this Garden was by God planted, wherein he was exceeding respective and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first Interpretation, or trusting to their own judgments, understood one place for another; and one Error is so fruitful, as it begetteth a thousand Children, if the licentiousness thereof be not timely restrained. And thirdly, those Writers which gave themselves to follow and imitate others, were in all things to obsequious Followers of those Masters, whom they admired and beleaved in, as they thought it safer to condemn their own understanding, than to examine theirs. For (saith Vadius in his Epistle of Paradise) Magnos errores, magnorum virorum autoritate persuasi, transmittimus; We passe over many grosse errors, by the authority of great men led and persuaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were far wide from the understanding of this place. I speak it not, that I myself dare presume to censure them, for I reverence both their Learning and their Pietie, and yet not bound to follow them any further, then they are guided by truth: for they were men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should be proud of himself, God hath distributed unto men such a proportion of Knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselves their own weakness:

Nulli

Nulli unquam dedit omnia Deus; God never gave the knowledge of all things to any one. Saint Paul confest that he knew not, whether he were taken up into the third Heaven in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himself acknowledged thus much, that neither Men, nor Angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, seeing knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to S. Jude) who is only wise. Sapientia ubi invenitur, (saith Jos) but where is wisdom found? and where is the place of understanding? man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the Land of the living. And therefore seeing God found folly in his Angels, mens judgements (which inhabit in houses of Clay) cannot be without their mistakings; and so the Fathers, and other learned men, excusable in particulars, especially in those whereupon our salvation dependeth not.

§. II.

A recitall of strange opinions touching Paradise.

Now touching Paradise, first it is to be enquired, whether there were a Paradise, or no? or whether Moses description were altogether mystical, and allegorical? as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others have affirmed; and that under the names of those four Rivers, Pison, Gekon, Hiddekel, and Perath, the Tree of Life, and the Tree of Knowledge, there were delivered unto us other mysteries and significations; as, that by the four Rivers were meant the four Cardinal virtues, Justice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence; or (by other) Oyl, Wine, Milke and Honey. This Allegorical understanding of Paradise by Origen divulged, was again by Franciscus Georgius received (saith Sixtus Senensis) whose frivolous imaginations Sixtus himself doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 34. Annotation of his fifth Book, fol. 338. the last Edition.

S. Ambrose also leaned wholly to the Allegorical construction, and set Paradise in the third Heaven, and in the virtues of the mind, & in nostro principali, which is, as I conceive it, in mente, or in our soules: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort. By the place or garden of Paradise, was meant the soul or mind; by Adam, Mens, or Understanding; by Eve, the Sense; by the Serpent, Delectation; by the Tree of good and evil, Sapience; & by the rest of the Trees, the virtues of the mind, or in the mind planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, upon the first of the Corin. c. 6. he in direct words alloweth both of a celestially and terrestriall Paradise; the one into which S. Paul was wrapt; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chrysostomus was of opinion, that a Paradise had been, but that there was not now any mark thereof on the earth: the same being not only defaced, but withall the places now not so much as existing. To which Luther seemeth to adhere.

The Manichees also understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth; to which opinion Vadius inclineth, as I conceive his words in two severall places. First, upon this: Fill the earth, Gen. 10. Of which he gives this judgment. Hoc ipso etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominamini universis animantibus, subjicite terram, clarissime docet, totam terram extantem, & omnigenis (ut tuus erat) fructibus constare, sedem & horum illum Ade, & posteritatis future fuisse; These words (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruit and multiply, and fill the earth, and subdue it, and rule over every creature, do clearly shew, that the Univerſall earth set or filled with all sorts of fruits (as then it was) was the garden and seat of ADAM, and of his future posterity. Afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of the Acts Cap. 17. Apostolus ex uno sanguine genus humanum ideo factum docet, ut habitarent super universam faciem terre: tota igitur terra Paradisus ille erat; The Apostle (saith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell over all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (saith he) was that Paradise. Which conjectures I will answer in order. Gropius Becanus differeth not much from this opinion, but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was first planted by God in one certain place, and peculiar Garden; which place Gropius findeth neer the River of Acesines, in the confines of India.

Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus, make Paradise under the Equinoctiall, and Po- stellus, quite contrary, under the North pole: the Chaldeans also for the most part, and all their Sectators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradise a figure, or Sacrament only, or else would have it seated out of this sensible world, or raised into some high and remote Region of the Ayr. Rabanus, were both sick of this vanity, with Origen, and Philo: so was our venerable Beda, and Peter Comestor, and Moses Barcephas the Syrian, translated by Masius. But as Hopkins sayes of Philo Judeus, that he wondred, Quo malo genio afflatus; By what evil Angel he was blown up into this error: so can I not but greatly marvel at the learned men, who so grossly and blindly wanded; seeing Moses, and after him the Prophets, do so plainly describe this place, by the Region in which it was planted, by the Kingdoms and Provinces bordering it, by the Rivers which watered it, and by the points of the Compass upon which it lay, in respect of Judea, or Canaan.

Noviomagus also upon Beda, De natur. rerum, beleeve that all the Earth was taken for Paradise, and not any one place. For the whole Earth (saith he) hath the same beauty ascribed to Paradise. He addeth, that the Ocean was that Fountain, from whence the four Rivers, Pison, Gehon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning: for he could not think it possible, that these Rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates (whereof the one ran through India, the other through Egypt, and the other through Mesopotamia, and Armenia) could rise out of one Fountain, were it not out of the Fountain of the Ocean.

§. III.

That there was a true local Paradise Eastward, in the Country of Eden.

TO the first therefore, that such a place there was upon the earth, the words of Moses make it manifest, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had made: and howsoever the vulgar translation, called Jeromes translation, hath converted this place thus, Plantaverat Dominus Deus Paradisum voluptatis: à principio; The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginnings, putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eastward: it is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For what sense hath this translation (saith our Hopkins, in his Treatise of Paradise) that he planted a Garden in pleasure, or that a River went out of pleasure to water the Garden: But the seventy Interpreters call it Paradisum Edenis, the Paradise of Eden, and so doth the Chaldean Paraphrast truly take it for the proper name of a place, and for a Noun appellative; which Region, in respect of the fertility of the soyle, of the many beautiful Rivers & goodly Woods, and that the Trees (as in the Indies) do always keep their leaves, was called Eden, which signifieth in the Hebrew, pleasantness, or delicacy, as the Spaniards call the Country, opposite to the Isle of Cuba, Florida: and this is the mistaking, which may end the dispute, as touching the double sense of the word, that as Florida was a Country, so called for the flourishing beauty thereof; so was Eden a Region called pleasure, or delicacy, for its pleasure, or delicacy: and as Florida signifieth flourishing; so Eden signifieth pleasure: and yet both are the proper names of Countries; for Eden being the proper name of a Region, (called pleasure in the Hebrew) and Paradise being the choise seat of all that Region, Paradise was truly the Garden of Eden, and truly the Garden of pleasure.

Now, for Eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrary to the translation of the Seventy; to the ancient Greek Fathers, as Basil, Chrysostome, Theodoret, Gregorie; and to the Rabines, as Rabban, Rabbin, R. Abraham, and Chimebi; and of the Latines, Severinus, Damasceus, &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and set the word (Eastward) for ab initio: for Damasceus own words are these, Paradisus est locus Dei manibus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter constructus; Paradise is a place, miraculously planted by the hands of God, in Eden, toward the East.

And after all these Fathers, Guilhelmus Parisiensis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senensis, of latter times, do both understand these words of Eden and of the East, contrary to the vulgar Translation; Parisiensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis, directly against the vulgar: of which there are their own words: After this I will begin to speak of Paradise terrestrial, which God planted from the beginning, or Eastward, &c. Post hæc incipiam loqui de Paradiso terrestri, quem plantasse Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem, &c. And then Senensis; Moses enim clarissime proclat, Paradisum à Deo constructum in regione terre Orientalis, quæ dicitur Eden: Hæden autem esse proprium nomen apparet ex quo in capite Gen. ubi legimus CHAM habitasse ad Orientalem plagam Hæden; For Moses (saith (saith he) doth shew most clearly, that Paradise was planted of God in a Region of the East Country, which is called Heden; but that Heden is a proper name, it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Genesis, where we read, that CHAM dwelt on the East border of Heden. PERERIUS endeavourth to qualifie this Translation; for this particel (saith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the Creation, and not to the very first day; alledging this place of Christ, that although the Devil was said to be a Man-slayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I think (referring my self to better judgement) the Devil was from the infant of his fall a Man-slayer in disposition, though he had not whereon to practise till mans Creation. And for conclusion, S. Hierome (if that be his translation) adviseth himself better in the end of the third Chapter of Genesis, converting the word (Eden) by (antè) and not (à principio) as, God did set a Cherubin before the Garden of Eden; Collocavit Deus ante Paradisum voluptatis Cherubim, and Pererius himself acknowledgeth, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew. Posuit à parte Orientali borti Heden, Cherubin; He set on the East-side of the Garden of Heden, a Cherubin. BECANUS affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (Be) signifieth (with) as well as (in) and so the Text beareth this sense: That God planted a Garden with pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But Becanus followeth this construction, only to the end, to find Paradise upon the River of Afcenes: for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great abundance, which he supposeth to be the Tree of knowledge, of good and evil, and would therefore draw Paradise to the Fig-Tree: which conceit of his I will answer hereafter.

Now, because Paradise was seated by Moses toward the East, thence came the custom of praying toward the East, and not by imitation of the Chaldeans: and therefore all our Churches are built East and West, as to the point where the Sun riseth in March, which is directly over Paradise (saith Damasceus): affirming, that we always pray towards the East, as looking towards Paradise, whence we were cast out; and yet the Temple of Solomon had their Priests and Sacrifices, which turned themselves in their service and divine ceremonies, always towards the West, thereby to avoid the superfluous of the Egyptians and Chaldeans.

But because East and West are but in respect of places; (for although Paradise were East from Judea, yet it was West from Persia and the serving of God is every where in the world; the matter is not great which way we turn our faces, so our hearts stand right, other than this, that we who dwell West from Paradise, and pray turning our selves towards the East, may remember thereby to beseech God, that as by Adams fall we have lost the Paradise on earth; so by Christs death and passion we may be made partakers of the Paradise celestial, & the Kingdom of Heaven. To conclude, I conceive, that there was no other mystery in adding the word (East) to Eden by Moses, than to shew, that the Region of Eden, in which Paradise was, lay Eastward from Judea and Canaan: for the Scriptures always called the people of those Nations, the Sons of the East which inhabited Arabia, Mesopotamia, Chaldaea, and Persia: of which Ovid.

Enus ad Auroram, Nabateaq; regna recessit;

P. ridaq; & radiis juga subdita matinis

The East wind with Aurora hath a biding
Among the Arabian and the Persian Hills, Whom Phœbus first salutes at his first rising.

And if it be objected, that Hieremy the Prophet, threatening the destruction of Hierusalem, doth often make mention of Northern Nations; it is to be noted, that the North is there named, in respect of those Nations that followed Nabuchodonosor, and of whom the greatest part of his Army was compounded; not that Babylon it self stood North from Hierusalem, though inclining from the East towards the North.

Now to the difference of this Translation, Peter Comestor giveth best satisfaction: for so he useth the word, From the beginning, that is, from the first part of the World, (à principio) id est, (saith he) à prima orbis parte, and afterward he affirmeth, that à principio, and ad Orientem, have the same signification: From the beginning and Eastward is all one; à principio idem est quod ad Orientem.

But to return to the proof of this place, and that this story of Mankind was not Allegorical, it followeth in the Text of the 2. Chap. & 9. Verse, in these words: For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every Tree pleasant to the sight; and good for meat, &c. so as if it appeared that God created Adam else-where as in the World at large, and then put him into the Garden: and the end why, is exprest: that he might dress it and keep keep it; Paradise being a Garden or Orchard filled with Plants, and Trees, of the most excellent kinds, pleasant to behold, and (withal) good for meat: which proveth that Paradise was a terrestrial Garden, garnished with Fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to make it more plain, and to take away all opinion of Allegorical construction, he affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a River; expressing also the Region, out of which this River sprang, which he calleth Heden; and that Heden is also a Country neer unto Charon in Mesopotamia, Ezekiel witnesseth.

Ves. 10.
Ezek. 27. 23.

But to all these Cabalists, which draw the Truth and Story of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius answereth in these words: *Si Paradisus non est sensibilis, non est etiam sensus, si non est sensus, non est flumen, si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principia, non Pison, non Gebon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates, non est fons, non solus, non comeditur EV. a de arbore, non est ADAM, non sunt homines, sed veritas jam fabula est, & omnia ad Allegorias revocantur; If Paradise be not sensible, then there was no fountain, and then no river; if no river, then no such four heads or branches, and then not any such river, as Pison, or Gebon, Tigris, or Euphrates, no such fig-tree, or fruit, or leaves; EVE then did not eat of the fruit, neither was there any ADAM, or any man, the truth was but a fable, and all things esteemed are called back into Allegories. Words to the same effect hath S. Hierome upon DANIEL: *Contumeliant eorum deliramenta, qui umbras & imagines in veritate sequentes, ipsam conantur evertere veritatem, ut Paradisum & flumina, & arbores putant Allegoria Legibus se debere subire: Let the dotage of them be silent, who following shadows and images in the truth, endeavour to subvert the truth itself, and think that they ought to bring Paradise, and the Rivers, & the Trees under the Rules of Allegory.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Story, is the place made more manifest. For, God gave Adam free liberty to eat of every Tree of the Garden, (the Tree of knowledge excepted) which Trees Moses in the ninth verse saith that they were good to eat; meaning the fruit which they bare. Besides, God left all beasts to ADAM to be named, which he had formerly made; and these beasts were neither in the third heaven, nor neer the circle of the Moon, nor beasts in imagination: for if all these things were Enigmatical or mystical, the same might also be said of the creation of all things. And Ezekiel, speaking of the glory of the Assyrian Kings, useth this speech: All the trees of Eden, which were in the Garden of God, enjoyed him; which proveth both Eden, and Paradise therein seated, to be terrestrial: for the Prophets made no imaginary comparisons. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a simple stile, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, than in any other place of Scripture; of purpose to take away all scruple from the incredulity of future ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of Prophecy) to be apt to fabulous inventions, and that if he had not described both the Region and the Rivers, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the unbelieving Israelites, and others after them, would have misconstrued this Story of Mankind. And is it likely, there would have been so often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures, if the same had been an Utopia? For we finde that the Valley, wherein Sodom and Gomorrah stood, (sometimes called Pentapolis, of the five principal Cities therein) was before the destruction (which their unnatural sin purchased) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the Land of Egypt toward Zoar: In like manner was Israel resembled to the Paradise of God, before the Babylonians wasted it: which proveth plainly, that Paradise itself exceeded in beauty and fertility, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof: being compared to a feat and soyle of far exceeding excellency.

Besides, whence had Homer his invention of Alecinous Gardens, as Justin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gen. 2. and whence are their praises of the Elizian fields, but out of the story of Paradise? to which also appertain those verses of the Golden Age in Ovid:

Ovid. Metam. l. 2.

Ver erat eternum, placidique tepentibus auris Mulcebant Zephyrinum sine semine flores.

The joyful Spring did ever last, Sweet flowers by his gentle blast,
And Zephyrus did breed Without the help of Seed.

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hesiodus, and Homer, and after him, Ovid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their

Secta-

Sectatours, did greatly enrich their inventions, by venting the stolne Treasures of Divine Letters, altered by prophane additions, and disguised by poetical conversions, as if they had bin conceived out of their own speculations and contemplations.

But besides all these testimonies, if we finde what Region Heden or Eden was; if we prove the River that ran out of it, and that the same afterwards was divided into foure Branches; together with the kingdomes of Havila and Cush, and that all these are Eastward from Canaan, or the Defarts of the Amorites, where Moses wrote; I then conceive that there is no man that will doubt, but that such a place there was. And yet I doe not exclude the Allegorical sense of the Scripture; for as well in this there were many figures of Christ, as in all the old Testament throughout: the Story being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose (saith Saint Augustine) *Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententie: una est eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradisum intelligi volunt: alia eorum, qui spiritualiter tantum (id est) Ecclesiam: tertia eorum, qui utroque modo Paradisum accipiunt, (that is) There are three opinions of Paradise: the one of those men, which will have it altogether corporall: a second of those, which conceive it altogether spiritual, and to be a figure of the Church: the third of those which take it in both senses; which third opinion S. Augustine approveth, and of which Suidas giveth this allowable judgement: *Quemadmodum homo sensibilis, & intelligibilis simul conditus erat: sic & hujus sanctissimum nemus sensibile simul & intelligibile, & duplici specie est preditum; (that is) As man was created at one time both sensible and intelligible, so was this holy Grove or Garden to be taken both ways, and endued with a double forme.

§. IV.

Why it should be needfull to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

BUT it may be objected, that it is needlesse, and a kind of curiositie to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no use. To which I answer, that there is nothing written in the Scripture, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the Story be necessary, then by the place proved, the fame is also made more apparent. For if we should conceive that Paradise were not on the Earth, but lifted up as high as the Moone; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the known World, from whence Adam was said to wade through the Sea, and thence to have come into Judea, (out of doubt) there would be few men in the World, that would give any credit unto it. For what could seeme more ridiculous than the report of such a place? and besides, what maketh this seat of Paradise to much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Pishon should be Ganges, which watereth the East India, and Gebon, Nilus, which enricheth Egypt, and these two Rivers so farre distant, as (except all the World were Paradise) these streames can no way be comprised therein?

Secondly, if the birth and works, and death of our Saviour, were said to have beene in some such Countrey, of which no man ever heard tell, and that his Miracles had bin performed in the Ayre, or no place certainly knowne: I assure my selfe, that the Christian Religion would have taken but a slender root in the minds of men: for times and places are approved witnesses of worldly actions.

Thirdly, if we should rely, or give place to the judgement of some Writers upon this place of Genesis (though otherwise for their doctrine in generally, they are worthy of honour and reverence) I say that there is no fable among the Grecians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would believe that there were a piece of the World to let by it selfe and separated as to hang in the Ayre under the circle of the Moone? or who so doleth to conceive, that from thence the foure Rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tigris, should fall down, and run under all the Ocean, and rise up againe in this our habitable world, and in those places where they are now found? Which lest any man think that I enforce or strain to the worst, these are Peter Comestor's own words, Est autem locus amenissimus, longo terra & maris tractu a nostra habitabili Zona secretus, adeo elevatus, ut usq; ad lunarem globum attingat, &c. (that is) It is a most pleasant place, severed from our habitable Zone by a long tract of Land and Sea, elevated so that it reacheth to the globe of the Moone.

volumus, Paradisum multo sublimiore positum esse regione, atq; hac infra extet terra, eaq; circum illinc per precipitum delabantur fluvii tanto cum impetu, quantum verbis exprimere non possis; eaq; impetu impulsis pressisq; sub Oceani vado rapiuntur, unde rursus proflant ebulliantq; in hoc a nobis culto orbe: which have this sense: Furthermore (saith he) we give this for an answer, that Paradise is set in a Region farre raised above this part which wee inhabit; whereby it comes to passe, that from thence these rivers fall downe with such a headlong violence, as words cannot expresse; and with that force so impulsed and press'd, they are carried under the deep Ocean, and do again rise and boyle up in this our habitable World: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephram, which is this. Ephram dicit Paradisum ambire terram, atq; ultra Oceanum ita positum esse, ut totum terrarum orbem ab omni circumdet regione, non aliter atq; Lunæ orbis Lunam cingit; (which is) That Paradise doth compass or embrace the whole Earth, and is so set beyond the Ocean Sea, as it environeth the whole Orbe of the Earth on every side, as the Orbe of the Moon doth embrace like Moone. To the end therefore that these ridiculous expositions and opinions do not bring question unto Truth it selfe, or make the same subject to doubts or disputes, it is necessary to discover the true place of Paradise, which God in his wisdom appointed in the very Navell of this our World, and (as Melancthon saies) in parte terre meliore, in the best part thereof, that from thence, as from a Center, the Univerfall might be filled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, we shall the better judge of the beginning of Nations, and of the worlds inhabitation: for neere unto this did the Sons of Noah also disperse themselves after the flood into all other remote regions and countries. And if it be a generous desire in men, to know from whence their owne forefathers have come, and out of what regions and Nations, it cannot be displeasing to understand the place of our first Antecessor, from whence all the streames and branches of Mankind have followed and bin deduced. If then it doe appeare by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be unprofitable, it followeth in order to examine several opinions before remembered, by the Truth it selfe; and to see how they agree with the sense of the Scripture, and with common reason, and afterward to prove directly, and to delineate the Region in which God first planted this delightful Garden.

§. V.

That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

And first, whereas it is supposed by Aug. Chrysostomus, that the Flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no man can find any mark or memorie thereof: (of which opinion there were others also, ascribing to the Flood the cause of those high Mountaines, which are found on all the Earth over, with many other strange effects) for mine own opinion, I think neither the one nor the other to be true. For although I cannot deny, but that the face of Paradise was after the Flood withered, and grown old, in respect of the first beaurie: (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed) yet if there had beene no signe of any such place, or if the soile and seate had not remained, then would not Moses, who wrote of Paradise about 850. years after the Flood, have described it so particularly, and the Prophets long after Moses would not have made so often mention thereof. And though the very Garden it selfe were not then to be found, but that the Flood, and other accidents of time made it one commonfield and pasture with the Land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the Rivers still remaine the same Rivers. By two of which (never doubted of) to wit Tigris and Euphrates, we are sure to finde in what longitude Paradise lay; and learning our one of these Rivers, which afterward doth divide it self into foure branches, we are sure that the partition is at the very border of the Garden it self. For it is written, that out of Eden went a River to water the Garden, and from thence it was divided, and became into foure heads; Now whether the word in the Latine Translation (Inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it self, or to Paradise, yet the division and branching of those rivers must be in the North or South side of the very Garden (if the rivers run as they doe, North and South) & therefore these rivers yet remaining, & Eden manifestly known, there could be no such defacing by the flood, as is supposed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be so altered as future ages knew it not, so is there no probability that either these Rivers were turned out of their courses, or new rivers created by the Flood which were not, or that the Flood (as aforesaid) by a violent motion, when it began to decrease, was the cause of high Hills or deep Valleys. For what descent of waters could there be in a Spherical and round body, wherein there is no high nor low? seeing that all violent force of waters is either by the strength of winde, by descent from a higher to a lower, or by the ebb or flood of the Sea. But that there was any wind (whereby the Seas are most enraged) it appeareth not, rather the contrary is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a winde to pass upon the Earth, and the waters ceased. Gen. 8.1.

So as it appeareth not, that, until the waters sank, there was any winde at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodnes, caused the winde to blow, to dry up the abundant slime and mud of the Earth, and make the Land more firm, and to cleanse the Aire of thick vapours, and unwholsom mists: and this we know by experience, that all down-right rains do evermore disperse the violence of outrageous winds, and beat down, and level the swelling and mountainous billow of the Sea: for any ebbs and floods there could be none, when the waters were equall and of one height over all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indraghs, Bayes, or Gulfs to receive a Flood, or any descent, or violent falling of waters in the round form of the Earth and Waters, as aforesaid: and therefore it seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the waters rather stood in a quiet calm, than that they moved with any raging or overbearing violence. And for a more direct proofe that the Flood made no such destroying alteration, Josephus avoweth that one of those pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be seen in his daies; which pillars were set up above 1426. years before the Flood, counting Seth to be an hundred years old at the erection of them; and Joseph himself to have lived some forty or fifty years after Christ: of whom although there be no cause to believe all that he wrote, yet that which he avouched of his own time, cannot (without great derogation) be called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruine thereof might then be seen. Now that such pillars were raised by Seth, all Antiquity hath avowed. It is also written in Beresius (to whom although I give little credit, yet I cannot condemn him in all) that the city of Enoch, built by Cain about the mountains of Libanus, was not defaced by length of time: yea the ruines thereof Annius (who commented upon that invented fragment) saith, were to be seen in his daies, who lived in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile. And if these his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent: for, speaking of this City of Enoch, he concludeth in this sort: Cujus maxima & ingentis molis fundamenta visuntur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Civitas Cain, ut nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt; The foundation of which huge Mass is now to be seen, and the place is called by the people of that Region, the City of Cain, as both our strangers and Merchants report. It is also avowed by Pomponius Mela (to whom I give more credit in these things) that the City of Joppa was built before the Flood, over which Cepha was King: whose name, with his brother Phineus, together with the grounds and principles of their Religion, was found graven upon certain altars of stone. And it is not impossible, that the ruines of this other Cite, called Enoch by Annius, might be seen, though founded in the first Age: but it could not be of the first City of the World, built by Cain, the place rather than the time denying it.

And to prove directly that the Flood was not the cause of mountaines, but that there were mountaines from the Creation, it is written, that the waters of the Flood overflowed by fifteen Cubits the highest Mountaine. And Masius Damascenus, speaking of the flood, writeth in this manner: Est supra Minyadam excelsum mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo confingentes multos sermo est diluvii tempore liberatos. And upon Minyada there is an high Mountain in Armenia (called Baris) unto which (as it is said) that many fled in the time of the Deluge, and that they saved themselves thereon. Now although it is contrary to Gods Word, that any more were saved than eight persons (which Masius doth not avouch, but by report) yet it is a testimony, that such Mountaines were before the Flood, which were afterwards, and ever since, knowne by the same names; and on which Mountaines it is generally received that the Arke rested: but untruly, as I shall prove hereafter. And again it appeareth, that the Mount Sion (though by another name) was knowne before the Flood; on which the Thalmudists report, that many Giants saved them-themselves also; but, as Annius saith, without all authority, either divine or humane.

Gen. 8. 11.

Lastly, it appeareth that the Flood did not so turn upside down the face of the Earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this, that when NOAH sent out the Dove the second time, she returned with an Olive leaf in her mouth, which he had pluckt, and which (until the Trees were discovered) she found not: for otherwise she might have found them floating on the water; a manifest proof, that the Trees were not torn up by the roots, nor swam upon the waters, for it is written: fallunt Olive, raptum, & decerpunt, a leaf pluckt, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to tear off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written to the contrary) that the Flood made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seen to succeeding Ages, especially unto Moses, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the Worlds Creation, and unto the Prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this Discovery.

§. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some have thought: making the Ocean to be the fountain of those four Rivers.

Gen. 1. 28.
Ab. 17. 26.

Gen. 2. 8.

3. 24.

THIS conceit of Aug. Chrysostomus being answered, who onely giveth his opinion for reason, I will in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Noviomagus, Vadianus, Goropius, Becanus, and all those that understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many words, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembered, this Universality will appear altogether improper. The places which Vadianus alledgeth, Bring forth fruit and multiply, fill the Earth and subdue it, rule over every Creature, &c. with this of the A&S, and hath made of one blood all Mankind, to dwell on all the face of the Earth, do no way prove such a generality: for the World was made for man, of which he was Lord and Governour, and all things therein were ordained of God for his use. Now although all men were of one and the same fountain of blood originally; and Adam's posterity inhabited in process of time over all the face of the earth; yet it disproveth in nothing the particular Garden, assigned to Adam, to dress and cultivate, in which he lived in blessed estate before his transgression. For if there had been no other choice, but that Adam had bin left to the Universal; Moses would not then have said, Eastward in Eden, seeing the World hath not East nor West but respectively. And to what end had the Angel of God been set to keep the East-side, and entrance into Paradise after Adam's expulsion, if the Universal had been Paradise? for then must Adam have been chased also out of the World. For if all the earth were Paradise, that place can receive no better construction than this, That Adam was driven out of the World into the World, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except we should believe with Meiradorius, that there were infinite Worlds. Which to deny, he thinks all one, as to affirm, That in so large a field, as the Universal, there should grow but one Thistle. NOVIOMAGUS upon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it was impossible for those three Rivers, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates (which water three portions of the World so far distant) to rise out of one Fountaine, except the Ocean be taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden.

And it is true, that those four Rivers, being so understood, there could be no conjecture more probable; but it shall plainly appear, that Pison was fallily taken for Ganges, and Gehon fallily for Nilus, although Ganges be a River by Havilah in India, and Nilus run through Ethiopia. The seventy write Chus for Ethiopia, and thereby the errors of the Manichees, and the mistakings of Noviomagus, Goropius, and Vadianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their conjecture far more probable, than that of Ephrem, Cyrillus, and Athanasius: That Paradise was seated far beyond the Ocean Sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the Country in which he was created, and was buried at Mount Calvary in Hierusalem. And certainly, though all those of the first Age were of great stature, and so continued many years after the Flood, yet Adam's shin-bones must have contained a thousand fadome, and much more, if he had forded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needs no argument to disprove it.

§. VII.

§. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moon: and of others, which make it higher than the Middle Region of the Ayre.

THIRDLY, whereas Beda saith, and as the Schoolemen affirme, Paradise to be a Place altogether removed from the knowledge of men, (locus à cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Barcephas conceived, that Paradise was far in the East, but mounted above the Ocean, and all the Earth, and neer the Orbe of the Moone (which opinion, though the Schoolemen charge Beda withall, yet Pererius layes it off from Beda upon Strabus, and his Master Rabanus:) and whereas Rupertus, in his Geographic of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but findes it seated next or neereft heaven; It may seeme, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates: but neither of them (as I conceive) well understood; who (undoubtedly) tooke this place for Heaven it selfe, into which the Soules of the blessed were carried after death.

True it is, that these Philosophers durst not for feare of the Areopagites (in this and many other divine apprehensions) set downe what they beleaved in plain termes, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death for acknowledging one onely powerfull God; and therefore did the Devill himselfe doe him that right, as by an Oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Justin Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and S. Augustine gave this judgement of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to me, that both Tertullian and Eusebius conceive, that Socrates, by that place aforesaid, meant the celestiall Paradise, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightfull, and healthfull upon the top of Mount Atho (called Acrothonos) which being above all Clouds of Raine, or other inconvenience, the people (by reason of their so many yeeres) are called Macrobici (that is) Long-lived. A further Argument is used, for proove of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch preserved from the violence of the Flood: approved by Isidore, and Peter Lombard: in which place also Tertullian conceived, that the blessed Soules were preserved till the last judgement; which Irenaeus and Justin Martyr also beleaved. But this opinion was of all Catholique Divines reproved, and in the Florentine Councell damned; of which Saint Augustine more modestly gave this judgment: Sicut certum est, ENOCH et ELIAM nunc vivere: ita ubi nunc sunt: an in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est; (that is) As it is certaine that ENOCH and ELIAS doe now live, so where they live, in Paradise or elsewhere it is uncertaine. But Barcephas gives a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessary that Paradise should be set at such a distance and height, because the foure Rivers (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not have had sufficient force to have thrust themselves under the great Ocean, and afterward have forced their passage through the earth, and have risen again in the farre distant Regions of India, Egypt, and Armenia.

These strange fancies and dreams have been answered by divers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins, and Pererius, writing upon this subject; of whose arguments I will repeat these few: for to use long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly be judged a vanity in the Answerer, not much inferior to that of the Inventer.

It is first therefore alledged, that such a place cannot be commodious to live in: for being set so neere the Moone, it had beene too neer the Sun, and other heavenly bodies. Secondly, because it must have been too joynt a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the ayre in that Region is so violently moved, and carried about with such swiftness, as nothing in that place can consist or have abiding. Fourthly, because the place between the Earth and the Moon (according to Ptolemy and Alfraganus) is seventeen times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes in a gross account about one hundred and twenty thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise, being raised to this height, must have the compasse of the whole earth for a Basis and foundation. But had it beene so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men: seeing it would deprive us of the Suns light, all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortifie the former opinions, Tostatus addeth this, that those people which dwell neer those fals of waters, are deaf from their infancy, like those that dwell neer the Catadupe, or over-fals of Nilus. But this I hold as feigned. For I have seen in the Indies, far greater water-fals, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling neer them are not deaf at all. Tostatus (the better to strengthen himself) citeth Basil and Ambrose together: to which Pererius, Sed ego hac apud Basilium & Ambrosium in coram scriptis, que nunc extant, nusquam me legere meini; But I do not remember (saith he) that I ever read those things either in BASIL or AMBROSE.

1 Pet. 2. 12.

Gen. 7. 19.

Exod. 14. 21.

But for the bodies of Enoch and Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his wisdom. Their taking up might be into the celestial Paradise, for ought we know. For although flesh and blood, subject to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdom of heaven, and the seed must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith Saint Paul) but all shall be changed: which change in Enoch and Elias, was easie to him that is Almighty. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest, that by the Flood all perished on the earth, saving 8 persons; and therefore in the terrestrial Paradise they could not be. For Tostatus his own opinion, who soared not altogether so high as the rest, but believed that Paradise was raised above the middle Region of the Aire, and twenty cubits above all Mountains, that the Flood did not therefore reach it: (which Scotus and other latter School-men also believed; for, say they, there were no inner in Paradise, and therefore no cause to overwhelm it:) this is also contrary to the expresse letter of the Scripture, which directly, and without admitting of any distinction, teacheth us, that the waters over-flowed all the mountains under heaven. And were it otherwise, then might we awfull give credit to Masius, Damasceus, and the Thalmudists, who affirme, that there were of the Giants that saved themselves on the Mountain Baris, and on Sion. But to help this, Scotus, being (as the rest of the Schoolmen are) full of distinction, saith; That the waters stood at Paradise, as they did in the Red Sea, and at Jordan; and as the Flood was not natural, so was Paradise saved by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifieth this high conceit with this supposition, That it was not believed, that Paradise was so seated, as Beda and others seem to affirme in words, but by Hyperbole and comparatively, for the delicacy and beauty so resembled. But this I dare avow of all those School-men, that though they were exceeding witty, yet they better teach all their Followers to flist, than to resolve by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tostatus, I confesse that it is written, that the Mountains of Olympus, Atho, and Atlas, over-reach and surmount all windes and clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the Hills both springs and fruits; and the Pagan Priests, sacrificing on these mountain tops, do not find the ashes (remaining of their sacrifices) blown thence, nor thence waft off by rains, when they returne: yet experience hath resolved us, that these reports are fabulous; and Pliny himself (who was not sparing in the report of wonders) avoweth the contrary. But were it granted, and yet the height of these Mountains is far under the supposed place of Paradise; and on these self Hills the aire is so thin (saith S. Augustine, whom herein I mistrust) that it is not sufficient to bear up the body of a bird, having therein no feeling of her wings, or any sensible resistance of aire to mount her self by.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that seat Paradise under the Equinoctial: and of the pleasant habitation under those Climats.

Those which come neerer unto Reason, finde Paradise under the Equinoctial Line, as Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus: judging, that thereunder might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertility of soile: but against it Thomas Aquinas objecteth the distemperate heat, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly under the Sunne; but this is (non causa pro causa), for although Paradise could not be under the Line, because Eden is far from it, in which Paradise was; and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tygris, or Ganges under it, (Ganges being one of the foure rivers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of distemper, (being but an old opinion) is found to be very untrue, though for the conjecture not to be condemned, considering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it it appeared, that every Country, as it lay by degrees neerer the Tropicke, and so toward the Equinoctial, did so much the more exceed in heat; it was therefore a reasonable conjecture, that those Countries which were situated directly under it, were of a distemper uninhabitable: but it seemeth that Tertullian conceived better, and so did Avicenne, for they both thought them habitable enough; and though (perchance) in those daies it might be thought a fantastical opinion (as all are which go against the vulgar) yet we now finde, that if there be any place upon the earth of that nature, beauty, and delight that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed uninhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and neerest to the line it self. For here, 10 of Experience hath informed Reason, and Time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden and could not by any contemplation be discovered. Indeed it hath so pleased God to provide for all living creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that such inconveniences which we contemplate a far off, are found by trial and the witness of men's travails, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vain, or as a fruitles lump to fashion out the rest. For God himself (saith ISA Y) that he formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we finde that these hottest Regions of the world, seated under the Equinoctial line, or neer it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of Easternly winde (which the Spaniards call the Brize) that doth evermore blow strongest in the heat of the day, 20 as the down-right beams of the Sun cannot so much maste it, that there is any inconvenience or distemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh, and equal, by reason of the entire interposition of the earth, as (for those places which my self have seen, neer the Line and under it) I know no other part of the World of better, or equal temper: Only there are some tracts, which by accident of high Mountains are barr'd from this ayre and fresh winde, and some few sandy parts without trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest; and such difference of soils we finde also in all other parts of the world. But (for the greatest part) those Regions have so many goodly Rivers, Fountains, and little Brookes, abundance of high Cedars, and other stately trees, casting shade, so many sorts of delicate fruits, ever bearing, and at all times beautified with blossom and fruit both green and ripe, as it may of all other parts be best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughs and branches are never unclothed and left naked, their sap creepeth not under ground into the root, fearing the injury of the frost: neither doth Pomona any time despise her withered Husband Vertumnus, in his winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these Countries called Terra vitiosa, Vicious Countries: for Nature being liberal to all without labour, necessity imposing no industry or travel, idleness bringeth forth no other fruits than vain thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion, were not deceived in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who mistaked this opinion, and followed a worse. And (to say the truth) all the Schoolmen 40 were gross in this particular.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Clelosyria, there is a Country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proved out of ESA. 37. and EZEK. 27.

These opinions answered, and the region of Eden not found in any of those imaginary worlds, nor under Torrida Zona; it followeth that now we discover and find out the seat thereof, for in it was Paradise by God planted. The difficulty of which search resteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations have often changed names with their 50 Masters; so are most of these places, by Moses remembered, forgotten by those names of all Historians and Geographers, as well ancient as modern.

Besides, we finde that the Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes and Persians (Cyrus onely and a few other excepted) fought to extinguish the Hebrews. The Grecians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romans despised once to remember them in any of their Stories. And as those three Monarchies succeeded each other: so did they transform the names of all those principal Places and Cities in the East: and after them, the Turks hath sought (what he could) to extinguish in all things, the ancient memory of those people; which he hath subjected and inthralled.

Now besides those notable marks, Euphrates and Tygris; the better to finde the way which leadeth to the Country of Eden, we are to take for guides these two considerations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan and Judea; and that it was of all other the most beautiful and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Country to Judea Eastward was Arabia Petraea; but in this Region was Moses himself when he wrote: and the next unto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desert, both which in respect of the infertility could not be Eden; neither have any of the Arabians any such Rivers, as are exprest to run out of it: So as it followeth of necessity, that Eden must be Eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petraea, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it self, and by the fertility, and the rivers only described, we must seek it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour Nations better described. In the Prophet Isay I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent Countries, in these words, spoken in the person of Senacherib by RABSAKEH: Have the gods of the Nations delivered them, which my Fathers have destroyed, as GOSAN, and HARAN, and RESEPH, and the children of EDEN, which were at Telassar? and in Ezechiel, where he prophesieth against the Tyrians: They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Assur, and Chilmad, were thy merchants, &c.

But to avoid confusion, we must understand that there were two Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembereth, where he divideth Syria into three Provinces, whereof, the first he maketh Syria Damascene, or Decapollitan: the second part is that Valley called Averis, otherwise Conualis, or the tract of Chamath, where Assyria is joyned to Arabia the Desert, and where Ptolomee placeth the City of Averia: and the third is knowne by the name of Domus Edenis, or Cœlosyria, otherwise Vallis cava, or the hollow Valley, because the mountains of Libanus and Antilibanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Cœle in Greek is Cava in Latine. But this is not that Eden, which we seek: neither doth this Province lie East from Canaan, but North, and so joyneth unto it, as it could not be unknown to the Hebrews. Yet, because there is a little City there in called Paradise, the Jews believed this Cœlosyria to be the same which Moses describeth. For the same cause doth Hopkins in his Treatise of Paradise reprehend Beroldus, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradise, though, to give Beroldus his right, I conceive that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other later Writers, saying, That he failed in distinguishing these two Regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether mis-understood two of the four Rivers (to wit) Pison and Gehon, as shall appear hereafter. Now to finde out Eden, which (as Moses teacheth us) lay Eastward from the Deserts, where he wrote, after he had passed the Red Sea; we must consider where those other Countries are found, which the Prophet Isay and Ezechiel joyneth with it. For (saith ESAIAS) Gosan, Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar. Also Ezechiel joyneth Haran with Eden, who together with those of Sheba, Assur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the City of Tyre, which was then (saith EZECHIEL) The Mart of the people for many Isles. And it hath ever been the custome, that the Persians conveyed their Merchandise to Babylon, and to those Cities upon Euphrates, and Tygris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterranean Sea: as in ancient times to the City of Tyre, afterward to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Issius, now Lajazzo. Ezechiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the only Mart-towne of that part of the World, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and also what commodities every Countrey yielded; and having counted the several People and Countries, he addeth the particular trade, which each of them exercised: They were thy merchants (saith the Prophet) in all sorts of things, in raiments of blue silke, and of broyered workes, fine linnen, corral, and pearle: and afterwards speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and what kinds they traded, he hath these words: The merchants of Sheba, and Raamah were thy merchants, they occupied in thy Fairs, with the chief of all Spices, and with all precious stones, and gold. Now these be indeed the riches which Persia & Arabia Felix yield: and because Sheba and Raamah are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Persian Gulfe, therefore did those Nations both vent such Spice, sweet Gummes, and Pearls, as their owne Countries yielded: and and (withal) having trade with their Neighbours of India, had from them also all sorts of spices, and plenty of gold. The better to convey these commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shebans or Arabians entred by the mouth of Tygris, and from the City of Teredon (built or enlarged by Nebuchodonosor, now called Balsara) thence sent up all these rich merchandises by boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as far as it bended Westward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reacheth within three daies journey of Aleppo, and then over Land they paff to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripoly, (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforesaid. Now the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezechiel joyneth with Eden, inhabited far up the River, and received this trade from Arabia and India, besides those proper commodities which themselves had, and which they received out of Persia, which bordered them. Saint Hierome understandeth by Canneh, Seleucia, which is seated upon Euphrates, where it breaketh into four heads, and which took that name from Selenus, who made thereof a magnificent City. Hierosolymitanus thinks it to be Ctesiphon: but Ctesiphon is seated down low upon Tygris, and Canneh cannot be on that side. I mean on the East-side of Tygris; for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. I mean placeth the Schenite upon Euphrates, where the same beginneth to be foordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaveth to be the bound of Arabia the Desert, and where the River of Euphrates reflecteth from the Desert of Palmirena: so for these people of Canneh (afterward Schenite) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselves, from their own City of Canneh in Shinar Westward along the banks of Euphrates, as far as the City of Thapsacus, where Ptolomee appointed the Forde of Euphrates: which also agreeth with the description of the Schenite by Strabo, whose words are these: Mercatoribus ex Syria Seleuciam & Babyloni am emittibus, iter est per Schenites: The Merchants which travail from Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore those which take Canneh for Charran, do much mis-take it. For Charran, to which Abraham came from Ur in Chaldaea (called by God) standeth also in Mesopotamia; not upon Euphrates it self, but upon the River of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are distinctly named with those of Canneh in Ezechiel (as) They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the Merchants of Sheba, Assur and Chilmad were thy merchants. Wherefore Charran, which is sometime called Charre, and Haran, and Aran, is but the same Charran of Mesopotamia; and when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the region of Mesopotamia: or Aran fluviorum, the Greek word (Mesopotamia) importing, a country between rivers: for Mes in Greek, is Medius in Latine, and Potamos, fluvius; and when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the City it self, to which Abraham came from Ur (as aforesaid.) For Strabo in the description of Arabia, giveth that tract of land from the borders of Cœlosyria, to the edge of Mesopotamia, to the Schenite, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrates, and were in after-ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabit Batanea, and the North part of the Deserts, stretching themselves toward the uninhabited solitude of Palmirena, which lieth between Syria, and Arabia the Desert. So as these of Canneh lay in the very high-way from Babylon to Tyre, and were neighbours (indifferent) to Charran and to Eden: and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezechiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, &c. But Saint Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneh, or Chalne, by Seleucia: for Seleucia was anciently called Chalanne (witness Appian) and so Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his Commentaries upon Genesis; the name by time and mixture of languages being changed from Chalne or Canneh, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other Cities, standing in Triangle with Seleucia, and almost the next unto it, (as) Thelbe-canne, and Mann-canne, the one a little to the West of Seleucia, and the other opposite unto it; where these rivers of Tygris and Euphrates are ready to joine. Therefore, which of these the ancient Canne was, (being all three within the bound of the Valley Shinar) it is uncertain: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certain seat thereof, that so many other cities did retain a part of the name in so many ages after. Neither is it unlikely, that these additions of Thelbe and Man to the word Canne, were but to make difference between the East and the West, or the greater and the less Canne, or between Canne the old and the new: which additions to distinguish cities by, are ordinary in all the Regions of the World.

Jud. 1.

Now of the other city joyned with Eden, as Haran or Charran, S. Hierome on the Judges speaketh thereof in these words: Cumq; reverterentur, pervenerunt ad Charran, que est in medio itinere contra Ninevum, undecimo die; When they returned, they came to Charran (which is the mid-way against Nineve) the eleventh day.

Acts 7. 1.

This city is by the Martyr Stephen named Charran (speaking to the high Priest:) Tee Men, Brethren, and Fathers, hearken: The God of glory appeared to our Father ABRAHAM, while he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran. But the seat of this city is not doubted of: for it is not onely remembered in many Scriptures, but, withal, exceeding famous for the death and overthrow of Craffus the Roman, who for his unsatiable greediness was called Gorgas avaritie; & the Gulf of avarice. Whereof Lucan:

Lucan. l. 1. 105.

Assyria Latio maculavit sanguine Carras.

With Roman blood th' Assyrian Carre he defild.

Gen. 10. 10.

But this city Canne or Chalne is made manifest by Moses himself, where it is written of NIMROD: And the beginning of his Kingdoms was Babel, and Erech, and Acad, and Chalm, in the land of Sinaar or Shinar: where Moses sheweth the first composition of the Babylonian Empire, and what cities and people were subject unto Nimrod, all which lay in the said Valley of Shinar, or near it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract afterwards called Babylonia and Chalda, into which also Eden stretcheth it self. Chaldea, Babylonia, Sinaar, idem sunt (saith COMESTOR.) Three names of one Country: which Region of Babylonia took name of the Tower Babel; and the Tower of the confusion of tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proved in the eleventh chapter of Genesis, in these words: And as they went from the East, they found a Plain in the Land of Shinar, and there they abode: in which Plain Babylon was built (as aforesaid.)

Vesf. 2.

Now Shinar being Babylonia, and Canneh, in the first beginning of Nimrod's greatness, and before he had subdued any strange, or far-off Nations, being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Moses to be in Shinar, it proveth that Canneh joyneth to Babylonia; which also Ezechiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth that those of Eden were also the Merchants which traded with the Tyrians: and Esay in the threats of Senacherib against Jerusalem (with other Nations that Senacherib vaunted that his Fathers had destroyed) nameth the children of Eden, which were at Telassar.

Vesf. 7.

But before I conclude where Eden it self lieth, it is necessary to describe those other Countries, which Ezechiel joyneth therewith, in the places before remembered, as, those of Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Genesis the tenth: Moreover the sons of HAM were CUSH, &c. And the sons of CUSH were SEBA, and HAVILAH, and SABTAH, and RAAMAH, &c. And the sons of RAAMAH were SHEBA, &c. and anon after; CUSH begat NIMROD: so as Sheba was the grand-child of CUSH, and Nimrod the son of CUSH, whose elder brother was Sebah: though some there are that conceive to the contrary, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and understanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built; afterwards Babylonia. His brother Raamah or Hagma took that part adjoining to Shinar, toward the Sea side and Persian gulf (called afterwards Raama and Sheba, by the Father and his Sons, which possessed it.) For (saith EZECHIEL) the merchants of Raamah and Sheba were thy merchants; they occupied in buy Fair with the chief of all spices, and all precious stones, and gold. So as Sheba was that Tract of Country, which pattieth Arabia Deserta from Arabia Felix, and which joyneth to the Sea where Tygris and Euphrates fall out, and render themselves to the Ocean. This part, and the confining Country, Strabo calleth Catabria, where the best Myrrhe and Frankincense is gathered; which people have an interchange or trade with Elana, lying on the East side of the Persian gulf. By this it appeareth who were the Shebeans, spoken of by Ezechiel, and said to have been the Merchants of Tyre, for gold, spices, and precious stones: of which they had not only plenty of their own, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elana, according to Strabo) for the exchange of their Aromatiques, and other proper commodities.

Strabo l. 16.

For as Strabo reporteth out of ERATOSTHENES: In Persie ora initio Infida est, in qua multi & pretiosi nomines gigantur: in aliis vero, clari & perlicendi lapilli. ERATOSTHENES (saith Strabo) affirmeth, that in the beginning of the Persian gulf, there is an Island, in which there are many precious pearls bred: and in other, very clear and shining stones. Now, the difference between Sheba, the son of Raamah, and Seba the son of CUSH, is in this, That Seba is written with the Hebrew (Samech) and Seba with (Schin) but whatsoever the difference may be in the Hebrew Orthography, their Countries and Habitations are divers. For Sheba is that which bordereth the Persian Sea, and Saba (whence the Queen of Saba) neighboured the Red Sea; and so that place of the 72 Psalms expounded Reges Arabum & Saba, hath in the Hebrew this sense: Reges Sheba & Saba.

The Shebans, Ezechiel nameth together with the Edenites, because they inhabited upon the Out-let of the same River, upon which the Edenites were feated: and so those of Sheba, towards the Sea-coast, and upon it past up the Country, by Tygris and Euphrates, being joyned in one maine stream, and so through the Region of Eden, which Tygris boundeth, thereby the better to convey their merchandize toward Tyre. And as the Cities of Charran, and Channeh, border Eden on the West and North-west: so doth Sheba on the South, and Chilmad on the North-east: Chilmad being a Region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldaean Paraphrast; which Country by the Geographers is called Coromitena, (L) placed by exchange for (R) which change the Hebrews also often use.

Thus much of those Countries which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chief were the Edenites, inhabiting Telassar: for these Senacherib vaunted, that his Fathers had destroyed; and this place of Telassar lay most convenient, both to receive the Trade from Sheba & Arabia, and also to convey it over into Syria, and to Tyrus. Now to make these things the more plaine, we must remember, that before the death of Senacherib, many parts of the Babylonian Empire fell from his obedience, and after his death these Monarchies were utterly dis-joyned.

For it appeareth both in Esay the 37. and in the second of Kings, by the threats of Rabshake, the while the Army of Assyria lay before Jerusalem, that the Cities of Gofan, Haran, Refeph, and the Edenites at Telassar, had resisted the Assyrians: though by them (in a fort) mastered and recovered. Have the gods of the Nations delivered them whom my Fathers have destroyed as Gofan, and Haran, Refeph, & the children of Eden, which were at Telassar? But it appeared manifestly after Senacherib's death, that these Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others subjection: for Efar-Haddon held Assyria, and Merodach Baladan, Babylonia. And after that the Army of Senacherib, commanded by Rabshake which lay before Jerusalem (Ezechias then reigning) while Senacherib was in Egypt, was by the Angel of God destroyed; the King of Babel sent to Ezechias, both to congratulate the recovery of his health, and his victory obtained over the Assyrians. After which overthrow, Senacherib himselfe was slaine by his own sonnes in the Temple of his Idols, Efar-Haddon succeeding him in Assyria. To the Babylonian Ambassadors sent by Merodach, Ezechias shewed all his treasures, as well proper as consecrate, which invited the Kings of Babylon afterward to undertake their conquest and subversion. So as, the suspicion of warre encreasing between Babylon and Assyria, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Assyria, were employed to beare off the incursions of the Assyrians; and their Garrison-place was at Telassar: and the very word (Telassar) (saith Junius, signifying as much as a bulwork against the Assyrians. This place Hiero Solymitanus takes for Resem, others for Seleucia: but this Telassar is the same, which Am. Marcellinus in the History of Julian (whom he followed in the enterprise of Persia) calleth Thilutha in stead of Telassar, who describeth the exceeding strength thereof in his 24. Booke. It is seated in an Island of Euphrates upon a steep and unsailable Rocke, in so much as the Emperour Julian durst not attempt it; and therefore it was a convenient place for a Garrison against the Assyrians, being also a passage out of Mesopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edenites of the Country adjoining were so lodged to defend the same. This place Strabo calleth Teridara, having Refeph (which he calleth Refepha) on the left hand, and Canneh (which he calleth Thelmo-canne) on the right hand; not far from whence is also found the City of Manna-canne upon Tygris and all these seated together, as Esay and Ezechiel have sored them. But the understanding of these places is the more difficult, because Assyria (which the Chaldeans call Atturia) and Mesopotamia, were so often confounded; the one taken for the other by interchange of Dominion. Assyria & Mesopotamia in Babylonian nomen transharan (saith NIGER.) Assyria and Mesopotamia took the name of Babylonia. Lastly, it appeareth by those adjacent Regions by the Prophets named, in what part of the World Eden is seated seated, as, by Charan or Haran in Mesopotamia: also by Cannah and de Jeph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in these words translateth this place: Plantaverat autem JEHOVAH Dens hortum in Eden, ab Oriente: The Lord God planted a Garden in Eden, Eastward: that is (saith he in his Annotations) Jussit ut nasci arbores in Eden, Regione Orientali, in finibus Arabia & Mesopotamiae; He commanded Trees to grow in Eden, an Easterne Region in the borders of Arabia and Mesopotamia.

§. X.

Of divers other testimonies of the Land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

Uti supra.

And for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it seemes by the two Epistles of the Nestorian Christians, that inhabit Mesopotamia: that Epistles in the year 1552. they sent to the Pope about the confirming of their Patriarch, & Andreas Masius hath published them, translated out of Syriac into Latine. By these Epistles (I say) it seemes we may have some farther light for the proofe of that, which we have said about the Region of Eden in those parts. For in them both there is mention of the Island of Eden in the River Tigris, or at least, Tigris in both these Epistles is called the River of Eden. This Island, as Masius in his Preface to these Epistles saith, is commonly called Gozoria (as it were, the Island, by an eminency.) It hath (saith he) ten miles in circuit, and was sometimes walled round about, which name of the Island Eden may (doublelesse) remaine to this day; though in the rest of the Region so called, this name be swallowed up with the fame of those flourishing kingdomes of Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia, and Chaldaea. This Island of Eden hath up the River, and not far beyond it, the City of Hafan-Cepha, otherwise Fortis Petra: below it, it hath Mofal or Mosel, from which (as in that which followeth it shall appear out of Masius) it is not above twelve miles distant. Neither is it to trouble us, that Mofal or Mosel, by Marius Niger is remembred among the Cities higher up Tigris, in these words, Juxta autem Tigrim, Civitates sunt Dorbeta prope Taurum montem, que nunc Mosel dicitur; magna sane, &c. (that is) By Tigris are these Cities, Dorbeta neere unto mount Taurus: (which is now called Mosel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, displacing Mosel, and making it to be Dorbeta (I say) needs not here to trouble us: seeing for this matter, the testimony of Masius, informed by the Christians that dwelt there the Seat of whole Patriarch it is) ought to be of credit, avowing that this Mofal (or Mozal) is in the Confines of Mesopotamia and Assyria, seated upon Tigris, and in the neighbour-hood of Nineve; and that it is the famous Seleucia Parthorum. The Nestorian Christians in their former Epistle, call it Attur, in these words: Ex omnibus Civitatibus & pagis que sunt circum Civitatem Mosal (hoc est) Attur in vicinia Nineve; Of all the Cities and Townes which are about the Citie of Mosal (that is) Attur in the neighbour-hood of Nineve. As also Niger acknowledgeth Ctesiphon, a City thereabout to be called Assur, (which is the same as Attur, after the Diallect of those Nations, which change sh into T.) Neither is it much that he should mistake Ctesiphon, (which is not farre off Seleucia) for Seleucia, to be Assur. By this then we may come somewhat neere the end of our purpose. For the Isle of Eden, which lieth in the brest of Tigris, is but twelve miles from Mofal, & that ancient City, which Ptolomy and Tacitus call Ninus, and the Scriptures Nineve; Philoftratus, and Simoon Sethi, Mofula, and John Leary, Mofal, others Mosle, (though it be not the same with Mofal) is set but a little higher upon the same River of Tigris, neere Mofal: so that we are like to finde this Isle of Eden hereabout. For the same Andreas Masius, which placeth it above Mofal, makes it to be below Hafan-Cepha, which is upon the same River of Tigris.

The only difficulty is this, that some perhaps may thinke, that the words of the Nestorians in both their Epistles, speak not of any Isle in Tigris, called the Isle of Eden, but of an Isle in Tigris, a River of Eden. But this sense of their words in my opinion seemeth the more improbable. And yet if this were the meaning here, we have a testimony from the Learned of those parts, that not only Euphrates, but also Tigris was a River of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worn out, though the Region hath been subject to the same change, that all other Kingdoms of the world have beene, and hath by conquest and corruption of other Languages, received new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which stretcheth over Euphrates, was after after the flood called Shinar, and then of the Tower of Babel, Babylonia; and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Mesopotamia, Assyria and Armenia, which imbraceth both the banks of Tigris betweene Mount Taurus, and Seleucia. And of this Region of Eden that ancient Ethibicus maketh mention, (not that latter Ethibicus, Disciple of Gallitinus, otherwise by Plutarch and Athenaeus called Istiri, who liveth in Egypt in the Reigne of Philadelphus; but another of a farre higher and remote time) the same being made Latine out of the Greeke by Saint Hierome. And though by corruption of the ancient Copie it be written in Ethibicus, Adonis for Edenis; yet Adonis being a River of Phoenicia, cannot be understood to be the Region named by Ethibicus. For Ethibicus makes it a Country, and not a River, and joyneth it with Mesopotamia and Ethiopia, calling the land of Chus Ethiopia, after the Vulgar, a Septuagint. And lastly, the River which watereth the Regions; (saith Ethibicus) falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: which River he called Armodius, for Tigris; Tigris being but a name imposed for the swiftnesse thereof. And out of Armenia both Tigris and Euphrates have their originall: for out of Eden came a River, or Rivers, to water the Garden, both which Rivers (to wit Tigris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them traverse Mesopotamia, Regions first of all knowne by the name of Eden for their beaute and fertilitie. And it is very probable, that Eden contained also some part of Armenia; and the excellent fertilitie thereof in divers places, is not unworthy the name of Eden. For in some part thereof (saith Strabo) the leaves are alway green, & therefore therein a perpetual Spring. Also STEPHANUS de urbibus, mentioneth the Citie of Adana upon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in use in Amos time, though he speak not of Eden in the East, but of Eden in Celestria. But to the end I may not burden the Readers patience with too long a Discourse, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tigris (once joyned together; and afterward separate) are two of those four heads, into which these Rivers which are said to water the Garden of Paradise were divided: whose courses being knowne, Eden (out of which they are said to come) cannot be unknowne. Now that Hiddekel and Perath were Tigris and Euphrates, it is agreed by all: for the Seventie and all others convert Perath by Euphrates: & Hiddekel Tigrim omnes exponunt: and all men understand Hiddekel by Tigris (saith Vatablus). And because that which I have said of the Isle of Eden shall not be subject to the censure of false-invention, I have here-under set downe the words out of the two generall Epistles of the Nestorians, as Masius (ad verbum) hath converted them into Latine. The occasion of those Letters and Supplications to the Pope, were, that the Nestorian Christians, which inhabit Mesopotamia, Assyria, Persia, Babylonia, and have to this day (at least in Queen Maries time they had fifteen Churches in one Citie called Seleucia Parthorum, or Mosel upon the River of Tigris; having no sufficient authoritie to chooße themselves a Patriarch (which cannot be done without four or three Metropolitane Bishops at least) sent to the Bishop of Rome, in the year of Christ 1552. (as afore-said) a Petition to obtain allowance unto such an Election as themselves had made: having three hundred year before that upon the like defect, sent one Marius thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they made knowne to the Bishop of Rome the state of the Christian Church in those parts: for upon the death of their Patriarch (who of a covetous desire to enrich himselfe, had forborn to institute Metropolitane Bishops, when the places fell void) they all assembled themselves together to consult of the Church-government. And because all the Patriarchs for an hundred yeares had been of one House and Family to the prejudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Bishop of the same Stocke and Kindred, who aspired to the same dignitie which his Predecessors had held; the rest of the Professors refused to allow him. Upon which occasion, and for the choise of a Governour more sufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches assembled themselves. The words of the generall Epistle to the Pope are these, about the middle of the said Epistle: verum nos non accepimus, neque proclamavimus ipsam; sed subito conventum ex omnibus locis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Civitatibus & pagis que sunt circum Civitatem Mosel (hoc est) Attur, in vicinia Nineve, ex Babylonia, ex Charra, ex Arbella, ex Insula que est in medio Tigris, fluminis Eden, ex Tauris Persia, ex Nisibi, &c. which is: But we did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him; but suddenly we assembled our selves out of all parts of the East, and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Mosel (or Attur) neighbour to Nineve, & out of Babylon, Carra, Arbella, and out of the Island which lieth in the middle of Ti- gria, a River of Eden, or rather, out of the Isle of Eden, which lyeth in the River Tygris. And in a second Epistle at the same time sent, they use these words: Nec; super sunt apud nos Metropolitæ, quorum est ordinare Catholicum, sed soli pauci, Episcopi, Episcopus Arbela, Episcopus Salmasi, Episcopus Adurbeigan; en è vestigio convenimus in Insulam, quæ est, intra Tygrum flumen, Eden, fecimusq; compaundum inter nos, &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining, Eden, fecimusq; compaundum inter nos, &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among us any Metropolitans Bishops, to whom it belongs to ordaine a Patriarch, but one-ly a few Bishops, as the Bishop of Arbela, the Bishop of Salmasus, and the Bishop of Adurbeigan: but lo, we assembled speedily in the Island Eden, which is in Tygris, and agreed be- tweene our selves, &c.

Now this Island of Eden Masus describeth with other places; which being well con- ceived, the Nestorian Epistles, and the state of the Church may be in those parts (saith he) the better understood. And after he hath distinguished the foure sorts of Christians in those parts of the World, and in the South part of Africa, which he calleth Nestori- ans Jacobites, Maronite, and Cophite he goeth on in these words: Mox audita illius morte, concurrisse aiebant tumultuario in illam quam modo dixi Tygris Insulam, quæ duodecim cir- citer passuum millibus supra Mosal posita, decem fere millia passuum suo ambitu continet, muris undiq; cincta, & a paucis aliis quam Christianis hominibus habitata : which is, Now hear- ing of the death of the Patriarch, (as those that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultu- ously together into that Island of Tygris or Eden before spoken of, which Island is situated about twelve miles above Mosal, containing very near ten miles in compass, and every where so environed with a wall, inhabited by few other men than Christians. And afterward he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches; among the rest he addeth the Isle of Eden by the name of Geserta. Insula Tygris: sive Geserta. Furthermore, describing the City of Hofan-cepha, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra prædictum Tygris, Insulam rursi apertè impostam; Above the aforesaid Island of Tygris, being seated on a steepe Rocke. Of this Island of Geserta, Andrew Thevet maketh mention in his tenth Booke of his generall Cosmographie in these words: Geserta ou Gesire est au milieu de la Riviere du Tygre, & pense que c'est une terre des plus fertiles de toute l'Asie; Geserta or Gesire is in the middle of Tygris, the soyle the most fertile of all Asia.

By this wee see that the ancient name of Eden liveth, and of that Eden which lyeth Eastward from Arabia Petraea, and the Desert where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Charran according to Ezechiel, and that Eden which is seated according to the assertion of the said Prophet, and joynd with those Nations of Reseph, Canneh and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the par- ting of the two Regions of Assyria, and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Thelassar were garriioned to resist the Assyrians, whose displantation Senacherib vaunted of (as above written;) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tygris, and looketh on Euphrates, two of the knowne Rivers of those four, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

§. XI.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Rivers to rise from one stream.

BUT it may be objected, that it is written in the Text That a River went out of Eden, and not Rivers in the plural; which scruple Matthew Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation, saith hee, hath these words: Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, qui inde dividebatur in quatuor capita: Quæ verba melius consentiunt rei narratione, & ejusdem explicatione, si ita reddantur. Et fluvius erat egrediens ex Edene, (hoc est) fluvius procedebat ex Edene regione ad regnum pomarium; & inde dividebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a River went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was divided into foure heads: Which words (saith Beroaldus) do better agree with the narrati- on and explication of the place, if they be thus translated: And a River was going forth of Eden (that is) Rivers went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard; and from thence it was divided, and they became foure heads. The Tygrine dif- fers from the Vulgar or Latine; for it converts it thus Et fluvius egrediebatur de deliciis; And a River went out of pleasure, in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word lo- cus, or place, Et fluvius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis; And a River went out of the place of pleasure: and so the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightful and fertile; and so also the word (inde) and thence, was divided, hath reference to the Countrey of Eden, and not to the Garden itself.

And for the word (River) for Rivers, it is usual among the Hebrews: for it is writ- ten: Let the Earth bud forth the bud of the Herbe that seedeth Seede, the fruitfull Tree, &c. Gen. I. II. Here the Hebrew useth the Singular for the Plural, Herbe and Tree, for Herbs and Trees; and againe, We eat of the fruit of the Tree, in stead of (Trees:) And thirdly, The man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of God; In medio ligni Paradisi; In the middle of the tree of the Garden, for (river.) And of this opinion is David Kimchi, and Vatablus, who upon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrewes doe often put the Singular for the Plural, as illud, for unumquodq; illorum, and he giveth an instance in this question it selfe, as, A River (for Rivers) went out of Eden.

And this answer out of divers of the Learned, may, not without good reason, be given to the objection, That Moses speaketh but of one River, from which the heads should divide themselves. Howbeit I deny nor, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason, we may expound the foure heads, to be foure notable passages into famous Countries. And so we may take the word (River) Verse the tenth for one River, (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this River, (after he is past the place, where we suppose Paradise to have bene,) divides it selfe, and ere long yeldeth foure notable passages into severall Countries, though not all the way down stream, (for this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that follow- ing the River downward, there is conveyance into the Countries named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countries (to wit, to Assyria) were up Tygris.

To this end the Text speaking of Hiddekel, as it riseth from the River of Eden, doth not say it compasseth or washeth the whole Region of Assyria, (as it had used this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth toward Assyria. The first branch Pi- son, is Nahar-malcha, (by interpretation) Basilus, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tygris under Apamia; whence ariseth the name of Pasi-tygris, as it were Piso-tygris. This leadeth to the Land of Havila or Susana. The second branch Gehon, is that which in Historians is Nabarsares or Narragas; for Nahar-ragas: both which names signifie flumen derivatum (a River derived,) also Acracanus, quasi Ranolus, by reason of the froggie Fens which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the first seate of Chus, about the borders of Chaldaea and Arabia, and it is lost at length in the Lakes of Chaldaa. The third branch Hiddekel, may be expounded the upper stream of Pison, or Basilus which runneth into Hiddekel, properly so called (that is, into Tygris) above Seleucia, where it sheweth a passage up Tygris into Assyria: where, because at length it is called Hiddekel or Tygris, having before no knowne proper name, the Text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath, or Euphrates, so called per excellentiam, being the body of the River Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon and Otis. But, be it a River or Rivers, that come out of Eden, seeing that Tygris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can be no doubt, but that Paradise was not farre from these Rivers: for that Perath in Moses is Euphrates, there can be no questi- on; and (indeed) as plaine it is that Hiddekel is Tygris. For Hiddekel goeth (saith Moses) Eastward towards Assur, as we find, that Tygris is the River of Assyria proprie dicta, whose chiefe City was Nineve, as in Genesis the tenth it is written: That out of that Land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Assur, and builded Nineve, which was the chief City of Assyria.

And as for the kind of speech here used in the Text, speaking of four heads; though the heads of Rivers be (properly) their Fountains, yet here are they to be understood, so to be spoken of the beginning of their division from the first stream. Caput aquæ (saith Ulpianus) illud est, unde aqua nascitur, sive ex fonte nascatur, sive sive ex flumine, vel ex lacu, prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a Fountain, then is the Foun- tain taken for the head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a main River any branch be separate and divided, then where that branch doth first bound it self with new banks, there is that part of the River, where the branch forsaketh the main stream, called the head of the River.

§. XII.

Of the strange fertility and happiness of the Babylonian Soyle, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

IT may also be demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by us described, be of such fertility and beauty, as Eden the seat of Paradise was: which, if it be denied, then must we also consider, that there was no part of the Earth, that retained that fertility and pleasure, that it had before the curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulness to any part of the Earth, nor the same virtue to any plant thereon growing, that they had before the flood; and therefore this Region of Eden may be now 10 no such flourishing Countrey, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I finde written of it: First, in Herodotus, who was an eye-witness, and speaketh of the very place it self; for the Isle of Eden is but twelve miles or thereabout from Nineve, and so from Mosal. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tygrim, alterum flumen, juxta quod Urbs Ninus sita erat. Hac regio, omnium quas nos vidimus, optima est, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tygris, not far from the place where Ninus is seated. This Region, of all that we have seen, is most excellent: and he addeth afterward; Cerevis autem fructu procreando adeo ferax est, ut nunquam non ferè ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitful in bringing forth Corne, that it yeeldeth two hundred fold: The leaves of Wheat and 20 Barley being almost four fingers broad. As for the height of Millet and Sesame, they are even in length like unto Trees; which although I know to be true, yet I forbear to speake hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulness, will seeme very incredible to those, which never were in the Countrey of Babylon. They have commonly in all the Countrey Palm-Trees growing of their own accord, the most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both Meats, and Wine, and Honey, ordering them as the Fig-Trees. Thus far Herodotus.

To this Palm-tree, so much admired in the East India, Strabo and Niger adde a fourth excellency, which is, that it yeeldeth bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt; Of which these people make Bread, Wine, Honey, and Vinegar. But Antonius the Eremitte findeth a fifth commodity, not inferior to any of those foure, which is, 30 that from this self-same Tree there is drawn a kinde of fine Flax, of which people make their garments, and with which in East India they prepare the cordage for their ships. And that this is true, Atanasius in the life of Antonius the eremite, confesseth, saying: That he received a Garment made thereof from the Eremitte himself, which he brought with him out of this Region. So therefore those Trees, which the East Indies so highly esteeme and so much admire (as indeed the Earth yeeldeth no plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this upper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any trees of the Field. Sunt etiam (saith STRABO) pallim per omnem Regionem palmae sua sponte nascentes; There are of palms over all the whole Region, growing of their own accord. Of this place Quintus Curtius maketh this report: *Euntibus a parte levis Arabiae (odorum fertilitate nobilis) regio campestris inter Tygrim & Euphratem, jacens tam ubere & pingui solo, ut a pastu repelli pecora dicantur, ne satietas perimat; (that is) As you travell on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plenty of sweet Odours) there lieth a Champain Countrey placed between Tygris and Euphrates, and so fruitful and fat a soile, that they are said to drive their Cattel from pasture, least they should perish by satiety. Bis in anno segetes Babylonii fecant; The Babylonians cut their Corn twice a year (saith Niger.) And as Countries generally are more fruitful to the Southward, than in the Northern parts: so we may judge the excellency of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South parts of America, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof. His words be these in the Latine: Tota enim haec regio frugibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis, itemque 50 semper viuentibus; This Region aboundeth with pleasant fruits, and Trees alwaies greene: which witnesseth a perpetual Spring, not found elsewhere but in the Indies onely, by reason of the Suns neighbourhood, the life and stirrer up of Nature in a perpetual activity. In brief, so great is the fertility of the ground, that the people are constrained twice to mow down their Corn fields, and a third time to eat them up with Sheep: which husbandry the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first forty years, could not make our kinde of Wheate beare seed, but it grew up as high as the Trees, and was fruitless. Besides, those fields are altogether without weeds saith* (saith Pliny) who addeth this singularity to that soyle, That the second year the very stubble (or rather falling downe of the feedes again) yeeldeth them a harvest of corne 18. c. 17. without any further labour: his words are these, Ubertatis tantae sunt sequenti anno sponte refectibilis fiat seges.

§. XIII.

Of the River Pison, and the land of Havilah.

AFTER the discoverie of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertilitie thereof, it resteth 10 to prove that Pison and Gebon are branches of Tygris and Euphrates: For, that the knowledge and certaintie of these two Rivers should trouble to many wife men, it is strange to me, seeing necessitie it selfe (Tygris and Euphrates being knowne) findeth them out: for Euphrates, or Tygris, or both, be that River or Rivers of Eden, which water Paradise; which river or rivers Moses witnesseth afterward divided into four heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gebon &c. Could there be a stranger fancie in the world, than when we find both these (namely) Tygris and Euphrates in Assyria and Mesopotamia, to seeke the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two rivers as far distant as any of fame knowne or discovered in the world: the Scriptures making it so plain, that these Rivers were divided into foure branches, and with the Scriptures, Nature, reason, and Experience bearing witness. 20 There is no error, which hath not some slipperie and bad foundation, or some appearance of probability, resembling truth, which when men (who studie to be singular) finde out, (straining reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the world matter of contention and jangling; not doubting but in the variable deformitie of mens minds, to find some partakers or sectators, the better by their helpe to nurse and cherish such weake babes, as their own inventions have begotten.

But this mistaking (and first for the River of Pison) seemeth to have grown out of the not-distinguishing of that Region in India, called Havilah, from Havilah which adjoyneth to Babylonia, afterward knowne by the name of Sutiana. For Havilah upon Tygris 30 tooke name from Havilah the son of Cush; and Havilah in India, from Havilah the son of Jofan; the one remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise, the other Gen. 10. 7. where Moses setteth downe the generations of Noah, and his sons after the Flood. For the sons of Cush were Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, and Raamah; and the sons of Jofan were Ophir, and Havilah &c. of which latter (to wit) of Ophir and Havilah the sonnes of Jofan, that Island of Ophir, (whence Salomon had gold) and Havilah adjoyning, had their names. Now because Ganges is a great and a famous river of the East India, and Havilah a Countrey of the same, and is situated upon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges 10. 29. was taken for Pison, which river is said by Moses to water the land of Havilah. Or perhaps it was supposed that those foure rivers named by Moses must of necessitie be foure of the greatest in the world; whence (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous river after Tygris and Euphrates) they chose out this river to make one of the foure. And yet certainly there is another river, whom in these respects they should rather have chosen than Ganges: for the river Indus on this side India, for beauty, for neerenesse, and for ability, giveth no way place to Ganges, but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceive, that Ganges can be one of the four heads, seeing Indus commeth between it and Tygris? and between Tygris and Indus is all that large Empire of Persia, consisting of many Kingdomes. And againe, farther towards the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India intra Gangem, which lie between those two proud rivers of Indus and Ganges, now called the Kingdome of Mogor. 40 So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the foure, because it is removed from Tygris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much lesse Ganges, which falleth into the Ocean, little lesse than forty degrees to the Eastward of Indus: Surely, whosoever readeth the storie of Alexander, shall finde, that there is no river in Asia, that can exceede Indus. For Hydaspis was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies transported himselfe, and the greatest part of his armie, and in sayling down that branch of Indus, found it so large and deepe, and by reason thereof so great a billow, as it endangered his whole Fleet, which was ready to be swallowed up therein: Hydaspis (as aforesaid) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it and as great as it, having besides this, the Rivers of Coas, of Suaftus, Acefiner, Adris (otherwise Tiroitis, Hifpalis, and Zaradus, all which make but one Indus, and by it are swallowed up with all Indus children and companions, which being all incorporated and made one stream, it croseth athward Asia, and then at Cambaia visiteth the Ocean Sea.

Gen. 2. 15.

But because Pifon, which compasseth Havilah, as also Gehon, which watereth Cush, must some-where be joynted with the rest in one body, or at least be found to proceed out of the same Country of Eden, out of which the other two heads doe proceed; out of doubt they cannot either the one or the other, be Ganges, or Nilus: for Nilus riseth in the uttermost of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterranean Sea; and the River Ganges riseth out of the mountain Imaus, or (as others will have it) Caucasus, which divides the Northern Scythia from India, and runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tygris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, neer Georgiana or Iberia, the other is not far off in the same Armenia, by the Gorgiean mountains; so as Ganges, who only travaileth in her own India, and Nilus through Ethiopia and Egypt, never law the land of Eden, or joynted themselves in one channell, either with themselves, or with either of the other; and therefore could not at any time from thence be separated, or divided into four heads or branches, according to Moses.

Gen. 2. v. 12.

Therefore the River Pifon, which enricheth Havilah, is the same which by joyning it self with Tygris, was therefore called Pifis, tygris, or Piso-Tygris, of Pifon and tygris, which 20 River watereth that Havilah, which Havilah the sonne of Cush gave name unto, and not Havilah of India, so called of Havilah the sonne of Joſtan, who inhabited with his brother Ophir in the East. And this Havilah of the Cushites had also Gold, Bdellium, and the Onyx stone. This Bdellium is a Tree of the bignesse of an Olive, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yeldeth a certaine Gum sweet to smell to, but bitter in taste, called also Bdellium. The Hebrews take the Load-stone for Bdellium. Beroaldus affirmeth, that Bdela in Hebrew signifieth pearl: (so doth Engubinus; and Hierom calls it Oleaster: be it what it will, a tree bearing Gum or Pearle: as Arabia hath plenty of both. Now this Country of Susiana or Havilah stretcheth it self towards the North as far as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence embraceth all the Tract of Land Southward, 30 as far as the Persian Gulfe, on the East side thereof: from which East side had the Shebans (which traded with the City of Tyre according to Ezechiel) their great plenty of gold; which Strabo also witnesseth, as was shewed before.

Strabo.

Heph. de Per.

The Greeks had a conceit, that Pifon was Danubius: the Rabbins take it for Nilus. Aben-Ezra (saith Hopkins) out of Rabbi Sandia, tranſlateth Pifon into Nilus: But Nilus findeth the same impossibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Helleſpont and all Asia the leſſe between it and Tygris. Now Pifon, which runneth through Havilah or Susiana, doth to this day retain some ſigne of this name; for where it and Tygris embraceth each other under the City of Apamia, there doe they agree of a joynt and compounded name, and are called Piso-Tygris. And it is ſtrange unto me, that from 40 so great antiquitie there should be found remaining any reſembling ſound of the firſt name: for Babylon it ſelf, which dwelleth ſo neer theſe Rivers, is by ſome writers known by the name of Bandæ, as, by Poſſellus: by Caſtaldus, of Balduch: by Barins, of Bagdad, and of Bonghedor, by Andrew Thevet; and yet all theſe that have lately ſeene it, call it Bagdet. To this River of Pifon, Ptolomie indeed with many others give the name of Baſilus or Regius, and Gehon they term Mabar-Sarer, and Mariſas, and Barſares. So is Euphrates, neer the Spring and Fountain, by Strabo and Plinie called Pixirates: by Junius, Puckperath, out of the Hebrew (that is) The proſuſion, or coming forth of Euphrates: where it bre aketh through the mountain Taurus, it takes the name of Onyrra. Phuarch calls it Medus and Zaranda: the Hebrews Perath, (saith Ar. Montanus;) 50 Pagninus, Perath; Joſephus, Pborab, Enchebuz, Zozimus; Ammianus, Chalynicus; Giſſilanus and Coliminius term it Cobar: which Ezechiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Aſſyrians know it by the name of Armalchar, or Nabor Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frat.

The ſame conſuſion of names hath Tygris, as Diglito, and Digluh, Seilax, and Sollax: of the Hebrews it was called Hiddekel: now of the inhabitants Tegil.

But Mercer upon Genefis conceiveth rightly of theſe Rivers: for Euphrates and Tygris (saith he) ſtream into four branches; two of which keep their ancient names, and the other other two are called Pifon and Gehon. The reaſon why theſe two Rivers joynted in one (below Apamia) loſe their names and are called Pifis-Tygris, and the memory of Euphrates extinguiſhed, is, becauſe the beſt part of Euphrates running through the channell of Gehon, lieth into the lakes of Chaldaea, not far from Ur, the City of Abraham, and fall not entirely into the Persian Sea, as Tygris, accompanied with Pifon, doth.

This error that Pifon was Ganges, was firſt broched by Joſephus, whoſe fields, though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weeds; and other men (who take his authority to be ſufficient in matter of deſcription, whereupon depended no other important conſequence) were not curious in the examination thereof. For Epiphanius, 10 Auguſtine, and Hierome, take this for currant; whereof it followed, that as Pifon was tranſported into the Eaſt India to finde out Havilah: ſo was Gehon drawn into Africa to compaſſe Ethiopia. But if Havilah, whereof Moses ſpeaketh in the deſcription of Paradiſe, be found to be a Region, adjoining to Babylon on the one ſide, and Cuſh (which is falſly interpreted Ethiopia) faſtned to it on the other ſide, we ſhall not need then to work wonders (that is) to impoſe upon men the tranſportation of Rivers, from one end of the World to the other, which (among other uſes) were made to tranſport men. Now it was in the valley of Shinar, where Cuſh the ſonne of Ham firſt fate down with his ſonnes Shebah, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Havilah, the ſonne of Cuſh, did that Region take name, which Pifon compaſſeth; and the land (called Cuſh) 20 which Gehon watereth, took name of Cuſh himſelf. For as the ſonnes of Joſtan, Ophir, and Havilah, ſeated themſelves as neer together as they could in India, ſo did the ſons of Cuſh in Shinar, or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Havilah, or Chavilah, was firſt Chuſea of Cuſh; then Chuſa, Suſa, and Suſiana.

From this Havilah unto the Deſarts of Sur, did the Iſraelites and Amalekites poſſeſs all the interjacent Countries: for Saul ſmote the Amalekites from Havilah to Sur: which Sur, the Chaldaean Paraphraſt converteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the Red Sea. 1 Sam. 15. 7. But this was not meant from Sur upon the Red Sea, to Havilah in the Eaſt India, for Saul was no ſuch Travailer or Conquerour, and therefore Havilah muſt be found neerer home, where the ſonnes of Imael inhabited, and which Country Saul waſted: 30 for Amalek and the Amalekites poſſeſt that neck of Country, between the Persian Sea, and the Red Sea; Havilah being the extreame of the one, towards the Eaſt, and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the Weſt, leaving that great body of Arabia Felix towards the South, and they ſpread themſelves with the Midianites and Edumæans, from the Eaſt part, or backſide of the Holy Land, to the banks of Euphrates, comprizing the beſt part of Arabia Petraea and Deſerta.

§. XIII.

Of the River Gehon, and the Land of Cuſh, and of the ill tranſlating of Ethiopia for Cuſh, 2 CHRON. 21. 16.

40 NOW, as Havilah in the Eaſt India drew Pifon ſo far out of his way thither, ſo I ſay did Cuſh (being by the Seventy tranſlated Ethiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cuſh being taken for Ethiopia by the Greeks, whom the Latines followed, Gehon conſequently was eſteemed for Nilus. But Ethiopians are, as much as black or burnt faces, whoſe proper Country called Thebaides, lyeth to the Southward of all Egypt. And although there be many other Regions of Ethiopians, and far South in Africa, yet thoſe of Thebaides are thoſe ſo often remembered in the Egyptian ſtories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Egypt: all which Ethiopians are very neer, or elſe directly under the Equinoctiall line, which is very 50 far from that Land inhabited by the Chuſites, who are neither black of colour, nor in any ſort neighbouring Torrida Zona. But this tranſlation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth qualifie in this manner: There are (saith he) two Ethiopia's, the Eaſt, and the Weſt: and this diviſion he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now becauſe there is no colour to make Chuſ Ethiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Chuſ and the land of the Chuſites (which is Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Happy, with the Region of Madian) to be the Eaſt Ethiopia.

Now if it be granted, that Chuſ and the land of the Chuſites be that tract from Sur to Havilah, according to the Scriptures: Habitavit ISMAEL ab Havilah usque Sur, quæ respicit Gen. 25. 18. Egyptum Egyptus introcuntibus Affyrios, Ismael dwelt from Havilah unto Sur, that is, towards Egypt, as thou goest toward Affyria. The same sufficeth to prove that Gehon cannot be Nilus, but a River which watereth Cush, and not Æthiopia. But this place of Scripture, Habitavit Ismael, &c. hath this sense: Ismael dwelt from Havilah, which is the way of Affyria, or the Countrey bordering Affyria; and Sur, which lyeth toward Egypt, which is as much to say, as, The issues of Ismael (whereof there were twelve Princes) whom God had promised to make a great people, inhabited all those Regions between the border of Egypt and Affyria. And that they were (according to the word of God) so increased and multiplyed, it well appeared, when Zearah the Chusite, which others call Tharamba, brought an Armie of ten hundred thousand against Asa King of Judah. Which Armie came not out of Æthiopia beyond Egypt; for that had been a strange progresse for such a multitude, as ten hundred thousand, having so mighty a King as the King of Egypt, between Palestina and Æthiopia. But these were the Chusites, Amalekites, Madianites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Asa (strengthened by God) had defeated this world of an Armie, he in following his victory took some of the Cities of King Zearah round about, as Gerar. Now that Gerar is a Citie of the Æthiopians, it cannot be suspected: for these be the words of the scripture disproving it: And ABRAHAM departed thence toward the South Countrey, and dwelt between Kadeh and Sur, and sojourned in Gerar: Now Sur is that part upon which Moses and the Israelites first left their feet after they passed the Red Sea, where the Amalekites in Rephidim let them on them, supposing that they had been weary, and unable to resist. Again, in the story of Isaac it is written: Wherefore ISAAC went to ABIMELECH, and the Philistines unto Gerar: and I am sure ABIMELECH and the Philistines were no Æthiopians. And lastly, Moses himselfe, where he describeth the bounds of Canaan, hath these words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou comest to Gerar: for Sydon was the Frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gaza towards the South. But indeed, howsoever Pterius doth with an honest excuse save his translation of Chus for Æthiopia, yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint and Josephus did altogether mis-understand this place. And first for Homers East and West Æthiopia, they are both found elsewhere: For Plinie in his fifth Book and eight Chapter, citeth Homer for an Author of these two Æthiopia's. But the East Æthiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the South of Egypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Emphyre of the Abyssines under Prestor John; And the West Æthiopia is that which joyneth it self with the River Niger, which we call Senega and Gambia: for thereabouts are these Æthiopians called Perorsi, Dararites, with divers other names, which Plinie numbred. But all these are in Africa, and beyond the Desarts thereof, saith Plinie out of Homer, Agrippa, and Iuba; which Regions indeed I mean that of Niger, and that of Prestor John, and the Troglodites lye due East and West. But as for Cush, and the Region of the Ismaelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Æthiopia, which is beyond Egypt. Now, that Josephus was exceeding grosse herein, it appeareth by that fiction which he hath of Moses when he served Pharaos, in the Warres against the Æthiopians: for in that (to make Chus, Æthiopia) he transporteth Madian by miracle over the Red Sea, and beyond all Egypt, and setteth it in Æthiopia, as shall bee shewed more at large in the Chapter of the Worlds Plantation. Again, that Gehon was improperly translated Nilus, Pterius confesseth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greek Copie, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint have converted this place of the Prophet Hieremie; And what hast thou now to doe in the way of Egypt, to drinke the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Egypti, ut bibis aquam Gehon? To this saith Pterius, profered bebracit ibi non est vox Gehon, sed Sichor, que significat nigrum & turbidum: Truly (saith Pterius) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor, which significeth black and troubled water.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and unanswerable argument, that Chus was ill taken for Æthiopia. Moses married the daughter of Jethro, Prince and Priest of Madian, whom both the Greek and Latine call a Madianite, and not Æthiopiassam, as (with Josephus) the Geneva converts it, though it help it a little with a margmall note. Now it is without dispute, that Zipporah was of the Countrey of Madian, which is that part of Arabia

Arabia Petraea, bordering the Red Sea; for it is written in the second of Exodus, that Moses fled from PHARAO into the Land of Midian, and sat down by a Well, &c. and again in the third of Exodus; When Moses kept the sheep of JETHRO, his Father in Law, Priest of Madian, &c. Indeed these four Nations are every where mixt in the Scriptures, because they dwell confusedly together (to wit) the Madianites, the Ismaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chusites, which were all in one generall word, Arabians, and in the Scriptures sometimes called by one of these names, and sometimes by another; as in Gen. 37. v. 25. 27. & 28. that Joseph was sold to the Ismaelites; and in the same Chapter, v. 36. it is written, that the Madianites sold Joseph to Potiphar, Pharaos Steward. The Genevians in a marginal note (to avoid this confounding of the Nations) say, that Moses wrote according to their opinion, who took the Madianites and Ismaelites to be all one. But Moses wrote not after any mans opinion, he wrote the truth; and these were all Arabians: & so in this very place it appeareth by their merchandize, which they brought with them, when they bought Joseph: for their Camels were laden with Spicery, and Balm, and Myrrhe, which are the trades of Arabia felix: from whence chiefly, and from the East India, all the World is served with Myrrhe and Frankincense; and their spices they received from the East side of the Arabian Gulf, as aforesaid. And in the 39. Chap. it is said: That Potiphar bought Joseph of the Ismaelites, which the Chaldaean Paraphrast in the same place calleth Arabians. Now, to make this the more manifest, it is written in the sixth of Judges, That when Israel had sown, then came up the Madianites, and the Amalekites, and they of the East, and came upon them: they of the East, were Arabians of the Desert; so as where before in the buying of Joseph, the Madianites and the Ismaelites were confused, here the Madianites and Amalekites are made one Nation. For in the prosecution of the Story of Gedeon, the Madianites only are named, as comprehending both Nations; and in the eighth Chapter, v. 24. these Nations are all called Ismaelites, and neither Madianites nor Amalekites. As when Gedeon desired that every man would give him the golden ear-rings, which they had taken after the victory against Zeba and Zolunnna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 1700. shekles of gold, it is written: For they had golden ear-rings, because they were Ismaelites. And these Ismaelites were a great and valiant Nation, and ever in action of War. Manus ejus contra omnes, & manus omnium contra eum; His hand (saith God of ISMAEL) shall be against all men, and every mans hand against him. Of these Ismaelites come the Mahometan Arabians, though some Writers think Mahomet to be of the Schenite. And these Ismaelites, which inhabit chiefly in Cedar, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan (saith Josephus) use poyson upon their Arrowes, as the Indians doe. Towards the South-east are the Madianites, and Chusites: and beyond them, towards the Desarts of Arabia, the Amalekites, and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Lastly, the ill translation of Æthiopia for Chus, is among other places, made most apparent in the second of Chronicles, in these words: So the Lord stirred up against JEHOAM the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine the Æthiopians; so Hierome reads it: the Geneva translation hath it, which were besides the Æthiopians. Now how far it is off between the Philistines and the Negro's, or the Æthiopians, every man that looketh in a Map may judge. For the Philistines and Arabians do mixe and joyn with the Land of the Chusites, and are distant from Æthiopia about two and thirty, or three and thirtie degrees; and therefore not their next neighbours; but all Egypt, and the Desert of Sur and Pharan are between them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles, should have been translated in these words: So the Lord stirred up against JEHOAM, the spirits of the Philistins, and the Arabians, which confine and border upon the Chusites, who indeed are their next neighbours. *Nella superfluo dubitatio quin Æthiopia in sacris literis sit Arabia propinqua; There remaineth no doubt (saith Steuchius) but Æthiopia in the Scriptures, is taken for that Countrey which joyneth to Arabia.

Now, may we think, is it probable, or possible, that Moses could be ignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no living man so well, and therefore would never have named Gehon, for Nilus, or Nilus for Gehon. Surely, if Moses had meant Nilus, when he named Gehon, he would have called the River (into which he was cast upon reeds, and preserved by God, working compassion in the daughter of Pharaos) a River of Egypt, wherein he was born and bred, and wrought so many miracles. Besides, the River of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures; but never by the name of Gehon. And if Moses had told the Israelites, that Nilus had been a River of Paradise, they might justly have thought, that he had desired them: for they had lived there all daies of their lives, and found no such Paradise at all, nor any memory, or speech thereof, except we shall believe the paradise of Hesperides, where (saith Plinie) there was nothing found in his time, but wilde Olives instead of golden Apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in Ifoy, and once in the Prophet Jeremie; and yet in those places it is not said to be a River of Aethiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had never any communion or acquaintance with the Aethiopians, nor any intelligence, or trade, beyond Egypt, to the South; but the enemies which they had on the South, and East parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites, and Madianites: who being often governed by many little Kings, or Reguli, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers or heads of those Nations; but in one generall name were all Arabians. On the North side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Cœlofryians, with the Magogians, Tubalites, and others their adherents. And thirdly within themselves, the Nations, which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities upon the Seacoast (as Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others: yea, Jerusalem it self was withheld from Israel (from the daies of Moses, even unto the time of David) by the Jebusites.

That which now remaineth of most difficultie, is, that it doth not appear that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia the stony, which the Chusites inhabited in the times of the Kings of Israel: and in this Desart it was that Matt: Beraldu lost himself in seeking out Paradise: for he was driven (to my understanding) to create two Rivers, and call them Gehon and Pison; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Havilah; for I finde none such in verum natura, as he hath described: by which Rivers he also includeth within Paradise, even Arabia the Desart.

And as he well proved that Pison was not Ganges, nor Gehon, Nilus; so where to find them else, where it seemeth he knew not. Certainly this River of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterran at Gaza, and whose Springs he findeth farre East in Arabia, is but imaginary; for the Current by Gaza is but a small stream, rising between it and the Red Sea, whose head from Gaza it selfe is little more than twentie English miles, as shall appear hereafter. But questionless, hence it comes that many were mistaken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the State of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their near neighbours, and never looked back to the first seats and plantation of Chus. For after the Flood, Chus and his Children never rested, till they found the Valley of Shinar, in which, and near which himself, with his sons, first inhabited. Havilah took the River-side of Tygris chiefly on the East, which after his own name he called Havilah, (now Susiana): Raamah, and Sheba farther down the River, in the entrance of Arabia foelix. NIMROD seated himself in the best of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himself and his brother Mizraim first kept upon Gehon, which falleth into the Lakes of Chaldaea, and in process of time, and as their people increased, they drew themselves more westerly towards the Red or Arabian Sea: from whence Mizraim past over into Egypt, in which Tract the Chusites remained for many years after. Now because there could be no such River found in Arabia the stonie, which they might entitle Gehon, they translated Chus, Aethiopia, and Gehon, Nilus. And if we doe examine this mistaking by example, we shall the better perceive it as it was. For let us suppose, that Brute, or whosoever else that first peopled this Island, had arrived upon the River of Thames, and called the Island after his name Britannia, it might be said that Thames or Tems was a River that watered Britannia: and when afterwards in process of time, the same Brute had also discovered and conquered Scotland, which he also intituled by the same name of Britannia, as terages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the River of Tems is not found therein. Or let us suppose that Europa, the Daughter of the King of Tyre in Phœnicia, gave the name to Europe, according to Herodotus, and that the first discoverers thereof arrived in the mouth of the River in Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as he first discovered, shall we in like sort resolve that France, Spaine, and Italie, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that River is not found in them, or any of them: in like manner was it said by Moses in his description of Gehon, that it watered the whole Land of Chus; but not the whole Land which

which the Chusites should, or might in future time conquer people, and inhabit, seeing in after-ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) have been Masters in time, (as the Saracens, which came of them, were) of a great part of the world. For, though the Babylonian Empire which took beginning in Nimrod the sonne of Chus, consisted at the first but of foure Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, Acad, and Chalne; yet we finde, that his Successors within a few years after, commanded all the whole World in effect: and the same of Babel consumed the memorie of Chus. For of this Tower of Confusion did all that Land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatness of that Empire, founded by Nimrod a younger son, obscured the name and nation of his father Chus in those parts untill they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and farther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chusites retained their names, which also they fastned to the Soile and Territories by themselves afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not thinke, that Chus or any of his, could in haste creepe through those desert Regions, which the length of 130. yeares after the Flood had (as it were) fortified with Thickets, and permitted every Bush and Bryar, Reede and Tree to joyn themselves (as it were) into one maine body and Forrest. For if we look with judgement and reason into the Worlds plantation, we shall finde, that every Family seated themselves as neare together as possibly they could; and though necessity enforced them, after they grew full of people, to spread themselves, and creepe out of Shinar or Babylonia; yet did they it with this advice, as that they might at all times resort and succour one another by River, the fields being then (without all doubt) impassable. So Nimrod, who out of wit and strength usurped dominion over the rest, fate down in the very confluence of all those Rivers, which watered Paradise: for thither it was to which the greatest troupes of Noah's children repaired; and from the same place whence Mankind had his beginning, from thence had they again their increase. The first Father of men Adam, had therein his former habitation. The second Father of Mankind Noah, began from thence his dispersion.

Now as Nimrod the youngest, yet strongest, made his choice of Babel (as aforesaid) which both Tygris and Euphrates cleaned and enriched; so did Havilah place himselfe upon Piso or Tygris, Raamah and his son Sheba farther downe upon the same River, on the Sea coast of Arabia: Chus himself upon Gehon, the fairest branch of Euphrates. And when they began to spread themselves farther off, yet they alwaies fastened themselves to the Rivers sides: for Ninive, Charran, Reseph, Canneh, Ur in Chaldea, and the other first-peopled Cities, were all founded upon these navigable Rivers, or their branches, by which the one might give succour and assistance to the other, as is already often remembered.

§. XV.

A conclusion by way of repetition of something spoken of before.

But now to conclude this dispute, it appeareth to me by the testimonies of the Scriptures, that Paradise was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, seated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterward called Aram superiorum, or Mesopotamia, which taketh into it also a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region standing in the most excellent temper of all other, (to wit) 35 degrees from the Æquinoctial, and 55 from the North-pole: in which climate the most excellent Wines, Fruits, Oyle, Graine of all sorts, are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proveth the excellency of this said soile and temper, than the abundant growing of the Palm-trees, without the care and labour of man. For whereinsoever the Earth, Nature, and the Sun can most vaunt that they have excelled, yet shall this Plant be the greatest wonder of all their works: This Tree alone giveth unto man whatsoever his life begetteth at Natures hand. And though it may be said, that these Trees are found both in the East and West Indies, which Countries are also blessed with a perpetual Spring and Summer, yet, lay downe by those pleasures and benefits the fearful and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous diseases, the multitude of venomous Beasts and Worms, with other inconveniences; and then there will be found no comparison between one and the other.

What

What other excellencies this Garden of Paradiſe had, before God (for mans ingratitude and crueltie) curſed the Earth, we cannot judge; but I may ſafely think, that by how much Adam exceeded all living men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanſhip of God, by ſo much did that choſen and particular Garden exceed all parts of the Univerſal World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the Trees of Life, of Knowledge; Plants only proper, and becomming the Paradiſe, and garden of ſo great a Lord.

The ſum of all this is; That whereas the eyes of men in this Scripture have been dim-ſighted (ſome of them finding Paradiſe beyond our known World: ſome, above the middle region of the ayre: ſome, elevated neer the Moon: others, as far South as the Line, or as far North as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the reader will be ſufficiently ſatisfied, that theſe were but like Caſtles in the aire, and in mens fancies, vainly imagined. For it was Eaſtward in Eden (ſaith Mofes) Eaſtward, in reſpect of Judæa, that God planted this Garden; which Eden we finde in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in ſome part) remaineth to this day. A river went out of Eden to water this Garden, and from thence divided it ſelfe into foure branches; and we finde that both Tygris and Euphrates ſwimming through Eden, do joyne in one, and afterward taking waies apart, do water Chus and Havilah, according to Mofes, the true ſeats of Chus and his Sons being then in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Pijon was Ganges, the Scripture, reaſon, and experience teach the contrary: for that which was never joyned, cannot be divided; Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the rivers of Eden; That Gehon was Nilus, the ſame diſtance maketh the ſame impoſſibility; and this river is a greater ſtranger to Tygris and Euphrates, than Ganges is: for although there are between Tygris and Ganges above four thouſand miles, yet they both riſe in the ſame quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the Mountains of the Moon, almoſt as far off as the Cape of good hope, and falleth into the Mediterran Sea: and Euphrates diſtilleth out of the Mountains of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulf of Perſia: the one riſeth in the South, and travaileth North: the other riſeth in the North, and runneth South, threeſcore and three degrees the one from the other. In this laſt following, I have added a Chorographical deſcription of this terreſtrial Paradiſe, that the reader may thereby the better conceive the preceding Diſcourſe; and this is the reward I looke for, that my labour may but receive an allowance ſuſpended, until ſuch time as this deſcription of mine be reproved by a better.

CHAP. IV.

Of the two chief Trees in the Garden of Paradiſe.

§. I.

That the tree of Life was a material tree; and in what ſenſe it is to be taken, that man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made ſubject to death.

For eating the forbidden fruit of the tree of Knowledge was Adam driven out of Paradiſe, in exilium vite temporalis, into the baniſhment of temporal life, ſaith Beza.

That theſe Trees of Life and Knowledge were material Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Goſpel) it is not doubted by the moſt religious and learned Writers: although the wits of men, which are ſo volatile, as nothing can fix them, and ſo ſlippery, as nothing can faſten them, have in this alſo delivered to the World, ſo an imaginary doctrine.

The Tree of Life (ſay the Hebrews) hath a plural conſtruction, and is to be underſtood, Lignum vitarum, the tree of lives, becauſe the fruit thereof had a property, to preſerve both the growing, ſenſitive, and rational life of man; and not onely (but for Adam's tranſgreſſion) had prolonged his own daies, but alſo given a durable continuance to all poſterity; and that, ſo long, as a body compounded of Elements could laſt.

And although it is hard to think, that fleſh and blood could be immortal, but that it muſt once periſh and rot, by the unchanged Law of God impoſed on his creatures,

Man

Man notwithstanding) ſhould have enjoyed thereby a long, beautiful, and ungrrieved life: after which (according to the opinion of moſt Divines) he ſhould have been tranſlated, as Enoch was. And as before the Flood, the daies of men had the long meaſure of eight hundred or nine hundred years; and ſoon after the flood, of two hundred years and upwards, even to five hundred: ſo if Adam had not diſobeyed Gods firſt and eaſie Commandment, the lives of men on earth might have continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longeſt times of the firſt age, as many learned men have conceived. Chryſoſtome, Rupertus Toſtatus, and others were of belief, that (but for Adams fall and tranſgreſſion) Adam and his Poſterity had been immortal. But ſuch is the infinite Wiſdom of God, as he foreſaw that the earth could not have contained Man-kind; or elſe, that millions of ſouls muſt have been ungenerated, and have had no being, if the firſt number, wherewith the Earth was replenished, had abode thereon for ever: and therefore that of Chryſoſtome muſt be underſtood of immortality of bodies, which ſhould have been tranſlated and glorified.

But of what kinde or Species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which reſpect many have conceived, that the ſame was not material, but a meer Allegorie, taking their ſtrength out of Solomon, where Wiſdom is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where alſo Chriſt is called the Tree of Life; and out of the Apocalypſis, I will give to him that overcometh, to eat of the Tree of Life which is in the Paradiſe of God. But to this place Saint Auguſtine's anſwer may ſuffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terreſtrial Paradiſe, ſo there was a celeſtial. For although Agar and Sara were Figures of the Old, and New Teſtament, yet to think that they were not Women, and the Maid and Wife of Abraham, were meer fooliſhneſs. And ſo in this place the ſenſe of the Scripture is maniſeſt. For God brought out of the earth every Tree faire to the ſight, and ſweet to taſte; the Tree alſo of Life in the miſt of the Garden: which ſheweth, that among the trees, which the Earth by Gods commandment produced, the tree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was alſo to be eaten. The report of this Tree was alſo brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigelted matter or Chaos, Heſiodus, Homer, Ovid, and others, ſo from the invention of the created World; ſo from the Garden of Paradiſe they took the Plat-form of the Orchard of Alcinous, and another of the Heſperides: and from the Tree of Life, their Neſſar and Ambroſia; for Neſſar, according to Suidas, ſignifieth making young, and Ambroſia, immortality; and therefore ſaid to be the meat and drinke of the gods.

§. II.

Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of knowledge was Ficus Indica.

Now for the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil, ſome men have preſumed farther, eſpecially Goropius Becanus, who giveth himſelfe the honour to have found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could ever gueſs at, wherat Goropius much marvelled. But as he had an inventive brain, ſo there never lived any man, that believed better thereof, and of himſelf. Surely, howſoever his opinion may be valued, yet he uſurpeth the praiſe due to others, at leaſt if the invention be at that price at which he ſetteth it. For Mofes Bar-Cephus faſtened on this conjecture above ſix hundred years before Becanus was born: and Bar-Cephus himſelfe referreth the invention to an antiquity more remote, citing for his Author Philoxenus Maburgeniſis, and others, whoſe very words Goropius uſeth, both concerning the Tree, and the reaſons wherewith he would induce other men to that belief. For Mofes Bar-Cephus in his Treatiſe of Paradiſe (the firſt Part and fol. 48.) ſaith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica, The Indian Fig-Tree; of which the greateſt plenty (ſaith Becanus) are found upon the banks of Aceſines, one of the Rivers which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his Fleet of Gallies, in or neer the Kingdom of Porus.

This Tree beareth a fruit of the bigneſs of a great Peaze, or (as Plinie reporteth) ſomewhat bigger; and that it is a tree, ſe ſemper ferens; always planting it ſelf; that it ſpreadeth it ſelf ſo far abroad, as that a troupe of horſemen may hide themſelves under it. Strabo ſaith, that it hath branches bending downwards, and leaves no leſs than a field.

Ariſtobolus

Aristobolus affirmeth, that fifty Horsemen may shadow themselves under one of these Trees. Oneriscritus raiseth this number to four hundred. This tree (saith Theophrastus) exceeded all other in bigness, which also Plinie and Oneriscritus confirm: to the trunk of which, these Authors give such a magnitude, as I shame to repeat. But it may be, they all speak by an ill-understood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not so rare a plant, as Becanus conceiveth, who because he found it no where else, would needs draw the Garden of Paradise to the Tree, and set it by the River Acefinis. But many parts of the world have them, and I my self have seen twenty thousand of them in one Valley, not far from Paria in America. They grow in moist grounds, and in this manner: After they are first shot up some twenty or thirty foot in length (some more, some less, according to the soile) they spread a very large top, having no bough nor twig in the trunk or stem: for from the utmost end of the head branches there issueth out a gummy juyce, which hangeth downward like a cord or sinew, and within a few moneths reacheth the ground; which it no sooner toucheth but it taketh root, and then being filled both from the top boughs, and from his own proper roote, this cord maketh it self a Tree exceeding hastily. From the utmost boughs of these young Trees there fall again the like cords, which in one year and less (in that World of a perpetual Spring) become also trees of the bigness of the nether part of a Lance, and as straight as art or nature can make any thing, casting such a shade, and making such a kinde of Grove, as no other Tree in the world can do. Now, one of these Trees considered with all his young ones, may (indeed) throwd foure hundred or foure thousand Horsemen, if they please; for they cover whole Vallies of ground where these Trees grow near the Sea-bank, as they do by thousands in the inner parts of Trinidad. The cords which fall down over the banks into the Sea, shooting alway downward to find root under water, are in those Seas of the Indies, where Oysters breed, entangled in their beds, so as by pulling up one of these cords out of the Sea, I have seen five hundred Oysters hanging in a heap thereon; whereof the report came, That Oysters grew on Trees in India. But that they beare any such huge leaves, or any such delicate fruit, I could never finde, and yet I have travailed a dozen miles together under them: but to returne to Goropius Becanus. This Tree (saith he) was good for meat and pleasing to the sight, as the Tree of knowledge of good and evil is described to be.

Secondly, This Tree having so huge a trunk (as the former Authours report, and Becanus believeth) it was in this Tree that Adam and Eve hid themselves from the presence of God; for no other tree (saith he) could contain them. But first it is certaine, that this Tree hath no extraordinary magnitude, as touching the trunk or stem, for among ten thousand of them it is hard to finde any one bigger than the rest, and these are all but of a mean size. Secondly, the words of Moses translated, in medio ligni, are by all the Interpreters understood in the plural number (that is) in the midst of the Trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moses Bar-Cephos, word for word) is, That when Adam and Eve found themselves naked, they made them breeches of Fig-leaves; which proveth (indeed) that either the tree it selfe was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew neare it: because Adam being posselt with shame, did not run up and downe the Garden to seeke out leaves to cover him, but found them in the place it selfe; and these leaves of all other were most commodious by reason of their largeness; which Plinie avoweth in these words; Latitudo foliorum pelte effigiem Amazonie habet; The breadth of the leaves hath the shape of Amazonian shield: which also Theophrast confirmeth; the form of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

Cm. 3. 7.

Plin. l. 12. c. 5.

Virg. Aen. l. 1. 494.

Ducit Amazonidum lunatis agmina peltis
PENTHESILAEA furcens.

The Amazons with Crescent-formed shield
PENTHESILAEA leads into the field.

Here Becanus desireth to be believed, or rather threatmeth us all that reade him, to give credit to this his borrowed discovery, using this confident (or rather cholerick) speech: Quis erit tam impudenter obstinatus, si hæc à nobis de sicu hac ex antiquis scriptoribus cum MOISIS narratione comparet, ut audeat dicere aliam arborem inveniri posse, quæ cum illa magis quadret? Who will be so impudently obstinate, if he compare these things which we have reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers delivered, with the narration of MOSES, as to dare to avow, that any other tree can be found, which doth more properly answer, or agree therewith? But for my self, because I neither finde this Tree, sorting in body, in largeness of leaves, nor in fruit to this report, I rather incline to the opinion of Philo. That the Earth never brought forth any of these trees neither before nor after; but I leave every man to his owne belief, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kinde; onely thereby, and by the easie Commandment by God given to Adam, to forbear to feed thereon, it pleased God to make trial of his obedience: Prohibita, non propter aliud, quàm ad commendandum puræ ac simplicis Obedientiæ bonum; Aug. de Civit. Dei, l. 13. c. 20. 10 Being forbidden, not for any other respect, than thereby to commend the goodness of pure and simple Obedience.

§. III.

Of BECANUS his not unwitty allegorizing of the story of his Ficus Indica.

BUT in this I must do Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his supposition of the Tree it selfe to be true. The effects whereof, because his discourses are exceeding ample, I have gathered in these few words. As this Tree (saith he) so did Man grow straight and upright towards God, until such time as he had transgressed and broken the Commandment of his Creator; and then like unto the boughs of this tree, he began to bend downward, and stooped toward the earth, which all the rest of Adam's posterity after him have done, rooting themselves therein, and fastning themselves to this corrupt world. The exceeding umbragiousness of this tree, he compareth to the dark and shadowed life of man, through which the Sun of justice being not able to pierce, we have all remained in the shadow of death, till it pleased Christ to climbe the tree of the Crofs for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, and which is hard to finde among so many large leaves, may be compared (saith he) to the little virtue, and unperceived knowledge among so large vanities, which obscure and shadow it over. And as this fruit is exceeding sweet, and delicate to the taste and palate: so are the delights and pleasures of the world most pleasing, while they dure. But as all those things which are most mellifluous, are soonest changed into choler and bitterness: so are our vanities and pleasures converted into the bitterest sorrows and repentances. That the leaves are so exceeding large, the fruit (for such leaves) exceeding little, in this, by comparison we behold (saith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their sollicitude, their outward shews, and publike ostentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we seek for the fruit, which ought to be their virtuous and pious actions, we finde it of the bigness of the smallest peaze; glory, to all the world apparent; goodness, to all the world invisible. And furthermore, as the leaves, body and boughs of this Tree, by so much exceed all other Plants, as the greatest men of power and worldly abilities surpass the meanest: so is the little fruit of such men, and such trees, rather fitting and becoming the unworthiest Shrub, and humblest Bryar, or the poorest and basest Man, than such a flourishing stateliness, and magnitude. Lastly, whereas Adam, after he had disobeyed God, and beheld his owne nakedness and shame, sought for leaves to cover himselfe withal: this may serve to put us in minde of his and our sins, as often as we put on our garments, to cover and adorne our rotten and mortal bodies: to pamper and maintain which, we use so many uncharitable and cruel practices in this world.

§. IV.

Of the names of the tree of Knowledge of good and evil: with some other notes touching the story of ADAM's sin.

NOW, as touching the sense of this tree of Knowledge of good and evil, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the propertie of the Tree it selfe, Moses Bar-Cephos an ancient Syrian Doctor (translated by M. J. us) giveth this judgement: That the fruit of this Tree had no such virtue or quality, as that by the tasting thereof, there was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if he had been ignorant before; but as Jurinus also noteth: Arbor scientie boni & mali (id est) experientie boni & mali ab eventu. The Tree of knowledge of good and evil (that is) the experience of good and evil by the event. For thus much we may conceive, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workmanship of Gods owne hand, in greater perfection than ever any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created Plant, out of whose seed, all men living have growne up; and having received immortalitye from the breath or spirit of God; he could not (for these respects) be ignorant, that the disobeying of Gods commandment was the fearefullest evil, and the observation of his precepts the happiest good. But as men in perfect health doe not withstanding conceive, that sickness is grievous, and yet in no such degree of torment, as by the suffering and experience in themselves they afterwards witness: so was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the punishments, due to neglect and disobedience; and yet felt by the proofe thereof in himselfe another terror than he had fore-thought, or could imagine. For looking into the glasse of his own guiltie soule, he beheld therein the horror of Gods judgements, so as he then knew, he feelingly knew, and had triall of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchased evil, which could not be exprest. He then saw himselfe naked both in Body and mind; that is, deprived of Gods grace and former felicitie: and therefore was this tree called the tree of Knowledge, and not because the fruit thereof had any such operation by any selfe quality or effect: for the same phrase is used in many places of the Scriptures, and names are given to Signes and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In such sort, as this tree was called the tree of Knowledge, because of the event, as is aforesaid: so was the Well of contention therefore called Esek, and the Well of hatred Sinath, because the Heardmen of Isaac and Gerar contended for them: and the heape of Stones called the heape of witness, between Jacob and Laban; not that the stones bare witness, but for a memorie of the covenant. So Jacob called the house of God Bethel; and Hagar, the Well in the Desert, Viventis, & videntis.

But Adam being both betrayed and mastered by his affections, ambitious of a farther knowledge than he had perceived in himselfe, and looking but slightly (as all his issues doe) into the miseries and sorrowes incident, and greatly affecting the supposed glory which he might obtaine by tasting the fruit forbidden, he was transported and blowne forward, by the gentle winde of pleasing persuasions, unawares; his progression being strengthened by the subtle arguments of Sathan, who laboured to poyson mankind in the very root, which he moistened with the liquor of the same ambition, by which himselfe perished for ever.

But what meanes did the Divell find out, or what instruments did his owne subtilty present him, as fittest and aptest to work this mischief by? even the unquiet vanity of the woman; so as by Adams hearkning to the voice of his wife, contrarie to the expresse commandment of the living God, Mankind by that her incantation became the subject of labour, sorrow, and death: the woman being given to man for a comforter and companion, but not for a counsellor. But because thou hast obeyed the voice of thy wife &c. (said God himselfe) Cursed is the earth for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eate of it all thy life. It is also to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted? even by the most ugly and unworthy of all beasts, into whom the Divell entred and perfwaded.

Secondly, what was the motive of her disobedience? even a desire to know what was most unfitting her knowledge; an affection which hath ever since remained in all the posterity of her sex. Thirdly, what was it that moved the man to yield to her persuasions? even the same cause which hath moved all men since to the like consent; namely, an unwillingnesse to grieve her and make her sad, lest she should pine and be overcome with sorrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Solomon the son of David, Gods chosen servant, and himselfe a man endowed with the greatest wisdomed, did both of them disobey their Creator, by the persuasion and for the love they bare to a woman, it is not so wonderfull as lamentable, that other men in succeeding ages have been allured to so many inconvenient and wicked practices by the persuasions of their wives, or other beloved darlings, who cover over and shadow many malicious purposes with a counterfeit passion of dissimulate sorrow and unquietnesse.

CHAP. V.

Of divers memorable things betwene the fall of ADAM, and the Flood of NOAH.

§. I.

Of the cause and the revenge of CAINS sinne: and of his going out from God.

THe same Pride and Ambition which began in Angels, and afterward possessed Adam, Cain also inherited: for Cain (envious of the acceptance of his Brothers Prayer and Sacrifice) slew him, making himselfe the first Murderer, and his Brother the first Martyr: the revenge of which unnaturall Murder, although it pleased God to mitigate, when Cain cried out that his punishment was greater than he could beare. For the same offence chiefly (wherein with the Sons of Adam, as it were, urged and provoked God) he destroyed all Mankind, but Noah and his Family: for it is written, The Earth also was corrupt before God: of which in the same place Moses giveth a reason; for saith he, The Earth was filled with cruelty: and anon after, God himselfe made the cause knowne unto Noah, saying, An end of all flesh is come before me, for the Earth is filled with cruelty through them, and behold, I will destroy them with the Earth, or from the Earth. Neither was this cruelty meant to have been in taking away the lives of men onely, but in all sorts of Injustice and Oppression. After this Murder of ABEL, CAIN went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the East-side of Eden: in which words The going out of Cain from the presence of the Lord, is not to be understood after the literall sense, God being wholly in all parts of the World; Totus in celo est, totus in terra, non alternis temporibus, sed utrumque simul; God (saith S. AUGUSTINE) is wholly in Heaven, and wholly in Earth, not by entering changed times, but all at once; And that this is true, David witnesseth: If I be in Heaven (saith DAVID) thou art there; in Hell, thou art there also. But what is meant thereby? Expresseth in Gen. 3. 24 in a facie Dei (saith CHRYSOSTOME) CAIN went out from the presence of the Lord (that is) he was left of God, disfavoured and bereaved of his protection.

§. II.

Of CAINS dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his City Enoch.

THis word Nod or Naid, S. Hierome and many others understand to signifie wandering or uncertaine habitation: vexation or agitation, saith Jurinus; not by enteringly convert it otherwise, and take Nod for the proper name of a Countrey, and so doth Josephus. But it seemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or Wanderer in his cogitations, than any thing else, and that his thoughts and conscience had no quiet or rest, in regard of the Murder committed, justly fearing (by his own words) the like violence: And who so ever findeth me (saith CAIN) shall slay me. Now that Nod or Naid was a Region wherein Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling signifies an abiding: and we call those people Wanderers and Vagabonds that have no dwelling place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifest, Moses teacheth in what part of the Earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the East-side of Eden. Secondly it is said by Moses, that after Cain departed from the presence or favour of God, he built a City, and called it by the name of his first-born, Enoch; which sheweth that he feared to wander, and rather sought to fortifie himselfe against revenge. Cyrillus saith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Christ, and of the Jewes; and that as Cain after that he had slain Abel unjustly, had thenceforth no certain abiding in the World: so the Jewes after they had crucified the Son of God, became Runnagates: and it is true, that the Jewes had never since any certain Estate, Common-wealth, or Prince of their owne upon the Earth. Now this Land of Nod, Jurinus taketh to bein Arabia Deserta, a Region of Nomades; but Arabia the Desert is not Eastward, or on the East part of Eden, neither are these Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all these, in what part of the World soever, which in old time lived by Pastorage, and fed (as we we call it in Ireland) upon white meat, without tilling of the ground, are called by the Greeks Nomades, and by the Latines Pastores vagi, as the Northerne Tartarians, the Getulians, and Numidians in Africa, the ancient Britans, and the Northern Irish: yea, such were the Inhabitants of Italy it self, till such time as Italus (who gave them that name) taught them the husbandry of tillage, used at this day. But the Region Eastward from Eden is that part of Assyria, called by Ptolomy Calene, which also might be derived of Carena, the country of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in those parts, it may be gathered by the first possession of his Father Adam; for thus it is written, Genf. 3. Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the Garden of Eden to till the Earth whence hee was taken: and in the Verse following: I thus he cast out man, &c. and at the East side of the Garden of Eden he set the Cherubims: which sheweth that the entry into Paradise was from the East, by which entrance Adam was cast out, and therefore inhabiting on that side of Paradise which was Eastward, according to the Text. Cain also in the same Region of his dwelling place. Now, if the word Nod or Naid doe signifie profugus, that is, a fugitive, we can give no longer time to this uncertain habitation of Cain, than till hee built the City of Enoch, the first of the World, which he inclosed, either for his owne defence, or (as Josephus writeth) to oppress others thereby. So as for mine own opinion, I am relieved with the Septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word (Vagabond) which Cain useth of himselfe, it seemeth by the perclose of the same Verse, that (Vagabond) is therein understood for such an one as travaileth in 20 fear of revengement: For whosoever findeth me (saith CAIN) shall slay me; or else (Vagabond) is taken for a man without protection, and cast out from the favour of God.

And because these Henochians, so called of the City of Enoch, were the first Society & civil assembly of all other, it is likely that the same of these people (either for cruelty, strength, or other actions) lived in the memory of Noah and his Sons: so that after the Flood (as there were of all sorts of natures, some veruouly, some impiously disposed, and every active mind setting before it whom to follow or imitate) those people, which delighted in cruelty and oppression, took on them their names whose natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Henochians were not the least. Perchance the place it self where Enoch stood before the Flood, and whereof the Monuments 30 might remain (as the pillars or the foundation of Joppe did) gave occasion to the Planters of that place to call themselves by the same name: for of those Henochians there were many Nations in the borders of Pontus, & Colchis in Iberia, Ségdiana, & Bactria; of the same name many mountains, as those which are otherwise called Coraxici. And seeing that it is hard to finde out the truth of these things, which the most aged Time hath covered over or defaced, we may (according to the counsel of Plato) exceedingly rejoice, and therewith satiate our selves, if of so great & almost worn-out antiquity, if of the eldest peoples names & nations, there remain any print or footsteps to posterity.

In * Pliny, P. Mela, Strabo, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, Stephanus, we finde those Henochians described, though diversly written; as in Pliny, sometimes Henochii, in Mela, Eniochi, 40 in Flaccus, Hemochii; in Lucan, Eniochi, all which inhabit upon the Sea Euxinus, but yet in none of these are on the East side of Eden, or (according to Moses words) Eastward from Eden. For Moses in all places where he describeth any Region, was so exceeding precise as sometime he useth the word East or South without borrowing or addition, at other times with a borrowing, as Eastward, or Southward, or towards the East or South. In the place of Genesis the eleventh, he writeth the word (East) simply and directly. And as they went from the East, they found a Plaine in the Land of Shinar; but in this of Cain he addeth the word (towards) as, in the Land of Nod, towards the East side of Eden; which may be taken, as inclining some one point or two either to the North or to the South of the East.

But as we may conjecture that these Nations took name of Enoch the City of Cain; or of the Region wherein it stood, when the same was repopled after the Flood: so it is probable that these Henochii of Colchis, and other parts adjoining, were not the first of that name after the Sons of Noah began to fill the World again: because, had this Enoch the City of Cain stood in any of these parts, it had then bin seated North, and not East or Eastward from Eden. But as Pliny findeth their habitation towards Pontus, so afterwards he goeth on Eastward, till he track them or trace them out to their original.

an hundred and fifty mile Eastward hee findeth another Nation of them about Iberia and Albania; & beyond these he again discovereth a third Nation, from whence all the rest took beginning, which inhabited on the West side of the mountains of Paropamisus between them and the great River of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the North side; and these Henochii are due East from the Region of Eden, and Eastward from the very Garden it self.

And although we cannot be assured that these Henochii took name from the memory of the City of Enoch directly; yet because they inhabited due East from Paradise, and afterwards spread themselves Westward (as all Noah's Sons did that came into 10 Shinar) the conjecture is far more probable than that of Annius the Frier, who sets Henoch in Phœnicia, quite contrary to Moses word: Phœnicia from all parts of Eden being directly west.

And besides these severall Nations of the Henochii, Stephanus findeth a Region called Enochia, and the same also in the East, with divers mountains about Bactria and Sogdiana, of the same name. Only the Grecians (according to their fabulous inventions of all things else) out of the word (Heniochi) which signifieth Carts or Coach-men, make 20 these Nations to have sprung from the Waggoners of Castor and Pollux (to wit) Amphibites and Telechini, who attended them in the enterprize of Jafon into Colchis. And though I doe not deny, but that Jafon with other Greeks ranged the coasts of Asia the less in an open Boat or kind of small Galley, * of whom I shall speake in his own time: yet no man doubteth but that the Tale of the Golden Fleece was for the most part Poetically; and withall that in such an open Boat, which could hardly carry their owne 30 Rowers, being 54. there was no place, and less use of Coach-horses or Waggoners.

§. III.

Of MOSES his omitting sundry things concerning CAIN'S Generation.

BUT of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the City of Enoch in Bophane Story, thus much may suffice: Now it followeth to answer some few Objections against certain particulars in the fourth and fifth Chapter of Genesis: 30 against which for the first it is demanded, how it was possible for Cain (having no other assistance than his Son Henoch) to performe such a Work as the building of a City, seeing there is thereto required so many hands, and so great a mass of all sorts of materials? To which it is answered, that we are first to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious Race) Moses useth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his divine Reason, seeing that he containeth the whole Story of the first Race, which lasted by the least account, 1656. years, in five short Chapters. Yet thus much may every man borrow of his own weakest reason, That seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first generations of mens lives so long a measure as 800. & 900. 40 years, that in such a space Cain had not want of leisure and means to build many such Cities as Enoch, be the capacity answering to what other of the World (soever for in what Age of Cain's life he built it, the Scriptures are silent: as of whose times, and the times of his issues Moses had the least care. And, as it was said of Cain, that he built a City: so it was said of Noah, that his three Sons peopled all the World; but in both, the process of time required to be understood: which advice, seeing Moses useth where the space less requireth it, as knowing that he writ the Scriptures to reasonable men, we may easily understand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference between the birth of Abel, and the oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort, Fuit autem post dies multos or a fine dierum (that is) in process of time, it came 50 to passe that CAIN brought an oblation. And therefore it is in like sort to be understood of Cain, that many years fore-gone, and when his people were increased, hee built the City of Enoch or Henoch.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he built Enoch, so of Solomon, that hee built the Temple of Jerusalem; yet it is well known of Solomon, that he employed in that Work 150000. labourers: for this phrase or speech is common with our selves to say, the King invaded, when he caused an invasion to be made: & he built, when he commanded such a building. And therefore seeing that we find that Moses had no regard to the ages, birth, or death of any of Cain's issues, it is not to be marvelled at, why hee also 2 kin. 16.
 passeth

Gen. 4. 17. passeth over in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for of Cain, Moses writeth in this manner: Cain also knew his Wife, who conceived and bare Enoch, and he built a City, and called the name of the City after the name of his Sonne Enoch. And to Enoch was borne Irada, and Irada begat Mehujael, and Mehujael begat Methusael, and Methusael Lamech.

E. S. V. S. Now of Seth, Moses writeth far otherwise, and in this manner. And SETH lived an hundred and five yeares, and begat Enoch, and SETH lived after he begat Enoch 807 yeares, and begat sonnes and daughters: so as all the daies of SETH were 912 yeares, and he dyed: as for the yeares and times of the wicked, they were not numbered in libro viventi-um, saith Cyril. But in Seth was the Church of God established; from whom Christ descended, as touching his manhood: and therfor: this way and work Moses walked in, and finished it with care, passing over the reprobate Generation (as aforesaid,) Of the Line of Adam by Cain, Moses remembreth but eight Generations, reckoning Adam for one; and of the Line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth.

I. ADAM.

2 Cain	7 Lamech, who by	2 Seth.	7 Enoch.
3 Enoch.	Adah had	3 Enoch.	8 Methusalem.
4 Irada.	8 Tubal & Tubal, &	4 Cainan.	9 Lamech, and
5 Methujael.	by Silla, Tubal-Cain.	5 Mahaleel.	10 Noah.
6 Methusael.	and Noëma.	6 Jared.

Gen. 4. 20, 21, 22 These be the Generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention: but Joseph giveth unto Lamech threecore and seventeen Sonnes and Daughters, by his two Wives Ada and Sylla: and to these three sons of Lamech, Moses ascribeth the invention of Pastorage, of Musick, and the working in Metall; for it seemeth that Tubal first gathered together, and made familiar those beasts which formerly were untamed, & brought them into Heards and Drovers: Tubal invented musick, and Tubal-cain the working in Brasse and Iron: the one being addicted to Husbandry, the other was Mechanical, the third given to idleness and pleasure. In whom began these three meaner degrees of Shepherds, Handy-crafts-men, and Musicians. And in the issues of Seth began the Services of God, Divinity, Prophecie, and Astronomy: the Children of the one beheld the Heavens, the other the Earth.

§. IV.

Of the diversities in the Ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their Children.

A Second Scruple hath been made, How it came to passe that the Patriarchs begat their children at so divers Ages, as Cainan or Cenan at seventy yeares, Mahaleel and Enoch at threecore and five yeares, whereas Jared begat not any of his untill he was 162. yeares old: Methusalem begat at 187. Lamech at 182. and Noah at 500. yeares. Now this difference hath been the more enforced, because it cannot be conjectured, that either Jared, Methusalem, or Lamech abstained from Marriage out of the religion of Abstinence, seeing that Enoch, who was translated by God for his singular Sanctities, begat children before he was threecore and ten yeares old.

The apparent difference hereof ariseth in this, that Moses did not number the Generations before the Flood precisely, according to the first begotten and eldest sons of the Patriarchs, but he drew down the Line of Noah from Seth, and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Ancestors, were they elder or younger, as he found them: for it is likely that Enoch was not the eldest of Jared, nor Lamech the first-born of Methusalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing known to the contrary, but that Noah might have had many Sons before Shem, Ham, and Japhet, though these three were only named, and surviving, & which by God were reserved to see the Fathers of mankind after the Flood; and therefore when we find Mahaleel to be begotten by Kenan at threecore and ten yeares, who was the first Son of Kenan, and then reckon that Methusalem begat Lamech in the 187. year of his life, the difference seemeth strange, where Lamech is taken for the eldest. But Moses rejecteth all the other sons of Methusalem but Lamech only, because he was the Father of Noah, as aforesaid. Of this Saint Saint Augustine hath somewhat else in his twentieth, and one and twentieth Chapters, De Civitate Dei.

But as Moses counted the Generations of the first Age, and so to Abraham, and the children of the promise after him; so doth S. Matthew recite the Genealogy of Christ, not by the eldest sons, but from those whom God had chosen and blessed, without respect of the first-born, who have hereby the prerogative in Estates, worldly and transitory only; and therefore the Evangelist nameth Isaac, and not Ismael, though Ismael Mat. 1. 2. were first in time: so doth he take Jacob the younger, and not Esan the Elder; neither is Christ derived from any of the three eldest Patriarchs, Reuben, Simoon, or Levi, but from Juda a fourth Brother, and so from David a younger son of Jessai; and lastly, we finde, that the Kingdome it self of Juda was not given to the Heir in nature, but to the Heir of Grace, namely Solomon. 1 Kings 2.

§ V.

Of the long lives of the Patriarchs, and some of late memory.

The third Objection is, that the great difference of yeares between those of the first Age, whereof some of them had well neer seen a thousand yeares, makes it disputable, whether the account of times were of the same measure as in after-Ages, seeing that soon after the Flood, men lived not a third part of that time, and in succeeding Ages, and to this day, not the tenth.

They that have hereon resolved that those yeares were but Lunary yeares, (to wit) of a month or thereabouts, or Egyptian yeares, are easily confuted. For whereas Seth begat Enoch in the year of his life an hundred and five; if those yeares be taken but for months, then had Seth lived but eight yeares and one month when he begat Enoch; and if the time of Enoch have the same allowance when he begat Kenan, then could Enoch at that time have been but six yeares and forty eight weeks old; and so it may be gathered of the rest, excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kinde, as were the trees in their kinde, bearing fruit and seed. But this were too ridiculous to imagine. For to give an ability of generation at fix, seven, or eight yeares, agreeth with the short lives of the Pigmies, and not with the constitutions of our first Fathers, who being descended from Adam, the workmanship of Gods hands, and begotten and born in the strong youth of the World, and length of daies, and ability of body agreeable. Again, if we allow this idle conceit of the lunary yeares, then there would follow this extremity, that those which lived longest, and upwards of nine hundred yeares, had by that account but the time of fourcore and ten and odd yeares, which were not only lesse by far than the Patriarchs lived after the Flood, but short of many mens lives in this decrepit Age of the World, wherein many exceed fourcore, and some a hundred yeares. Further (if need be) to disprove this reckoning, whereas it is written, Gen. 25. That Abraham died in a good Age, an old man, and of great yeares: all which (if the former account were of Lunary yeares) makes but seventeen and an half of our yeares.

And if we seek for a cause of this long life in nature, then is it reasonable, that the first man, created in highest perfection, should also beget children of equal strength or little differing: for of the first and purest seed there mult of necessity spring up the fairest and fruitfullest plants. Secondly, the Earth it self was then much less corrupt, which yeilded her increase, and brought forth fruit and food for man, without any such mixture of harmfull quality, as since that time the curse of God, for the cruelty of mans heart, brought on it and mankind: Neither had the waters of the Flood infused such an impurity, as thereby the naturall and powerfull operation of all Plants, Herbs, and Fruits upon the Earth received a qualification and harmfull change. And as all things under the Sun have one time of strength, and another of weaknesse, a youth and beauty, and then age and deformity: so time it self (under the deathfull shade of whose wings all things decay and wither) hath wasted and worn out that lively vertue of Nature in Man, and Beasts, and Plants; yea, the Heavens themselves, being of a most pure and cleaneft matter, shall wax old as a garment; and then much more the power generative in inferiour Creatures, who by the ordinance of God receive operative Vertue from the superiour.

But besides the old Age of the World, how far doth our education and simplicity of of living differ from that old time? the tender bringing up of Children, first fed and nourished with the Milk of a strange Dugge; an unnatural curiosity having taught all Women (but the Beggar) to suckle out Nurfes, which necessity, onely ought to commend unto them: The hasty Marriages in tender years, wherein, Nature being but yet green and growing, we rent from her and replant her branches, while her self hath not yet any root sufficient to maintain her own top; and such half-ripe seeds (for the most part) in their growing up wither in the bud, and wax old even in their Infancy. But above all things, the exceeding luxurioufness of this gluttonous age, wherein we press Nature with over-weighty burdens, and finding her strength defective, we take the work out of her hands, and commit it to the artificial help of strong Waters, hot Spices, and provoking Sawces; of which Lucan hath these elegant Verses:

Pharj. 4.

-----O Prodigia rerum
Luxuries nunquam parvo contenta parati:
Et quistiora terra pelagoq; ciborum
Ambitiosa famas, & laute gloria mense,

Discite quàm parvo liceat producere vitam:
Et quantum Natura pesat.
Non auro myrrhâq; bibant: sed gurgite puro
Vita redit: satis est populi fuviusq; Ceresque.

O wastfull Riot never well content
With low-priz'd fare; hunger ambitious
Of Cares by Land and Sea far fetcht and sent:
Vain glory of a Table sumptuous,
Learn with how little life may be preserved.
In Gold and Myrrhe they need not to carouse,
But with the Brook the peoples thirst is served:
Who fed with Bread and Water are not starved.

Fier. Hierig. 1.2

The Egyptians affirm, that the longest time of man's life is a hundred years, because the heart in a perfect body waxeth and groweth to strength fifty years, and afterwards by the same degree decayeth and withereth. Epigenes findeth in his Philosophy, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twenty years, and Berosus to a hundred and seventeen years. These opinions Plinie repeateth and reproveth, producing many examples to the contrary. In the last taxation, number and review of the eighth region of Italy, there were found in the Roll (saith Plinie) foure and fifty persons of an hundred years of age: seven and fifty of an hundred and ten: two, of an hundred and five and twenty: foure, of an hundred and thirty: as many that were an hundred and five and thirty, or a hundred and seven and thirty years old: and last of all, three men of an hundred and forty: and this search was made in the times of Vespasian the Father and the Son.

Jes. ant. l. 13. c. 8.

The simple dyet and temperate life of the Ethiops gave them long account of many years: so did it to the Secretaries of Egyptian Ceremonies, to the Persians Magicians, and Indian Brachmans. The Greeks ascribe out of Homer, that Nestor lived three Ages, and Tiresias six, Sibylla three hundred years, Endymion of the Iles Asia, little less: Also Masaniha of Numidia lived very long, and Dando of Illyria. Among the kings of Arcadia many lived three hundred years (saith Epiphorus). Hellanicus affirmeth of the Epeians, that some of them lived full two hundred years; and so doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians; and that these reports are not fabulous, Josephus bringeth many witnesses with himself: as Marebaron, Berosus, Mochus, Elfius, Hieronymus, Egyptius, Hecateus, Epiphorus, and others. And Anthony Fume, an Historian of good reputation reporteth, that in the year 1570. there was an Indian presented to Solyman, General of the Turks Army, who had outlived three hundred years. I my self knew the old Countess of Desmond of Inchiquin in Munster, who lived in the year 1589. and many years since, who was married in Edward the Fourth's time, and held her joynture from all the Earles of Desmond since then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Munster can witness: so Strozzius Cicogna, out of Torquemada Massius, and the like Authours, telleth of some that have not only far exceeded the term prescribed by Epigenes; but been repaired from the withered estate of decrepitude to fresh youth. But for length of life, if we note but the difference between the ability of men in those daies wherein Galen the Physician lived, it may easily prove unto us what Reeds we are in respect of those Cedars of the first age. For Galen did ordinarily let blood six pound weight, whereas we (for the most part) stop at six ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Constellations) which are the natural causes of a long and healthful life: (to wit) strong Parents, Parents, a pure and thin ayre, and temperate use of dyet, pleasure, and rest: for those which are built of rotten timber, or mouldring stone, cannot stand long upright; on ayre we feed alwaies and in every instant, and on meats but at times: and yet the beauty of abundance, wherewith we oppress and overcharge Nature, maketh her to sink unawares in the midway; and therefore with a good constitution, a pure ayre, and a temperate use of those things which nature wanteth, are the onely friends and companions of a long life.

§. VI.

10 Of the Patriarchs delivering their knowledge by Tradition: and that ENOCH writ before the Flood.

A Fourth scruple hath bin made, How the certain knowledge of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Story thereof written; and if any such had been, yet it is conceived, that all memory of Antiquity perished in the Universal Flood.

But if we consider the curiosity and policy of elder ages, we shall finde, that knowledge was the greatest treasure that men sought for, and which they also covered and hid from the vulgar sort, as Jewels of inestimable price, fearing the irreverent construction of the ignorant and irreligious: so as whatsoever was attained unto concerning God, and his working in nature, the same was not left to publique dispute, but delivered over by heart and tradition from wise men to a posterity equally zealous; Ex animo in animum sine literis medio intercedente verbo: From minde to minde without Letters, by way of Disc. Ascp. of Tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by Esfaras, Origen, and Hilarius (as Mirandula conceiveth) that Moses did not onely upon the Mount receive the Law from God, but withal, secretiorum & veram legis enarrationem; a more secret and true explanation of the Law; which (saith he, out of the same Authours,) he delivered by mouth to Josuah, and Josuah to the Elders: for to teach these mysteries, which he called secretiora, to the rude multitude, were no other quam dare sanctum canibus, & inter porcos spargere Margaritas; than to give holy things to Dogs, and to cast Pearls before Swine. In succeeding times this understanding and wisdom began to be written in Ciphers and Characters, and Letters bearing the form of beasts, birds, and other creatures; and to be taught onely to such as served in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Jews was an imitation: the invention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falsely.

This Cabala importeth a Law, received by tradition and unwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is receptio in Latine, and a receiving in English. And this custome was also held by the Druids and Bards of our ancient Britains, and of latter times by the Irish Chroniclers called Rimers. If then such as would seem wisest in the use of reason, will not acknowledge that the story of the Creation, or beginning of all things, was written by inspiration, the holy Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by tradition (then used) be delivered unto him by a more certain presumption, than any or all the testimonies which prophane antiquity had preserved and left to their successors: which their wise men (as they terme them) did lay up and defend from the injury of the time and other hazards. For, leaving to remember that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his children and successors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifest, that Methusalem lived together with Adam himself two hundred forty and three years, and Noah with Methusalem no less than five hundred years: and before Noah died, Abraham was fifty and eight years old: from whence this knowledge by an easie and ordinary way might come to Israel, and so to Moses.

But besides this tradition, it is questionless, that the use of letters was found out in the very infancy of the world, proved by those prophecies written on pillars of stone and brick by Enoch: of which Josephus affirmeth, that one of them remained even in his time (meaning belike some ruine or foundation thereof) which pillars by others are ascribed to Seth. But of these prophecies of Enoch, S. Jude testifieth; and some part of his Books (which contained the course of the Stars, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia Felix, in the Dominion of the Queen of Saba (saith Origen) of which Strullian affirmeth, that he had seen, and read some whole Pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledge of the Creation, and story of of the first Age, seeing he might receive it both by tradition and letters, had not the spirit of God instructed and inspired him as it did: which also his many and strange miracles performed before he wrote the Scriptures make more manifest.

Now for the Books of Enoch, howsoever some men make mention of them, sure I am that Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, Beda, Procopius, Gzarus (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medina, for an argument to prove them unwritten traditions, allegeth that Pope Gelasius among other the Apocryphal Scriptures (which he rejecteth) named not these of Enoch; but that whatsoever was remembered out of them, the same was delivered by Tradition from the Jews. But I rather think with Pererius, that such a Book there was, and that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostles, and many things added thereunto by Hereticks; who took occasion upon the antiquity thereof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the Devil about the body of Moses, to frame and add thereunto many inventions of their own. One of the greatest arguments against these Books, is, that neither Philo nor Josephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquity) make mention thereof. But against it I will set this opinion of S. Augustine, Scriptisse quidem nonnulla divina Enoch, illam septimum ab Adam, negare non possumus; That Enoch the seventh from Adam, did write divers divine things, we cannot deny. Now his writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the antiquity, and of fables of Giants, supposed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such Book was found amongst those Canonical Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armario Judaico (saith Tertullian) who yet affirmeth that this Book might be preserved by Noah. Surely, that Enoch wrote the prophecies remembered by Jude, no man can deny; how they were delivered to posterity, I know not; whether by the Jews Cabala, or by what other means, the same is but mans conjecture. And certainly by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the Heavens, and of the natures and conjunctions of the Stars; and afterwards to some of his sons, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is very probable that Noah had seen and might preserve this Book. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly invented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath been said before. And therefore if letters and arts were known from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah lived with Methusalem, who lived with Adam, and Abraham lived with Noah, it is not strange (I say) to conceive how Moses came to the knowledge of the first Age, be it by letters, or by Cabala and tradition, had the undoubted word of God need of any other proof than self-authority.

§. VII.

Of the men of renown before the Flood.

Now let us consider the relation of Moses, who nameth seven descents of Cain's children: and of Adam by Seth ten; Seth being given by God in stead of Abel: and of Seth was Enoch begotten, in whose time men began to profess Religion, and to offer sacrifice in publique. For although Adam instructed his children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it seemeth that after the birth of Enoch, men began publicly to call on the Name of the Lord, that is, they served and praised God by Communion and in publique manner, or calling upon the Name of the Lord; and thereby were the sons of God, or the godly, distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enoch the son of Seth, to the time of Enoch the son of Jared, there is nothing remembered by Moses, but their owne births, the births of their sons, the length of their lives, and deaths. But of Enoch it is written: That he walked with God, and he was no more seen: For God tooke him away. By that, that he walked with God, was meant, that he was a just and upright man, and that he feared, loved, and obeyed God. For the same phrase Moses useth of Noah; Noah was a just and upright man in his time, and Noah walked with God. The seventy convert it, Enoch placuit Deo; Enoch pleased God. And although Aben-Ezra and others understand this place, (inuit eum Deus) scilicet, mortuus est; God tooke him away, (that is) he dyed, which (indeed) agreeth both with the phrase of the Scripture, and with our manner of speech to this day, to say, God tooke him away when he died; yet the difference which Moses maketh between the piety of Enoch, and the rest of the Patriarchs triarchs, and by omitting the word (death) which he useth to all else, makes it manifest, that Enoch was not dissolved as the rest, For to all the rest of the Patriarchs, Moses useth these words, And he dyed; but of Enoch he spake otherwise, saying only, He was missing, or he was not seen. Et non inveniebatur (saith the Apostle to the Hebrewes) quia Deus eum transtulit; And he was not found, for the Lord tooke him away. In the same place it is expressly added, that he saw not death.

Gen. 5. 24.

But whether this taking away of Enoch were not with the same kinde of changing, which S. Paul promiseth, when he saith, that, when the end shall come, we shall not all dye, 1 Cor. 15. 51. but all shall be changed, I leave it to the learned Divines.

After Enoch, Moses passeth over to Methusalem and Lamech, remembring (as of the rest) the times of their birth and death: saying that Lamech prophesied of his son Noah, saying, This same shall comfort us concerning our works, and sorrow of our hands, as touching the earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writeth more amply than of any of the rest of Adam's children by Seth, being the last of the ten generations of the first Age, whom God (with his Family) preserved, because he was an upright man in his time, and feared God.

But of the warre, peace, government, and policy of those strong and mighty men, so able both in body and wit, there is no memory remaining: whose stories if they had bin preserved, and what else was then performed in that newesse of the world, there could nothing of more delight have been left to posterity. For the exceeding long lives of men (who to their strength of body and naturall wits, had the experience added of 800 and 900 years) how much of necessity must the same adde of wisdom and undertakings? Likely it is, that their works excelled all whatsoever can be told of aftertimes, especially in respect of this old age of the World, when we no sooner begin to know, but we begin to die; according to Hippocrates: Vita brevis, ars longa, tempus præcepti; (which is) Life is short, art is long, and time is headlong. And that those people of the first age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of Moses; These were mighty men, which in old time were men of renown. But these men of renown (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for strength of body, and cruelty of mind) trusted so much to their owne abilities, as they forgot altogether the piety of Seth, and the waies wherein Enoch walked: for all the imaginations of their hearts were evil, only evil, and continually evil. And this wickedness was not only found in the issues of Cain, but it was then universal, when the children and sons of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and misled by their idolatrous wives, the daughters of Cain, or of those other men, loving themselves and the world only.

That these sons of God were Angels, which being taken with the beauty of women, accompanied them and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed; namely, Lactantius, and Eusebius, misled by Josephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterward changed their former opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers have taken great advantage, and have troubled themselves with large answers, and very needlesse: the question being uncapable of dispute, especially since S. Chrysostom and S. Augustine have answered it largely long agoe. For, that good and godly men were honoured with the title of Gods children, it doth every where appear in the Scripture; and on the contrary, to thinke that Angels, who (as Christ witnesseth) behold the face of God, (that is) alwaies attend his commandments, should after a separation from the rest which fell with Lucifer, forsake the glorious presence of their Creator, and become Incubi, or Succubi, contrary both to Nature and Grace, were more than madnesse to imagine.

§. VIII.

That the Giants by Moses so called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as also divers in later times.

Of these Giants which Moses calleth mighty men, Coropius became an Antwerpian (who thought his owne wit more Gigantically than the bodies of Nimrod or Hercules) hath written a large discourse, intitled Gigantomachia, and strayed his braines to prove, that there were never any such men: his reasons (whoever desires to lose time) he may find them in the Treatises before named. It is true that Cyrollus re proves the Grecian Poets for their monstrous fictions: who affirme shamelessly, That

That the Giants have in elder times not only cast up Mountains upon Mountains, but removed Islands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that invention of casting up Hills, and making war with the gods, no doubt but that the same was borrowed out of the story of Nimrod, as before remembered; and even out of this Scripture: That the Sons of God saw the Daughters of Men, of whom the first Giants were begotten, was that conceit taken of Orpheus and Hesiodus. That Giants were the sons of the Heaven and the Earth; meaning by the Heavens the sons of God, and by the Earth the daughters of Men: which verses of Orpheus are by John Cassian (who hath written a witty discourse of this subject) thus changed into Latine:

Orti quod terræ fuerint & sanguine cæli.*

From the Earth, and from thy blood, O Heaven, they came,
Whom thereupon the gods did Giants name.

But what will not Opiniators and selfe-beleeving men dispute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceive that there were in the first Age such kind of men; and of which there have been in all times since; seeing the Scriptures avow the one manifestly, and common experience the other?

And for that superlative straining of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was given to Oppressors and Tyrants, and not to strength of body and eminent stature: such men might with better reason call them Oppressors, because they were Giants; and therefore had ability to oppress, than say, That they were called Giants only, because Oppressors. For first, Moses himself calleth them mighty men; which sheweth a strength surpassing others: and afterwards men of renowne, (that is) of great undertaking and adventurous action. And if the same stature of body, and ability had not beene found among divers Nations after the generall flood, then might this place of Moses have more willingly hearkened to a dispute, and yielded to interpretation.

But besides all these famous Giants found in prophane Histories (which I will reserve to accompany the Giants of Albion, in the story of Britanie) the Scriptures doe cleerly and without all allegorical construction avow, That, besides Nimrod, there were found 30 of these Giants in the time of Abraham, of Moses, of Joshua, and of David; namely, the Rephaims in Afteroth; the Zuzzai or Zanzummims in Ham, and the Emims which dwelt anciently in the Land of Moab: whom Moses (for stature) compareth with the Anakims which dwelt in Hebron; for they also were taken for Giants as the Anakims. Likewise where Moses speaketh of the Land of Ammon he useth these words: That also was taken for a land of Giants, for Giants dwelt therein afore-times: & whom the Ammonites call Zanzummims: a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And these Giants called Rephaims in Afteroth and Karnaim, and the Zuzzai or Zanzummims, Chedorlaomer king of Elam overthrew, assisted by other kings his associates. Also the Prophet Amos found among the Ammonites men of giant-like stature, whom he compareth to the Cedar, and whose strength to the Oakes; and the Prophet Baruch, These were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of so great stature, and so expert in war. Particularly it is written of Og, K. of Basan, that his bed of yron was 9 cubits long, and four cubits broad: for only Og king of Basan remained of the remnant of the Giants, who commanded the Kingdom of Basan, foure hundred yeares after the Expedition of Chedorlaomer. Moreover, those Discoverers and Searchers of the Land of Promise (sent by Moses from Cadelbarne in Paran) made reporte at their returne of the great stature of those people in general, and especially of the sons of Anak, in these words: All the people which we saw in it are men of great stature: for there we saw Giants, the sons of ANAK, which come (that is) the Searchers found in their owne judgements a marvellous difference between the Anakims and themselves: inso much that the Israelites were so stricken with fear, as they rather fought and desired to return againe into Egypt, and were more willing to endure their former slavery, than to fall by the strokes of those fearful Nations: Furthermore, the Scriptures put us out of doubt, that Goliath the Philistine of Gath, was a Giant of six cubits and a span long: the Armour which he wore weighed five thousand shekles of brasse: the shaft of his speare was like a Weavers beame, and his speare-head weighed six hundred shekles of yron. Also in Samuel there is mention of another Goliath of another Goliath, surnamed Gethens, because he was of Gath: and of three other Giants; of which the first was slain by Jonathan, David's Nephew, who had twelve fingers, and as many toes: a man of great stature, and his fingers were by sixes, even four and twenty.

Also that Samson was of surpassing strength, no man doubteth, who tore a Lion as it had been a Kid, and after threethirty of the Philistines, and (after that) a thousand more of them with a Jaw-bone of an Ass: And lastly, he took the gates of Azzah, and the two Polls, and lifted them away with the bars, and put them upon his shoulders, and carried them to the top of the Mountain before Ebron. If then it be approved by every judgement, that both Nature and the Heavens wax old, and that the great age of Time hath (with it self) infeebled and almost worn out the virtue of all things, then, I say, That as in all other kinds the Earth (before that Sin had increased the curse and corruption) brought forth her young ones more strong and beautiful, than it did in after ages: so also those Giants, those mighty men, and men of renown, as far exceeded the proportion, nature, and strength of those Giants, remembered by Moses of his own time, and after him their successors, as the ordinary proportion of all men in general, soon after the flood and in times far off, exceeded the bulks and bodies of men which are now born in the withered quarter and Winter of the World. If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth age, much more in the first flourishing youth and newness of the world.

But the wickedness (especially in cruelty and oppression) of these men was such, as God therefore by the flood gave end to all flesh, but to the just Noah and his Family. And God repented him that he had made man: which S. Augustine thus expoundeth; Neg; Gen. 6. 6. enim sicut hominem, ita Deum facti sui penitet, cuius est de omnibus omnino rebus tam fixa De Civit. Dei. sententia, quam certa presentia. Sed si non utatur Scriptura talibus verbis, non se quodammodo familiariter insinuat omni generi hominum, quibus vult esse consilium: ut & perterreat superbie, & exciet negligentes, & exerceat querentes, & aliat intelligentes; God (saith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done (as men use to do): but if the Scripture did not use those words, or the like, it should not (in a sort) insinuate it self familiarly to all sorts of men, for whom it would provide: that it might terrifie the proud, stir up the negligent, exercise the searchers of the truth, and nourish those that understand.

CHAP. VI.

Of idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

That in old corruptions we may finde some signs of more ancient truth.

HERE, before we proceed any further, the occasion offereth it self for us to consider how the Greeks and other more ancient Nations, by fabulous inventions, and by breaking into parts the story of the Creation, and by delivering it over in a mystical sense, wrapping it up mixed with other their own trumpery, have sought to obscure the truth thereof; and have hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receive those inter-mixt discourses of God and Nature, for the inventions of Poets and Philosophers, and not as any thing borrowed or stolne out of the Books of God. But as a skillful and learned Chymist can aswell by separation of visible elements draw helpful medicines out of poyson, as poyson out of the most healthful herbs and plants (all things having in themselves both life and death): so, contrary to the purposes and hopes of the Heathen, may those which seek after God and Truth, find out every-where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philosophers, the Story of the first Age, with all the works and marvels thereof, amply and lively exprest.

§. II.

That the corruptions themselves were very ancient; as in the Family of NoAH, and in the old Egyptians.

But this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in men (the one having erred but once, the other ever) as concerning Mankind it took such effect, that thereby (the liberal grace of God being withdrawn) all the posterity of our first Parents were afterwards born and bred in a world, suffering a perpetual Eclipse of spiritual light. Hence it was that it produced plants of such imperfection and harmful quality, as the waters of the general flood could not so wash out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of mankind. Yea, even among the few sons of Noah, there were found strong effects of the former poison. For as the children of Sem did inherit the virtues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; so the sons of Cham did possess the vices of the sons of Cain, and of those wicked Giants of the first Age. Whence the Chaldeans began soon after the Flood to ascribe divine power and honour to the Creature, which was only due to the Creator. First, they worshipped the Sun, and then the Fire. So the Egyptians and Phœnicians did not only learn to leave the true God, but created twelve several gods, and divine powers, whom they worshipped, and unto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Herodotus saith, Duodecim Deorum nomina primos Egyptios in usu habuisse, atque Græcos ab illis cepisse mutatos, eo quæ prius Aræ, & Imagines, & Tempia Diis sibi crexissent; The Egyptians (saith he) first deified the names of the twelve gods, which the Greeks received from them, who first erected unto themselves Altars, Images, and Temples for the gods.

Herod. in Euc.

§. III.

That in process of time these lesser errors drew on greater: as appeareth in the gross Superstitions of the Egyptians.

But as men once fallen away from undoubted truth, do then after wander for evermore in vices unknown, and daily travail towards their eternal perdition: so did these gross and blinde Idolaters every Age after other, descend lower and lower, and shrink and slide downwards from the knowledge of one true and very God; and did not thereby erre in worshipping mortal men only, but they gave divine reverence, and had the same respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowls, Winds, Earth, Water, Ayre, Fire, to the Morning, to the Evening, to Plants, Trees, and Roots, to Passions and Affections of the Minde, to Palenes, Sickness, Sorrows, yea to the most unworthy and basest of all these. Which barbarous blasphemy, Rhodius Anaxandrides derideth in this manner:

§. IV.

§. IV.

That from the reliques of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols and Fables were invented: and the first Jupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

But in so great a confusion of vanities, where among the Heathens themselves there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to finde out from what example the beginnings of these inventions were borrowed, or after what ancient pattern they erected their building, were it not certain that the Egyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of whatsoever was done therein, partly from some inscriptions upon stone or metall remaining after the Flood; and partly from Mizraim the son of Cham, who had learnt the same of Cham, and Cham of his Father Noah: for all that the Egyptians write of their ancient Kings, and date of times, cannot be fained, and though other Nations after them had by imitation their Jupiters also, their Saturns, Vulcans, and Mercuries, with the rest, which S. Augustine out of Varro, Eusebius out of many prophane Histories, Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, and many more have observed, to wit, the Phœnicians, Phrygians, Cretians, Greeks, and other Nations; yet was Cain the Sonne of Adam (as some very learned men conceive) called and reputed for the first and ancient Jupiter, and Adam for the first Saturn: for Jupiter was said to have invented the founding of Cities; and the first City of the World was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Henochii before remembered. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which also Higinius in his 275. Chapter confirmeth. For besides that many Cities were founded by divers men; Tamen primam latissimam à primo & antiquissimo Jove edificatam: yet the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient Jupiter, seated in the East parts, or in India, according to that of Moses: And Cain dwelt towards the East side of Eden, &c. where also the Henochii were found after the Flood. And therefore was Jupiter by the Athenians called Poliens, a Founder of Cities, and Herceios, an incloser or strengthener of Cities (say Phormutus and Pausanias); and that to Jupiter Herceios there were in very many places Altars and Temples erected. And that there were Cities built before the Flood, Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that soon after mankind began to increase, they built many Cities; which, as his meaning, he delivereth in plaine termes, in his third Book of Lawes: for he saith that Cities were built an exceeding space of time before the destruction by the great Flood.

This first Jupiter of the Ethnicks was then the same Cain, the sonne of Adam, who marrying his own Sister (as also Jupiter is said to have done) inhabited the East, where Stephanus de Urbibus placeth the City Henochia. And besides this City of Henoch, Philo Indus conceiveth that Cain built six others, as Maich, Jared, Tebe, Iesca, Sela, and Gebat: but where Philo had this, I know not. Now as Cain was the first Jupiter, and from whom also the Ethnicks had the invention of Sacrifice: so were Tubal, Tubal, and Tubalcain (inventors of Pastorage, Smiths-craft, and Musick) the same which were called by the ancient prophane Writers, Mercurius, Vulcan, and Apollo; and as there is a likelihood of name between Tubalcain and Vulcan: so doth Augustine expound the name of Noëma, or Naamath, the sister of Tubalcain, to signifie Venus or beautiful, Voluptas or pleasures; as the Wife of Vulcan is said to be Venus, the Lady of pleasure and beauty. And as Adam was the ancient and first Saturn, Cain the eldest Jupiter; Eva, Rhea, and Nomea or Naamath the first Venus: so did the Fable of the dividing of the World between the three Brethren the Sons of Saturne, arise from the true Story of the dividing of the Earth between the three Brethren the Sonnes of Noah: so also was the fiction of those Golden Apples kept by a Dragon, taken from the Serpent which tempted Eva; so was Paradise it self transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Hesperides: the Prophecies, that Christ should break the serpents head, and conquer the power of Hel, occasioned the fables of Hercules killing the Serpent of Hesperides, and descending into Hel, and captivating Cerberus: so out of the taking up of Henoch by God, was borrowed the conversion of their Heroës (the inventors of Religion, and such Arts as the life of man had profit by) into Stars and Heavenly figures, and (withall) that leaving of the World, and ascension of Astræa: of which Ovid:

He who is; Plato, That which is. Now of Gods incomprehensible nature, and of the difficulty either to conceive, or expresse the same, he giveth this testimony: Genitorem Unioersitatis tam difficile est invenire, quam inventum impossibile dignè profari; It is as hard to finde out the Creator of the Unioersall, as it is impossible, if he were found, to speak of him worthily. And what can be more agreeable to the Majesty of Gods Nature, than this property by Plato acknowledged? Dens bonus, & quidem, Dens causa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non causa; God is absolutely good, and so (assuredly) the cause of all that is good: but of any thing that is evill, he is no cause at all. And again, Charitas Dei fuit causa factionis mundi, & originis omnium rerum; The love of God was the cause of the worlds creation, and the originall of all things. Apuleius the Platonist; Summus Deus infinitus est, non solum loci excludione, sed etiam nature dignitate: & nihil est Deo similis & gratus, quàm vir animo perfecto bonus; The most high God is also an infinite God, not onely by exclusion of place, but by the dignity of nature: neither is there any thing more like or more acceptable to God, than a man of a perfect heart. THALES affirmed, that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient: quia nunquam esse cepit; Because he never had any beginning. ZENO, that God beheld even the thoughts of men. Athenodorus, that therefore all men ought to be carefull in the actions of their life, because God was every where present, and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moses story of the Creation, than this opinion and description of the Worlds beginning in Euripides, Scholar of Anaxagoras?

Cælum terraque unius forma fuit: Sed cum fuissent abjuncta amplexu mutuo, Emergit omnis in lucem res progenita; Arborea, ævæ, feræ, quæque affert mare, Genusque mortalium.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato; so we finde the same excellent understanding in Orpheus, who every-where expresse the infinite and sole power of one God; though he use the name of Jupiter, thereby to avoid the envie and danger of the time: but that he could attribute those things to the sons of men, and mortal creatures, which he doth to this Jupiter, there is no man, who hath ever heard of God, that can imagine.

Nomina Deorum (saith MIRANDULA) quos ORPHEUS canit, non decipientium demonum, à quibus malum & non bonum provenit; sed naturalium virtutum divinarumque sunt nomina; The names of those Gods whom Orpheus doth sing, are not of deceiving devils, from whom evill comes, and not goodnesse; but they are the names of naturall and divine virtues. Yea, that he reacheth higher, and speaketh of God himself, this his instruction to Musæus, and the Hymn following, teach us: Respicies verò ad divinum hunc sermonem ei diligenter animum adverte, intendens cordis rationis capax conceptaculum: rectam autem ascende viam, & solum aspicere mundi regem. Unus est ex se genitus, ex eo omnia nata sunt: ipse verò in illis versatur, nec quiquam eum intueri potest mortalium, sed ipse nihilominus omnes intuetur.

Then marking this my sacred speech, but truly lend Thy heart, that's reasons sphere, and the right way ascend, And see the worlds sole King. First, he is simply one, Begotten of himself, from whom is born alone All else; in which hee's still: nor could it ere befall A mortall eye to see him once, yet he sees all.

And again the same Author,

Jupiter omnipotens, & primus, & ultimus idem; Jupiter est caput & medium: Jovis omnia munda. Jupiter est fundamen huius, & stellantis Olympi. Jupiter & mas est, & femina necia mortis. Spiritus est cunctis, validi vis Jupiter ignis. Et pelagi radix, Sol, Luna est Jupiter ipse. Rex & origo simul rerum est, & terminus idem. Nam primus oculum, magno post munime, sacrum Cor refrangens bonus in dulcem dedit omnia luvor.

The first of all is God, and the same last is he. God is the head and midst, yea from him all things be, God is the Base of earth and of the starred skie. He is the male and female too, shall never die. The spirit of all is God, the Sun and Moone, and what is higher: The King, th' originall of all, of all the end. For close in holy breast he all did comprehend, Whence all to blessed light, his wondrous power did send.

- Now besides these former testimonies, that all the learned men of ancient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Egyptians, Græcians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will only repeat two or three other opinions, and leave the Reader to those large and learned Collections of Justine Mariyr, Clement, Lactantius, Eusebius, En-gubius, Peucer, Plessis, Dureau, and others. For Cleanthes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, described him by these attributes and properties: Bonus, justus, sanctus, seipsum possidens, utilis, speciosus, optimus, severus, liber, semper commodus, tutus, gloriosus, chritas, &c. Good, just, holy, possessing himself, profitable, beautifull, best, severe, free, alwaies doing good, safe without feare, glorious, and self-charity. Epicharmus affirmed, that God who beheld all things, and pierced every nature, was onely and every where
- powerful: agreeing with Democritus: Rex omnium ipse solus; He is the onely King of kings: and with Pindarus the Poet, Deus unus, Pater, creator summus, atque optimus artifex, qui progressus singulis diversos secundum merita præbet; One God, the Father, the most high Creator, and best artificer, who giveth to every thing divers proceedings according to their deserts. This God (saith Antisthenes) cannot be resembled to any thing, and therefore not elsewhere known: Nisi in patria illa perenni, ejus imaginem nullam habes: Save onely in that everlasting Countrey, whose image thou hast none at all. Hereof also Xenophanes Colophonius: Unus Deus inter deos & homines maximus, nec corpore, nec mente mortalibus similis; There is one God among gods and men most powerful, neither corporally, nor mentally like unto mortals: and Xenophon, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quiescere facit, magnus potensque quod omnibus patet: qualis autem forma sit, nemini patet, nisi ipsi soli, qui luce sua omnia perintrat; God who shaketh all things, and setteth all things at rest, is great and mighty; as is manifest to all: but of what forme he is, it is manifest to none, save onely to himself, who illuminateth all things with his own light. Finally, Plato saith, Totius rerum nature causa, & ratio, & origo Deus, summus animi genitor, æternus animantium sostitator, assiduum mundi sui opifex, sine propagatione genitor, neque loco, neque tempore illo comprehensus, eoque paucis cogitabilis, nemini effabilis; God is the cause, ground, and original of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the soule, the eternal preserver of living creatures, the continual framer of his world, a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceive him in thought, none can expresse what he is.
- Therefore was it said by Saint Hierome, Si enim cunctos Philosophorum revolvamus libros, necesse est ut in eis reperias aliquam partem vestrorum Dei, ut apud Platonem, fabricatorem mundi Deum: apud Zenonem, Stoicorum Principem, inferos & immortales animas, &c. If thou consider all the books of the Philosophers, thou canst not but finde in them some part of the Vessels of God, as in Plato, God the Creator of the world: in Zeno, Prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortal soules, &c. And this is certain, that if we look into the wisdom of all Ages, we shall finde that there never was man of solid understanding or excellent judgement: never any man whose minde the Art of education hath not bended; whose eyes a foolish superstition hath not afterward blinded; whose apprehensions are sober, and by a penive inspection advised; but that he hath found by an unresistible necessity, one true God, and everlasting being, all for ever causing, and all for ever sustaining; which no man among the Heathen hath with more reverence acknowledged, or more learnedly exprest, than that Egyptian Hermes, howsoever it failed afterward in his posterity: all being at length by divellish policy of the Egyptian Priests purposely obscured; who invented new gods, and those innumerable, best forting (as the Devil perfwaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fittest to keep in awe and order their common people.

§. VIII.

That Heathenisme and Judaisme, after many wounds, were at length about the same time under Julian miraculously confounded.

BUT these are again vanished: for the inventions of mortal men are no less mortal than themselves. The Fire, which the Chaldeans worshipped for a god, is crept into every mans chimney, which the lack of fuel starveth, water quencheth, and want of ayre suffocateth: Jupiter is no more vexed with Juno's Jealousies; Death hath perswaded him to chastity, and her to patience; and that time which hath devoured it self, hath also eaten up both the Bodies and Images of him and his: yea their stately Temples of Stone and dureful Marble. The houses and sumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found upon the earth, nor any monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phœnicia that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Lybia, Creta, Thesalia, or elsewhere, that can ask counsel or help from Jupiter. The great god Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apollos Priests are become speechless, and the trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Devils telling men's fortunes therein, is taken up by counterfeit Egyptians, and couzening Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Devil gave way to these his over-throws and dishonours: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chief mansions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repaired, and re-edified again, till by the hand of God himself it received the last and utter subversion. For it was first robbed of all the Idols and Ornaments therein by the Eubæan Pyrates: Secondly, by the Phlegians utterly sackt: Thirdly, by Pyrrhus the son of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Army of Xerxes: Fifthly, by the Captaines of the Phœnicians: Sixtly, by Nero: who carried thence five hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein again set up at the common charge. But whatsoever was gathered between the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian Army made spoile of, defacing as much as the time permitted them: notwithstanding all this, it was again gloriously re-built, and so remained till such time as Julian the Apostate sent thither to know the success of his Parthian enterprise, at which time it was utterly burnt and consumed with fire from Heaven, and the Image of Apollo himself, and all the rest of the Idols therein, molten down, and lost in the earth.

The like success had the Jewes in the same Julians time, when by his permission they assembled themselves to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem: for while they were busied to lay the foundations, their buildings were overthrown by an earthquake, and many thousands of the Jewes were overwhelmed with the ruines, and others slain, and scattered by Tempest and thunder: though Am. Marcellinus report it more favourably for the Jewes, ascribing this to the nature of that Element. For, saith he, Allypius and the Ruler of the province of Judea, being by Julian busied in the re-edifying of this Temple, flaming Balls of fire issuing neer the foundation, and oft consuming the Work-men, made the enterprize frustrate.

Of the last refuges of the Devil to maintain his Kingdom.

NOW the Devil, because he cannot play upon the open stage of this World, (as in those daies) and being still as industrious as ever, finds it more for his advantage to creep into the minds of men, and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, works them to a more effectual adoration of himself than ever. For whereas he first taught them to sacrifice to Monsters, to dead stones cut into faces of Beasts, Birds, and other mixt Natures; he now sets before them the high and shining Idol of glory, the All-commanding Image of bright Gold. He tels them that truth is the Goddess of dangers and oppressions, that chastity is the enemy of Nature, and lastly, that as all vertue (in general) is without taste; so pleasure satisfieth and delighteth every sense: for true wisdom (saith he) is exercised in nothing else, than in the obtaining of power to oppress, and of riches to maintain plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-Politician finde in his pupils any remorse, any feeling or feare of God's future judgement, he perswades them that God hath so great need of men's souls, that he will accept them at any time, and upon any condition: interrupting by his vigilant endeavours all offer of timefull returne towards God, by laying those great blockes of rugged poverty and despised contempt in the narrow passage leading to his divine presence. But as the minde of man hath two Ports, the one alwaies frequented by the entrance of manifold vanities; the other desolate and over-grown with grasse, by which enter our charitable thoughts & divine contemplations: so hath that of death a double and twofold opening, worldly misery passing by the one, worldly prosperity by the other: at the entrance of the one we finde our sufferings and patience to attend us: (all which have gone before us to prepare our joies) at the other our cruelties, covetousness, licentiousness, injustice, and oppressions (the Harbingers of most fearefull and terrible sorrow) staying for us. And as the Devil our most industrious enemy was ever most diligent: so is he now more laborious than ever, the long day of Mankind drawing fast toward an evening, and the Worlds Tragedy and time neere at an end.

CHAP. VII.
Of NOAH'S Flood.

§. I.

of God's fore-warning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noah's Flood.

OF this distruction it pleased God to give warning unto Noah: who (saith Iosephus) fearing to perish among the rest, Cecedens cum suis in aliam regionem migravit: i.e. departed with his children, and travailed into another region. And of these Giants from whom Noah withdrew himself, Berosus writeth in this manner: that they exceeded in all sorts of inhumane and unnatural wickedness; and that they were contemptores & religionis & deorum; contemptors of religion and of the Gods: among which mighty men (saith Berosus) unus erat qui deorum venerantior, & prudentior cunctis, &c. hunc nomen erat Noah: i.e. here was one more wise and reverencing the Gods than the rest, whose name was Noah: who with his three sons, Sem, Iaphetus, and Cham, and with their Wives, and the Wife of Noah, (namely, Titea the great, Pandora, Nochi, and Noegla) preserved themselves in the Arke. This Arke God commanded Noah to prepare: And God said unto Noah, Make thee an Arke of Pinetrees: thou shalt make cabins in the Arke, and shalt pitch it within and without with pitch. For God made Noah to know, that an end of all flesh was at hand, and that the graves of the rebellious and cruel Generations were already fashioned in the Clouds, which soon after should swallow up and cover all living creatures which breathed in the aire, Noah and his family excepted.

But this universal grave of waters, and general Deluge hath not been received by all: for divine testimonies do not perswade all natural men to those things to which their own reason cannot reach: Eum ob oculos in obscurum veritas latet: i.e. whilst the truth lieth wrapped up in obscurity. Many there are who have disputed against the universality of this overflowing, and have judged that this flood of Noah fell but in some particular places and kingdoms: moved so to think, because in elder ages there have been many other floods (as they suppose) of that nature. Hereof Nicholas Damascenus writeth in this manner, as his words are cited by Iosephus. Est super Minyadam excelsum mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos confugientes sermo est diluvii tempore liberatos, & quendam simul in Arca deventum in huius vertice habuisse, lignorumque reliquias multo tempore conservatas, qui fortasse is fuit de quo etiam Moyses Indæorum legislator scribit: thus saith this Authour, there is (saith he) above Minyada (or the country of Minya) an exceeding high mountain in Armenia, called Baris: on which it is reported, that many having fled thither, were saved in the time of the deluge: and that one was carried in an arke, and rested upon the top of the mountain, whereon there remained a long time after certain pieces thereof; and this might be the same of which Moses the Law-giver of the Jews makes mention. And of this opinion were were the Thalmudists (saith Annius) that many Giants saved themselves upon Mount Sion.

But Berosus (who, after Moses, was one of the most antient, howsoever he hath been since deformed & corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the generall Flood, taking from thence the beginning of his History in these words: Ante aquarum cladem famosam, quam universus perii Orbis, &c. Before that famous destruction of Waters, by which the World universall perished: witnessing withall, that Noah with his wife Titea, and his three sons with their wives (in all eight persons) were only saved of the Flood in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noahs Flood.

But from the vanity of the Greekes, the Corrupters of all truth (saith Lactantius) who without all ground of certainty vaunt their Antiquity, came the error first of all: who therein flattering themselves also, sought to perswade the world that there was no Flood preceded the Flood of Ogyges, King of the Thebans in Bæotia, or rather of Attica; and therefore (saith Rhodigimus) Ogygum id appellat Poeta, tanquam perveius dixeris, ab Ogyge vetustissimo: The Poets gave the name of Ogygia to things exceeding ancient, as of Ogyges the most ancient.

But let Ogyges be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest that he lived but in Jacob's time (though Eusebius makes him later, and in Moses time) and was born 67. yeeres after him. There is also an opinion that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he farre later) as Rhodigimus in the ninth booke of his Antiquities remembreth: Sunt tamen qui in Aegypto regnasse autumant hunc: unde sit Cadmus qui in Greciam profectus Thebas condidit, à bove jugulato sic nuncupatus; quoniam Syrorum lingua Bos dicitur Thebe. There are (saith he) who thinke that this Ogyges did reigne in Egypt, whereby he should be Cadmus, who travelling into Greece built Thebes, so named of a Beefe's time: because in the Syrian Language, a Beefe is called Thebe.

But this Flood of Ogyges fell in the yeere of the World, 3440. according to Eusebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the Flood of Noah in the year 2242. after the same account: and so there came 1200. between these Floods, wanting but two, though herein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronologie. Now although the very year and time of this overflowing in Achaia, or rather Attica, be not precisely set downe, but that there is a great difference among Writers; yet whosoever makes it most ancient, findes above 500. yeeres difference between that and the generall flood.

For Paulus Orosius affirms that this tempest fell upon the Athenians, but 1040. yeeres before Rome was built. Bucholzernus saith, it was 1043. elder than Rome; which was founded (according to the same Bucholzernus) in the worlds yeere 3219. though after the account which I follow (and whereof I will give my reasons in the Story of Abraham) it was built in the Worlds year, 3280. Now the generall Flood preceded the building of Rome (saith Bucholzernus) 1563. yeeres: and the Flood of Ogyges (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by easie calculation, that (if he place Ogyges in his true age) the difference between these two Floods must be 520. yeeres, to which wee (allowing 60. more) find 580. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except wee call Noah, Ogyges Priscus, as some doe) it appears by this, that the Flood of Ogyges then King of Attica or Ogygia, did not extend it selfe any farther than the banks of Archipelago, or the Aegean Sea. For whereas Mela, Pliny, and Solinus witnesse, that the City of Joppa in Judea was founded before the Flood; and that (notwithstanding the weight of Waldemarus) there remained on certain Altars of stone, the Title of the King, and of his Brothers Phineus, with many of the grounds of their Religion: sure it is no where found among prophane Historians, nor in the Scriptures, that ever the Flood of Ogyges spread it selfe over any part of Syria, much lesse over all the earth. But that it drowned both the Regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Achaia in Peloponnesus, it is very probable. For it seemeth that at that time it was, when Helice and Eura were swallowed up; Cities seated on the North part of Peloponnesus: of which Ovid:

Si queros Helicem, & Euran, Achaïdos urbes, Invenies sub aquis.

Eura and Helice, on Achaian ground
Are fought in vaine, but under Sea are found.

Of this Flood of Ogyges was invented the Fable of Apollo and Diana. For Latona, the daughter of Cœus, the son of Titan, being beloved and forced by Jupiter, and by him gotten with child, Juno thereat enraged, permitted her (as they say) no part of the Earth to be delivered on; and withall, caused the monstrous Serpent Python to follow and afflict her, wherefore she travelled: till at length arriving at the Isle of Ortygia, she was there received; in which she was delivered, first of Diana, and then of Apollo, being Twins; whereof Barlaam makes this exposition: That at such time as the Deluge (which happened in Ogyges his reigne) ceased, out of the abundant moisture of the Earth (heat by putrefaction being thereto mixed) there were exhaled such thicke mists and fogges, that in Attica, and along the coasts of the Aegean Sea, neither the beames of the Sun by day, nor of the Moone by night, could pierce the ayre, or be perceived by the inhabitants: so as when at length (the Earth being dried, and these vapours dissipated) the ayre began to be cleare, the people of Ortygia espied the light of the Moone (somewhat before day, and in the same morning the Sun also appeared: fabulously (because Diana represented the Moone, and Apollo the Sun) they were reported to be borne in the Isle of Ortygia, thereof afterwards called Delos, which signifieth manifestation.

And surely it is not improbable, that the Flood of Ogyges, being so great, as Histories have reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the ayre, sensibly discerned in those parts, and some unusuall face of the Skyes. Varro in his Bookes de gente populi Romani (as he is cited by Saint Augustine) reporteth out of Castor, that so great a miracle happened in the Star of Venus, as never was seene before, nor in after-times: For the colour, the greatnesse, the figure, and the course of it, were changed. This fell out, as Adraffus Cysicenus, and Dion Neapolites, famous Mathematicians, affirmed, in the time of Ogyges.

Now concerning the course of that or any other Planet, I do not remember, that I have any where read of so good Astrologers, flourishing among the Greeks, or elsewhere in those dayes as were likely to make any calculation of the revolutions of the Planets, so exact, that it should neede no reformation: Of the colour and magnitudes I see no reason, why the difference found in the Starre of Venus, should be held miraculous; considering, that lesser mists and fogges than those which covered Greece with so long darknesse, do familiarly present our senses with as great alterations in the Sun and Moone. That the figure should varie, questionlesse it was very strange: Yet I cannot hold it any prodigie: for it stands well with good reason, that the side of Venus which the Sun beholds, being enlightened by him, the opposite halfe should remain shadowed; so whereby that Planet would, unto our eyes, decrying only that part whereon the light falleth, appeare to be horned, as the Moone doth seeme; if distance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehension of our senses.

A worthy Astrologer now living, who by the helpe of perspective Glasses hath found in the Starres many things unknowne to the Ancients, affirmeth so much to have beene discovered in Venus, by his late observations. Whether some warride disposition of the ayre might present as much to them that lived with Ogyges, as Gallileus hath seen through his Instrument; I cannot tell: sure I am, that the discoverie of a truth formerly unknown, doth rather convince Man of ignorance, than Nature of error. One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular Flood of Ogyges, was as appeareth by this of Saint Augustine accompanied with such unusuall (and therefore the more dreadfull, though naturall) signes, testifying the concurrence of causes with effects in that inundation; whereas the Flood of Noah, which was generall, and altogether miraculous, may seeme to have had no other token, or fore-shewing, than the long preaching of Noah himselfe, which was not regarded: for they were eating and drinking, when the Flood came suddenly, and tooke them all away.

§. III.

of DEUCALIONS Flood: and that this was not NOAH'S Flood: nor the Umbri in Italy a remnant of any universall Flood.

A Second Flood of great fame, and of which the time is more certain, was that of Deucalion in Thessalia; of which S. Augustine out of Varro: Hic temporibus (ut VARRON scribit) regnante Atheniensibus CRANAO, successore CECROPS (ut autem no stri, EUSEBIUS & HIERONYMUS) adhuc eodem CECROPE permanente, diluvium fuit, quod appellatum est DEUCALIONIS: (that is) in these times (as VARRO reporteth) CRANA us the successor of CECROPS governing the Athenians, or (as our EUSEBIUS and HIEROME say) CECROPS yet living, that Flood (called DEUCALIONS) happened.

And in the beginning of the eleventh Chapter of the same eighteenth Book, he ut tereth these words: Eduxit ergo MOSES ex Egypto populum Dei novissimo tempore Cecropi A theniensium Regi, cum apud Assyrios regnaret Alcatades, apud Sicyonios Marathus, apud Argivos Tripas: MOSES led the people of God out of Egypt about the later time of CE CROPS King of the Athenians, Alcatades reigning over the Assyrians, over the Sicyoni ans Marathus, and over the Argives Tripas. So as leaving the curiosity of a few years, more or lesse, it appeareth, that this Flood of Deucalion was either at the egressi on of the children of Israel out of Egypt, or near it: and then after Noah 753. years, according to Functius, who makes Cecrops to live in the year of the World 2409. or if 20 we follow Mercator, then 739. years after Noah, and in the year of the World 2395.
But if Deucalion was borne in the age of the World 2356. according to Codoman; then giving unto Deucalion 40. years of age when this Flood happened, it falleth within one year of Mercators account. But Deucalion by all approved Historians is said to have been 82. years old at that time. Now Clemens Alexandrinus dates the time of this Flood of Deucalion, and the conflagration and burning in Phaëton time by the Reign of Crotopus, King of the Argives; but Crotopus lived King of the Argives lixe years after Israel departed Egypt, which makes twenty years difference, according to Functius, who will have this Flood and Burning to have fallen 14. years before Moses left Egypt: for he gave of the Worlds years to the Flood and burning the year 2440. 30 and to Moses his egression the year 2454. And yet Cedrenus thinks that Moses was more ancient, and lived with Inachus; but that cannot be true: for then had the Flood of Deucalion, and the burning of Phaëton, preceded the Flood of Ogyges, which is denied by all; for that of Thessaly (called Deucalions) followed that of Attica (called Ogygia) at least 250. years, or thereabouts. Eusebius in his Chronologie makes it 230. & so doth P. Orosius: Eusebius about the 50. years of Moses life, and Cyrillus about the 67. and both after Noahs Flood 770. years: for these be Clemens Alexandrinus his words: *Fuit autem in Græcia tempore quidem Phornei, qui fuit post Inachum, inundatio que fuit tempore Ogygis: There happened in Greece in the time of Phorneus, who lived after I nachus, the Flood of Ogyges. Now if the Flood of Ogyges in Attica were 1020. or 40 1016. years before the first Olympiad, according to Eusebius and Orosius (as before) then is it manifest, that taking 763. out of this number of 1020. it falls out, that Ogyges flood happened before the Hebrews left Egypt 250. years, or 260. years, according to the difference between the opinions of Eusebius and Orosius. And for my selfe (who rather follow those Chronologers, which give 60. years more to Abraham after the Flood, than the rest) I reckon the times which come between these Floods in this sort. The generall Flood was in the year of the World 1656. Jacob was borne in the year of the World 2169. so as from the beginning of the flood to Jacobs birth, there were consumed 513. years. Ogyges flood happened 100. years after Jacob was borne; and there fore after the generall flood 613. years. Now Deucalion was borne in the year of the World 2356. and had lived 82. years when his Kingdome of Thessaly was overwhel med; (which added to 2356. make 2438.) his flood was after Noahs flood ended, 782.
years. And hereto Anninus his Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700. yeares between the generall flood and Deucalions birth; to which added 82. yeares of his Age (as before) and then the flood of Thessaly followed the generall 782. yeares. The words of that Xenophon are these: *Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum Deucalionis, secundo anno Spha eri, septingenti supputantur anni, qui natus annos duos & octoginta Thessaliam vidit in undatam: From the drowning of the World to the birth of Deucalion, in the second year

year of SPHERUS, are numbred 700. yeares, and when DEUCALION was 82. yeares old, he saw Thessalia drowned. This Flood happened in the Winter time about Parnassus: witnesseth Aristotle in the first of his Meteors. And Varro (whom Saint Augustine so often citeth for his excellent Learning, especially in Antiquities) findeth this Flood of De ucalion to have happened in the time of CRANUS, who succeeded Cecrops: Orosius thinks it somewhat later, Amphitryon reigning in Athens, the third from Cecrops: Only this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not only over Thessaly it self, and the Regi ons adjoining Westward, but it covered the greatest part of Italy: and either the same, or some other particular Flood then happening, oppressed Egypt, saith Eusebius. And therefore did the Greeks either think it, or feigne it to be universall; and Deucalion then King, saving himself and some others on the Mountain of Thessaly (of all other the highest, saith Solinus) was by reason thereof (as Strabo witnesseth) said to bee the preserver of mankind. That this Flood covered a great part of Italy, Pliny, and Solinus make it probable, who affirm, that the people then inhabiting Italy, were therefore called Itæ: quia ab imbribus diluvii supersuissent; and therefore also were they esteemed the most ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his first Booke, and Trezenius in his second: which Umbri these Authors make the Parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to be the Parents of the Samnites, Piceni, Lucani, Brutii, and all others inhabiting anciently the banks of the Mediterranean Sea. But that these Umbri were not the Inhabiters of Italy before the Flood of Noah, and so took name by saving themselves upon the Appennine Mountaines, the Scriptures teach us shewing who, and who only then were preserved, which is sufficient. Report hath adventured further, telling us, that the first people which after the generall Flood inhabited Italy, were the Camerones; (so named from Camele, whom CATO in originibus, another of Annius his Authors, names for a consort of Janus) which people lived altogether a savage life; till such time as Saturne arriving on those Coasts, devised Lawes to govern them by: the memorie of whose Acts in that Region, Diodor and Thallus among the Greeks, Nepos Celsus and Varro a mong the Latines, have preserved; and of whom Virgil:

Primus ab æthero venit SATURNUS Olympo,
Arma JOVIS fugiens, & regnis exul ademptis,
Is genus indocile, ac dispersum montibus aliis
Composuit, Legesq; dedit; Latiniq; vocari Maliit.

SATURNE descending from the Heavens high,
Fearing the Armes of JUPITER his Son,
His Kingdome lost, and banisht thence, doth fly,
Rude people on the Mountain tops he won
To live together, and by Lawes: which done,
He chose to call it Latium.

And afterward in the Verses following he speaketh of the Ausones, and after them, of the Sicani: Nations, which again sought to dis-plant the ancient Inhabiters:

Tum manus Ausonia, & gentes venire Sicani.
Then came th' Ausonian Bands, and the Sicanian Tribes.

Of these Sicani (which left Spaine, and sat down in Italy) Thucydides and Pliny give testimony: who were again expelled by the Ligii, saith Thucydides. After all these plantations & replantations, came the Umbri, descended of the Gauls (saith Anninus) not of those Gauls of France, but of those of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italy, even all Hetruria and Campania; as Herodotus, Pliny, and Dionysius have assured us: and therefore this flood of Deucalion was long after that of Noah. For all those Nations were planted in Italy, & dispossessed of Italy again, before the Umbri were ever heard of, or had being. So that Kingdome was first called Camasene, then Latium or Saturnia, then Ausonia, then Sicania; before the Umbri (in whose time Deucalions flood happened) possessed the same, about 306. yeares before the war of Troy; Lycan then governing Arcadia: who be ing the father of two and twenty sons, the youngest called Oenotrius invaded Italy, who gave it the name of Oenotria. This name it held until Italus of the same Nation changed it into Italy, after his own name, about 250. yeares before the fall of Troy. After these, came the Pelasgi, of whom Pliny in his third Book and fifth Chapter, and Strabo in his fifth, Thucydides in his sixth, speak at large : and after them the Lydi, under Tyrrhenus their Captain, that gave name to the Tyrrhenis, who casting thence the Umbri, tooke from them three hundred Castles, and built therein twelve Cities; to which (after they had posselt and past over the Appennine Mountains) they added divers others, whereof Tellessa (afterward Bononia) was one.

Now that there was not anciently such a Nation as these Umbri in those parts, I doe not affirm; having respect to the testimonies before repeated. And Stephanus thinks, that the name was derived from the Greek word Ombros; but that these Umbri of Italy were descended of the Nation of Scythians (called Galli) it shall be shewed hereafter. 10

Of some other Records testifying the universall Flood : and of two ancient Deluges in Egypt : and of some elsewhere.

Euseb. de prep.
Evang. l. 9. c. 4.

Saint Augustine out of Varro affirmeth, that the Greeks and Latines made not any mention of the Universall Flood, because they had nothing of Antiquity foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus, before remembred) were all things among the Greeks (which antiquity had worn out of knowledge) called Ogygia, which we in English commonly call (worm-eaten) or of defaced date. But as all the parts of the Earth were successively planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the instant; so did every Family, which afterward became a great people, with whom the knowledge of divine letters was not received, finde no Parent of more antiquity, than such as they had themselves, nor allow of any before their own; and as the Grecians, so did others vaunt themselves to be Indigene, &c. growing out of the Earth, or invent some other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldeans had certain knowledge of Noah's Flood, as Berosus witnesseth; and Nicolaus Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforesaid) though he also affirm by hear-say, that some Giants saved themselves upon the Mountains Barkis in Armenia, but speaketh not thereof as from any authority approved: using the word Sermo est; That such a speech there was. And Eusebius remembreth a place out of the ancient Historian Abydenus: who writeth that Sisithrus, to preserve himself from a Flood fore-told him by Saturnus, fled to the hills of Armenia by ship ad Armenian navigio confugiebat: who the third day (after the waters were fallen) sent forth birds, that finding no land to rest on, returned again; which he also did a second times; but at the third return the birds feet were covered with mud and slime. To this effect are Eusebius words out of Abydenus, which may seem a true description (though in other terms) of Noah's Flood.

Nat. com. l. 4. c. 6.

Cyrillus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this generall Flood. And Plato in Timeo produceth an Egyptian Priest, who recounted to Solon out of the holy Books of Egypt, the story of the Flood universal, which (saith he) happened long before the Grecian Inundations. Frier Annius his Xenophon remembreth a third Flood, which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, somewhat more ancient than that of Ogyges; in Attica. For he named the generall Flood for the first, which happened (saith he) under the old Ogyges: Sub prisco Ogyge, which was Noah, he calleth the second Niliaca: Hercules and Prometheus then living, 44. years before that of Attica, in the 34. year of Belosus King of the Affrians, though I doe not believe him as touching the time. But this Flood covered a great part of the nether Egypt, especially all the Region subject to Prometheus; and hereof came the fable of the Vulture on Prometheus his liver, afterward slain by Hercules of Egypt: which fiction Diod. delivereth in these words: *Flovisium propter cursu velocitatem, profunditatemque aquarum, Aquilam tunc appellatum. HERCULEM tum consilii magnitudine, tum virtute, voluit & vestigio compressisse, & aquarum impetum ad priorem cursum convertisse: Unde & Graeci quidam Poeta rem gestam in fabulam vertentes, HERCULEM tradunt Aquilam PROMETHEI jecur depascentem occidisse: This Flood (meaning of Nilus) for the swiftnesse of his course, as also for the depth, was in those dayes called the Eagle: but HERCULES by his great judgement and vertue did againe compress and straighten this River, so far extended and over-spread, turning it into the old channels: Whence certain Greek poets (converting this labour and work of HERCULES into a fable)* fable) devised, that HERCULES slew the Eagle which fed on PROMETHEUS liver; meaning that he delivered Prometheus of that sorrow and torment, which for the loss of his people and Country (by the Waters destroyed and covered over) he suffered.

A fourth Flood chanced about Pharus in Egypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Annius conceiveth out of his Xenophon, who in this briefe fort writeth of all these Inundations: *Inundationes plures fuerunt: prima novimebris inundatio terrarum sub prisco OGYGE: secunda Niliaca, &c. There were many Inundations (saith the same Xenophon): the first, which was universall, of nine months; and this happened under the first OGYGES: the second was Niliaca, and of one moneths continuance, in the time of Hercules and Prometheus; Egyptians: a third of two moneths, under Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three moneths, in Thessalia, under Deucalion: and a fifth of the lik continuance (called Pharonica) under Proteus of Egypt, about the time of Helens rape. Diodorus in his fifth Book and eleventh Chapter, taking the Samotheas for his Authors, remembreth a Flood in Asia the lesse, and elsewhere, of no less destruction than any of the other particular Inundations, saying, that the same happened before that of Deucalion; the Sea of Tentus and Hellepont breaking in over the Land.*

But there have bin many floods in divers times and ages, not inferior to any of these two last remembred, Niliaca and Pharonica in Egypt: as in the year of our Redemption 590. when in October of the same year, Gregory then being Bishop of Rome, there happened a marvellous overflowing in Italy, and especially in the Venetian Territory, and in Liguria, accompanied with a most fearfull storm of thunder and lightning; after which followed the great plague at Rome, by reason of the many dead Serpents cast up and left upon the land after the waters decreased and returned. And in the year 1446. there perished 10000. people, by the breaking in of the Sea at Dordrecht in Holland: of which kind I take that Flood to be of Achaia or Attica. Before that, and in the year 1238. Triethemus speaketh of an Earthquake, which swallowed many thousands: and after that of a Flood in Frisland, in which there perished 100000. persons. Strozius Sigog, in his Magia omnifaria, telleth of an Inundation in Italy, in the time of Pope Damasus, in which also many Cities of Sicily were swallowed: another in the Papacie of Alexander the sixth: also in the year 1515. Maximilian being Emperor. He also remembreth a perilous over-flowing in Polonia, about Cracovia, by which many people perished. Likewise Vignier a French Historian speaketh of a great Flood in the South part of Languedoc, which fell in the year of our Lord 1557. with fo dreadfull a tempest, as all the people which fell in the year of our Lord 1557. with fo dreadfull a tempest, as all the people which attended therein the very end of the World, and judgment day; saying, That by the violent descent of the Waters from the Mountains, about Nismes there were removed divers old heaps and mountures of ground, and many other places torne up and rent: by which accident there was found both coyn of silver and gold, divers pieces of plate and vessels of other mettall, supposed to be hidden at such time as the Goths invaded that Province, in the year 1156.

§. V.

That the Flood of NOAH was supernaturall, though some say it might have been foretold by the Starres.

Now howsoever all these Floods, and many other, which have covered at severall times severall Regions, not only in these parts of the World, but in America also, (as I have learned of some ancient Southfayers among them) may be ascribed to naturall causes and accidents; yet that universall Flood (in the time of Noah) was poured over the whole face of the Earth by a power above Nature, and by the especiall commandment of God himselfe, who at that time gave strength of influence to the Stars, and abundance to the Fountains of the deep: whereby the irruption of Waters was made more forcible than any ability of nature could effect, or any second causes, by whatsoever union, could performe, without receiving from the Fountain of all power, strength, & faculties supernaturall. Henricus Mechlinsis, a Scholler of Albertus Magnus in his Commentaries upon the great conjunctions of Alon Masar, observeth, that before the Flood of Noah, the like conjunction of Jupiter and Saturne happened in the last degree of Cancer, against that constellation since called the Ship of Argos; by which the Flood of Noah might be fore-told, because Cancer is both a watry Signe, and the House

30 NOAH, commanded by God, before the fall of those Waters, entered the Ark which he had built, with his own wife, and his Sons, and his Sons Wives, taking with them of every creature which took life by generation, seven of the clean, and of the unclean, two. Noah, according to Phile, signifieth quietness: after others, and according to the prophecy of his Father Lamech, cessation; to whom aftertimes gave many Names, answering his antiquity, zeale, virtue, and other qualities: as, The first Ogyges, because in the time of the Grecian Ogyges there was also a great Flood of Adahs: Saturne they called him, because he was the Father of Nations: Others gave him the Name of Prometheus, who was said to steale away Jupiters fire; fire in that place being taken and understood for the knowledge of God and heavenly things. Others think, that he was

40 so called for his excellent wisdom and foresight. He had also the Name of Janus, (id est) vinifolus, because Jain signifieth Wine in the Hebrew. And so Tertullian findes him written in Libris Ritumibus, in the Bookes of Ceremonies, preceding both Saturne, Venus, and Jove: which three enjoyed an elder time than all the other ancientest feigned gods. And this Name Jain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latine: for it was in use before there was any Latine Nation, or any Kingdome by that Name knowne. Of the antiquitie of Janus, Fabius Pictor giveth this testimony: JANI etate nulla erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus peccatoribus nondum hserat ulla regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & Far primus populus docuit JANUS ad sacrificia: primus enim Aras & Pomeria & sacra docuit. In the time of JANUS (saith he) there was no Monarchie: for the desire of riches

50 had not then solded it selfe about the hearts of men. JANUS first taught the people to sacrifice Wine and Meale: he first set up Altars, instituted Gardens and solitarie Groves, wherein they used to pray; with other holy Rites and Ceremonies. A greater testimonie than this there cannot be found among the Heathen, which in all agreeth so well with the Scriptures. For first, whilest Noah flourished, there was not any King, or Monarch; Nimrod being the first that tooke on him soveraigne authority. Secondly, Noah after the Flood was the first that planted the Vine, and became a Husbandman; and therefore offered the first-fruits of both (to wit) Wine and Meale. Thirdly, he was the first that rayed an Altar, and offered sacrifice to God a thanksgiving for for his merciful goodneſs towards him. Noah was alſo ſignified in the Name of Bifrons (which was given to Janus) becauſe he beheld the times both before and after the Flood. Quia preterita noverit, & futura proſpexerit, ſaith ARNOBIUS: Because he knew what was paſt, and provided for what was to come. He was alſo in the perſon of Janus ſhadowed by the Name of Chaos, and Semen Orbis, The ſeed of the World: becauſe as out of that conſuſed Heap was drawn all the kinds of beaſts and Plants; ſo from Noah came all Mankind. Whereof Ovid in the perſon of Janus:

Aſpice quàm longi temporis æſta cano.*

The Ancient call'd me Chaos: my great yeers
By thoſe old times, of which I ſing, appears.

He was alſo intruded Cælum and Sol, Heaven and the Sun, for his excellent knowledge in Aſtronomy: Vertumnus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diod. Siculus and Alex. Aphrodiſus ſo call, becauſe he was the reſtorer of the Greeks to their former liberty, but in reſpect of the Flood. For the Greeks called Liber im, and his Nurſes Hyades, of Raine, becauſe Noah entred the Ark when the Sun joyned with the Stars Hyades, a conſtellation in the Brow or Neck of Taurus, and ever after a Monument of Noah's Flood. He was alſo by others furnamed Triton, a Marine god, the Son of Neptune; becauſe he lived in ſafety on the Waters. So was he known by the name of Dionyſus, quæſt diuinitas, mentem pungens, Bite-brain, or Wit-ſtinger; though Diodorus conceive otherwiſe, and derive that name à Patre & Loco; Of his Father, and the place of his Birth, (to wit) of Jove, and Niſa, a Towne of Arabia felix, ſaith Suidas out of Orpheus. He had alſo the by-name of Taurus, or Tamophagus; becauſe he firſt yoked Oxen, and tilled the ground: according to that of Mofes; and NOAH became an Husbandman. Now howſoever the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus, otherwiſe Dionyſus it is certain, that the Name was borrowed, and the Invention ſtolen from Noah. But this Name (as from Noachus, (N) being changed into (B) and it is the more probable, becauſe it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the firſt planter of the Vine after the Flood: and of Noah (the firſt and ancient Bacchus) were all thoſe fables deviſed, of which Diodorus complaineth in his fourth Book and fifth Chapter. This firſt Bacchus (to wit) Noah, was furnamed Nyſus, of the Mountain Nyſa in India; where the Grecian Bacchus never came, whatſoever themſelves feign of his enterpriſes: and theſe Mountains of Nyſa joyned with thoſe of Paropamiſus, and thoſe other Eaſterne Mountains, on which the Ark of Noah reſted after the Flood.

Furthermore, to the end that the memory of this ſecond Parent of Mankind might the better be preſerved, there were founded by his Iſſues many great Cities, which bare his Name, with many Rivers and Mountains; which oftentimes forgot that it was done in his regard, becauſe the many Names given him brought the ſame conſuſion to places as to himſelf. Notwithſtanding all which, we finde the City of Noah upon the banks of the red Sea, and elſewhere: the River of Noas in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; the Red Sea, and elſewhere: the River of Noas in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; Ptolomy, Darius; dividing Ilyria from Pannonia. Thus much for the Name.

§. VIII.

Of ſundry particulars touching the Ark: as the place where it was made, the matter, faſhion, and name.

NOW in what part of the World Noah built the Ark, it doth not appear in the Scriptures, neither do I find any approved Author that hath written thereof; onely Goropius Becanus in his Indo. Scythia conceiveth, that Noah built his Ark neer the Mountains of Caucasus, becauſe on thoſe hills are found the goodlieſt Cedars: for when Alex. Macedon made the war among the people, called Nyſei, inhabiting the other ſide of Caucasus, he found all their Burials and Sepulchres wrought over with Cedar. To this place (ſaith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to ſeparate himſelf from the reprobate Giants, who rebelled againſt God and Nature, as alſo becauſe he would not be interrupted in the building of the Ark; to which alſo he addeth the conveniency of Rivers, to tranſport the Timber which he uſed, without troubling any other Carriages.

Only

Onely this we are ſure of, that the Ark was built in ſome part of the Eaſtern World; and to my underſtanding, not far from the place where it reſted after the Flood. For Noah did not uſe any Malt or Sayle (as in other Ships) and therefore did the Ark no otherwiſe move, than the Hulk or body of a Ship doth in a calme Sea. Alſo, becauſe it is not probable, that during theſe continuall and downe-right Raines there were any Windes at all, therefore was the Ark little moved from the place where it was ſhadowed and ſet together: for it is written, God made a Wind to paſſe upon the Earth, and the Waters ceaſed. And therefore it may be gathered, that during the fall of the Waters, there was not any Storme or forcible winde at all, which could drive the Ark any great diſtance from the place where it was firſt by the Waters lifted up. This is alſo the more probable, if that ancient opinion be true, as it is very likely, that the Ark had fundum planum, a flat bottom, and not rayſed in forme of a Ship, with a ſharpened forward, to cut the waves, for the better ſpeed.

This kind of Veſſell the Hebrewes call Thebet, and the Greeks Larnax, for ſo they termed Decemalis Ship: and ſome ſay, that the Hill Parnaſſus, to which in eight dayes he arrived, was firſt called Larnax, and by the change of (L) into (P) Parnaſſus; but Pausanias thinks that it took name of a Son of the Niſph Cleodora, called Parnaſſus, the Inventor of Auguration.

Percerus finds the word (Parnaſſus) to have no affinity with the Greeks, but thinks it derived from the Hebrew word Mahar, which ſignifieth Auguration and Divination; or 94 from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles in the Leaſe before cited.

Joſephus calls the Ark Maſchina, by the generall name of a huge Fram; and Epiphanius Epiph. in An. ev. out of the Hebrew, Aron: but herein lieth the difference between Aron and Thebet. That Aron ſignifieth properly the Ark of the Sanctuarie, but Thebet ſuch a Veſſell, as ſwim-meth, and beareth it ſelf upon the Waters.

Laſtly, this Ark of Noah differed from the faſhion of a ſhip in this, that it had a Cover and Rooſe, with a Creſt in the middle thereof, and the ſides declining like the Rooſe of an Houſe to the end, both to caſt off the Waters, and that thereunder Noah himſelfe and his children might ſhelter, and ſeparate themſelves from the noiſomneſſe of the many Beaſts, which filled the other roomes and parts of the Ark.

Of what Wood the Ark was built, it is uncertain. The Hebrew word Gopher once, and in this place only uſed, is diversly underſtood: & though the matter be of little importance, yet this difference there is, That the Geneva Tranſlation calls it Pine-tree; the Rabbins, Cedar; the Seventie, ſquare Timber; the Latine, ſmooth Timber. Other will have it Cypreſ Trees, as dedicated to the dead, becauſe Cypreſ is worn at Funerals. But out of doubt, if the word Gopher ſignifie any ſpecial kind of Timber, Noah obeyed the voice of God therein; If not, he was not then curious as touching the kind or nature of the wood, having the promiſe of God, and his Grace and mercie for his defence. For with Noah God promiſed to eſtabliſh his covenant: Plinie affirmeth, that in Egypt it was the uſe to build ſhips of Cedar, which the worms ate not; and he avoweth, that he ſaw the ſhip in Utica, in the Temple of Apollo, Cedar beams, laid in the time of the foundation of the Citie, and that they were ſtill found in his time, which was about 1188. years after: proving thereby, that this kind of wood was not ſubject to putrefying or mouldring in a very long time. But in that it is eaſie to cut, light to carrie, and of a ſweete ſavour, laſting alſo better than any other wood, and becauſe neer the place where the Ark reſted, there are found great ſtore of theſe Cedar trees, as alſo in all the Mountains of the Eaſt, beſides thoſe of Libanus; it is probable enough that the Ark might be of that wood: which hath, beſides the other commodities, the greateſt length of Timber, and therefore fitteſt to build ſhips withall. Percerus conceiveth, that the Ark had divers ſortes of Timber, & that the bottom had of one ſort, the deck & partition of anothers; all which may be true or falſe, if Gopher may be taken for Timber in general. True it is, that Cedar will ſerve for all parts of a Ship, as well for the body, as for Masts and Yards. But Noah had moſt reſpect to the direction received from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the Ark; and to pitch it, and to divide it into Cabines; thereby to ſerve the clean beaſts from the unclean, and to preſerve their ſeveral ſorts of food; and that it might be capable of all kind of living creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, he caſt his confidence wholly on God; who by his Angels ſteered this Ship without a Rudder, and directed it without without the helpe of a Compass or the North star. The Pitch which Noah used, is by some supposed to have bin a kind of Silumen, whereof there is great quantity about the Valley of Sodome and Gomorah, now the dead Sea, or Asphalter, and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West India: and herein it exceedeth other Pitch, that it melts not with the Sun, but by the fire only, after the manner of hard Wax.

That the Arke was of sufficient capacitie.

De Civit. Dei.
l. 15. c. 26.

The Arke, according to Gods commandment, had of length three hundred Cubites, fifty of bredth, and thirte deepe or high: by which proportion, it had fixe parts of length to one of bredth, and ten times in length to one of depth, of which S. AUGUSTINE: Proculdubio figura est peregrinantis in hoc seculo Civitatis Dei, (hoc est) Ecclesie, quæ sit salva per lignum, in quo pependit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Jesus Christus: nam & mensura ipsa longitudinis, altitudinis, latitudinisque ejus significat corpus hominum, in cujus veritate ad homines prænuñciatus est venturus, & venit, &c. Without doubt (saith he) it is a figure of the City of God travailling in this World as a stranger, (that is) of the Church, saved by the Tree, whereupon the Mediator betwene God and Man, the Man Jesus Christ did hang: for even the very measure of the length, height and breadth, answereth the shape of Mans body, in the truth whereof the coming of Christ was fore-told and performed.

By what kinde of Cubite the Arke was measured, it hath bin a disputed question among the Fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect these: The first kind of Cubit (called the common) containeth one foot and a halfe, measured from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger. The second (the Palm-Cubit) which taketh one handfull more than the common. The third is called Regius Cubitus, or the Perfian Cubit, which exceedeth the common Cubit three inches. The fourth is the sacred cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Lastly, there is a fifth Cubit, called Geometrical, which containeth six common Cubits. But of all these sorts, which were commonly measured by the vulgar cubit, the alteration and diminution of mensures hath made the difference. For as there is now a lesse proportion of bodies, so is the common Cubit, from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of lesse length than it was in elder times.

lib. 4.
Plutar. in vita
Demetrii.

S. Augustine considering the many sorts of Beasts and Birds which the Arke held, with their food and water, was sometimes of opinion, that the Arke had proportion after the Geometrical Cubit, which containeth almost fixe of the Common: For, measuring the Arke by the vulgar Cubit, it did not exceed the capacitie of that Vessel built by Hiero of Syracuse, or the Ship of Ptolomie Philopater. But S. Augustine (who at the first was led by Origen) changed his judgement as touching the Geometrical Cubit; and found, upon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a Body to preserve all sorts of Creatures, by God appointed to be reserved. For it was not needfull to take any kindes of Fishes into the Arke, because they were kept living (saith S. Augustine) in their own element. Non fuit necesse conservare in Arca quæ possent in aquis vivere, non solum morsâ sicut Pisces, verum super natantia, sicut multa alites: it was not needfull to conserve those Creatures in the Arke, which could live in the Waters; and not onely Fishes which can live under water, but also those Fowles which sit and swim on them. And againe, Terra, non aqua, maledicta, quia ADAM non hujus, sed illius fructum vetitum comedit: it was the Earth, and not the Waters which God cursed; for of the forbidden fruit of the Earth, and not of the Sea, did ADAM eat. So as S. Augustine gathereth hereupon (as aforesaid) that so huge a Frame needed not.

Aug. de Civit.
Dei, lib. 5. c. 27.

And if we looke with the eyes of judgement hereunto, we shall find nothing monstrous therein; although the imaginations of men, who (for the most part) have more of mischeife and of ignorance, than of any reverend reason, found many impossibilities in this worke of God. But it is manifest, and undoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now seeme differing, and of severall kinds, were not then in rerum natura. For those Beasts which are of mixt natures, either they were not in that age, or else it was not needfull to preserve them, seeing they might be generated againe by others: as the Mules, the Hyænas, & the like; the one begotten by Asses & Mares, and the other by Foxes and Wolves. And whereas by discovering of strange Lands, wherein there are found divers Beasts and Birds, differing in colour or stature from those of these Northern parts; it may be supposed by a superficial consideration, that all those which wear red and pied skins, or feathers, are differing from those that are less painted, and wear plain russet or black; they are much mistaken that so think. And for my owne opinion, I find no difference, but only in magnitude, between the Cat of Europe, and the Owne of India; and even those Dogs which are become wilde in Magnolia, with which the Spaniards used to devour the naked Indians, are now changed to Wolves, and begin to destroy the breed of their Cattel, and do also oftentimes teare asunder their own Children. The common Crow and Rook of India is full of red feathers in the drowned and low Islands of Caribana; and the Black-bird and Thrush hath his feathers mixt with black and carnation in the North parts of Virginia. The Dog-fish of England is the Shark of the South Ocean: For if colour or magnitude made a difference of Species, then were the Nigro's, which we call the Black-Mores, non animalia rationalia, not Men, but some kind of strange Beasts: and so the Giants of the South America should be of another kind, than the people of this part of the World. Wee also see it daily, that the natures of Fruits are changed by transplantation, some to better, some to worse, especially with the change of Clymate. Crabs may be made good Fruit by often grafting, and the best Melons will change in a year or two to common Cowcummers, by being set in a barren Soyle. Therefore, taking the kinds precisely of all Creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the Earth by his Ordinance produced; the Ark, after the measure of the common Cubit, was sufficiently capacious to contain of all, according to the number by God appointed: For if we adde but half a foot of measure to the common Cubit, which had a foot and a halfe of Giantly stature (and less allowance we cannot give to the difference between them and us) then did the Arke contain 600. foot in length, and 100. foot in bredth, and 60. foot deep.

But first of all, to make it manifest that the Geometrical Cubit is not used in the Scripture, the stature of the Giants therein named may suffice. For if the bed of Os, King of Babylon, had been nine Geometrical Cubits long, it had taken 54. Cubits of the common, which make 80. foot: and Goliath, who had the length of six Cubits and a handfull, which makes nine foot and a handfull (a proportion credible) if these Cubits had been Geometrical, then had been 54. foot in height, and upwards, which were monstrous and most incredible: for (according to this proportion) had the head of Goliath been nine foot long, and far weightier and bigger than all David's body, who carried it away.

Againe, if the Geometrical Cubit had been used for a Measure in the Scriptures, many Commenters have observed, then had the Altar (appointed to contain five Cubits of length, five of bredth, and three of height) have reached the length of 27. foot upright, and so must their Priests have ascended by steps or Ladders to have performed their Sacrifices thereon, which was contrary to Gods Commandment given in these words: Thou shalt not go up with steps unto mine Altar, that thy shame be not discovered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three common Cubits high, which make four foot, that their Priests standing thereby might execute their Office. Wherefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometrical, but the ordinary Cubit of one foot and a half, according to the measure of Giantly stature; which measure (doubtless) might give much the more capacity to the Ark; although it be also probable, that as the Men were, so were the Horses whereon they rode, and all other creatures of a correspondent size. And yet (as I take it) though by this means there were not any whit the more room in the Arke, it were not hard to conceive, how all the distinct species of Animals, whose lives cannot be preserved in the Waters, might according to their present quantities be contained in a Vessel of those dimensions which the Ark had; allowing to the Cubit one foot and a half of our now usual measure: whence it followeth of necessity, that those large bodies which were in the daies of Noah might have room sufficient in the Ark, which was measured by a Cubit of length proportionable.

How the appointed number of creatures to be saved, (that is, seven of the clean, two of the unclean (with necessary food) might have place in the Arke; Baleo hath very clear-learnedly declared: the brief sum of whose discourse to that purpose, is this. The length of the Ark was three hundred Cubits, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fifty cubits, and the product by the height of thirty cubits, sheweth the whole Concavity to have been 450000. Now whereas the posts, walls, and other partitions of Lodgings may seem to have taken up a great part of the hollow: the height of the roof, which (the perpendicular being one Cubit) contained 7500 cupicall Cubes was a sufficient recompence: If therefore (as the Ship of such greatness we seek room for 89 distinct species of Beasts, or (least any should be omitted) for 100. several kinds, we shall easily finde place both for them, and for the Birds, which in bigness are no way answerable to them, and for meat to sustain them all. For there are three sorts of Beasts, whose bodies are of a quantity best known; the Beef, the Sheep, and the Wolf: to which the rest may be reduced, by saying, (according to Aristotle) that one Elephant is answerable to four Beeves, one Lyon to two Wolves, and so of the rest. Of Beasts, some feed on vegetables, others on flesh. There are one and thirty kinds of the greater sort, feeding on vegetables: of which number, only three are clean, according to the Law of Moses, whereof seven of a kinde entered into the Ark, namely, three couples for breed, and one odde one for sacrifice: the other eight and twenty kinds were taken by two of each kinde, so that in all there were in the Ark one and twenty great Beasts clean, and six and fifty unclean, estimable for largeness as ninety one Beeves; yet for a supplement (lest perhaps any Species be omitted) let them be valued as a hundred and twenty Beeves. Of the lesser sort feeding on vegetables, were in the Ark six and twenty kinds, estimable with good allowance for supply, as fourscore Sheep. Of those which devour flesh were two and thirty kinds, answerable to threescore and four Wolves. All these two hundred and eighty Beasts might be kept in one story or room of the Ark, in their several Cabines; their meat in a second: the Birds and their provision in a third, with place to spare for NOAH and his family, and all their necessities.

§. X.

That the Ark rested upon part of the hill Taurus (or Caucasus) between the East Indies, and Scythia.

||. I.

A preterition of some questions less material: with a note of the use of this question to finde out the Metropolis of Nations.

WHAT time NOAH took to build the Ark, I leave to others to dispute: but here received the Commandment from God, a hundred years before the waters fell; and had therefore choice of time and leisure sufficient. As for the number of Decks and Partitions, which Origen divides into foure, S. Augustine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controversie: or whether those creatures which sometimes rest on the Land, other times in the Waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Alegartors) the Sea-Cowes or Sea-Horses, were kept in the Ark, or no, I thinke it a needless curiosity; and yet to this faith Perrinus, and others before him, that a Filpooles might be made as well within the Ark, as in Hiero his Ship of Syracuse. Lastly, to consider or labour to disprove the foolery of the Hebrews, who suppose that the Ark was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had Windows of Crystal to receive in Light, and keep out Water, were but to revive the buried vanities of former times. But that which I seek most to satisfy myself and others in, is; in what part of the World the Ark rested after the Flood: because the true understanding of some of these places (as the seat of the terrestrial Paradise, and the resting of the Ark) do onely and truly teach the Worlds Plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the Flood; and all story, as well general as particular, thereby may be the better understood.

||. II.

A proposal of the common opinion, that the Ark rested upon some of the Hills of Armenia.

AND first, for the true place where the Ark rested after the Flood, and from what part of the World the Children of Noah travelled to their first settlement and plan-plantation, I am resolved (without any presumption) that therein the most Writers were utterly mistaken. And I am not led so to thinke out of my Humour or newnesse of opinion, or singularity; but doe herein ground my selfe on the originall & first truth, which is the word of God, and after that upon reason, and the most probable circumstances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, that the Arke layed upon one of the mountaines of Ararat, which the Chaldean Paraphrast hath converted Kardu, meaning the hills Gordai or Gordiai in Armenia the greater: (as the words Gordai and Kardu seem to be one and the same) of which opinion also the most of our Interpreters are; I finde neither Scripture nor reason which teacheth any such thing: (to wit) that it rested on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolaus Damascenus calls this mountain of Ararat, Baris; being the same which the Chaldean nameth Kardu, to which mountain the Fryer Annius (citing this place out of Iosephus) makes him finde another adjoining, called Ocala, and to say that the Arke (of which Moses the Lawgiver of the Hebrews wrote) did first take ground on this Ocala. But I doe not finde any such mountain in being, as this Ocala, neither is there any mention of it in the place of Iosephus. Strabo remembereth a Promontorie in Arabia felix of that name; and Plinie findes a Mart-towne so called in the same, which Plolinic calls Ocalis, Pineus Acyia, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocala of Damascenus, or rather of Annius, seemeth to be one and a part of the Armenian mountains. Berosus calleth those mountains of Armenia Gordiai, and Curtius Gordai: Plolinic Gordai and Gordiai: of which the Countrey next adjoining is by Hiero 51. 27. this Nicolaus Damascenus called Ninyada, perhaps (as Becanus conjectures) for Milyada or rather Minni: which word is used for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia seemes to be compounded of this word Minni, and Aram: as if we should say Minni Nat. hist. l. 5. c. 12. of Syria; for that Armenia also was a part of Syria, Plinie witnesseth. Epiphanius placeth the Cardyes about these mountains, whom others call Gordieni or Gordeni. The mountaines are feated apart from all other to the North of that Ledge of the mountains called Taurus, or Niphates in the plaines of Armenia the great, neere the Lake Thosphitis: whence the River of Tygris floweth in 75. degrees of longitude, and 41. and 52. degrees of latitude. One of the mountains Gordiai (that which surmounteth the rest) 30 Epiphanius calls Lubar, which in the Armenian signifieth a place of descent: but this out of Iosephus; which name (saith Junius) was of the event, because of Noahs coming downe with his children. But this also I take to be a supposed event; seeing any hill from whence on every side we must descend, may thus be called: as Junius corrects the place in Iosephus καταβας (Kabaris). That the place is thus to be read, he conjectureth, because Ios. l. i. c. 4. sayes, the place is called καταβας (as it were the descent or coming downe) and Epiphanius l. i. contr. Hæres. calls it κατα which word in the Armenian and Egyptian tongue signifieth descent, of Lubar, which is to descend; whence also Lubar is a Synagogue, because it was commonly built on some high place: whereof also the Latine Delubrum may seem to be derived; and Ath. 6. 9. they that belonged to the Synagogue 40 of the Egyptians are called Libertini, for Lubra tenu. Yet this opinion hath bene embraced from age to age, receiving a habit of strength by time, and allowance without any farther examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwise rightly be given, especially to that mountain, by reason that the passage was more faire, up and downe unto it, than to any of the rest adjoining.

||. III.

The first argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so neere a place as Armenia.

BUT there are many arguments to perswade me, that the Arke of Noah did not rest it selfe in any part of Armenia, and that the mountaine Ararat was not Baris, nor any one of the *Gordai*an mountaines.

For the first, it is agreed by all which follow Berosus, that it was in the 130. yeer, or in Berosus l. 1. the year 131. after the flood, when Nimrod came into the valley of Shinar, which valley was afterward called Babylonia, Chus, and Chaldea. If then the Arke had first found land in Armenia, it is very unprobable, that the children of Noah which came into that valley could have spent so many yeers in so short a passage: seeing the Region of Mesopotamia was onely interjacent, which might by easie journeyes have bene past over in twenty twenty dayes; and to hasten and help which passage, the navigable River of Tygris offered it selfe, which is every where tranſſable by boats of great burden : ſo as where the Deſart on the one ſide reſiſted their expedition, the River on the contrary ſide ſerved to advance it; the River riſing out of the ſame ledge of mountains, or at the foot of them, where the Ark of Noah was firſt ſuppoſed to ſettle it ſelfe ; Then if the Nations which followed Nimrod ſtill doubted the ſurpriſe of a ſecond flood (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrews) it ſoundeth ill to the eare of reaſon, that they would have ſpent many years in that low and overflown Valley of Meſopotamia, ſo called of the many rivers which imbroyder or compaſs it; for the effects witneſſed their affections, and the works which they undertook, their unbelief; being no ſooner arrived in Shinaar, but they began to provide themſelves of a defence (by erecting Babel) againſt any future or feared inundation. Now at Babel it was that Nimrod began his Kingdome, the firſt known City of the World, founded after the flood about 131. years, or (as others ſuppoſe) ten years later : though (for my ſelfe) I rather think, that they undertook that work in two reſpects; firſt, to make themſelves famous To get us a name (ſaith the Text;) Secondly, thereby to uſurp dominion over the reſt.

||. IIII.

The ſecond Argument, That the Eaſtern people were moſt ancient in poſſeſſion, and in all humane glory.

For a ſecond Argument : The civility, magnificence, and multitude of people (wherein the Eaſt parts of the World firſt abounded) hath more weight than any thing which hath been, or can be ſaid for Armenia, and for Noahs taking land there. And that this is true, the uſe of Printing and Artillery (among many other things which the Eaſt had) may eaſily perſwade us, that thoſe Sun-riſing Nations were the moſt ancient. The certainty of this report, that the Eaſt Indians (time out of mind) have had Guns and Ordnance of battery, confirmed by the Portugals and others, make us now to underſtand, That the place of Philopatra in vita Apollonii Tianeſi, l. 2. c. 14. is no fable, though expreſſt in fabulous words: when he ſaith, that the wiſe men, which dwell between Hypabaſis and Ganges, ſet not themſelves to go forth into battaile; but that they drive away their enemies with thunder and lightning ſent from Jupiter. By which means there it is ſaid, that Hercules Ægyptius and Bacchus, joyning their forces, were defeated there; and that this Hercules there caſt away his golden ſhield. For the invention of letters was ignorantly aſcribed to Cadmus, becauſe he brought them firſt into Greece: of which the people (then rude and ſavage) had reaſon to give him the honour, from whom they received the benefit. But it is true, that letters are no leſſe ancient than Seth or Henoch were: for they are ſaid to have written on pillars of ſtone (as before remembred) long before the flood. But from the Eaſtern world it was that John Gutenberg a Germane, brought the device of Printing : by whom Conradus being inſtructed, 40 brought the practice thereof to Rome : and after that Nicholaus Gerſon a Frenchman, betwixt both the letters and invention. And notwithstanding that this myſtery was then ſuppoſed to be but newly borne, the Chinaos had letters long before either the Egyptians or Phenicians; and alſo the Art of Printing, when as the Greeks had neither any civill knowledge, or any letters among them.

And, that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards have witneſſed, who about an hundred years ſince diſcovered thoſe Kingdomes, and doe now enjoy their rich trades therein: for the Chinaos account all other nations but ſavages in reſpect of themſelves.

And to adde ſtrength to this argument, the conqueſt and ſtory of Alex. Macedon may juſtly be called to witneſs, who found more Cities and ſumptuouſity in that little Kingdome of Perſia, which lay ſide by ſide to the Eaſt India, than in all his other travails and undertakings. For in Alexanders time, learning and greatneſs had not travelled ſo far to the Weſt as Rome. Alexander eſteeming of Italy but as a barbarous Country, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that ſtood in his eye, and the fame of the Eaſt pierced his ears. And if we look as far as the Sun-riſing, and hear Paulus Venetus who: he reporteth of the uttermoſt Angle and Iſland thereof, we ſhall finde that thoſe Nations have ſent out, and not received; lent knowledge, and not borrowed it from the Weſt. For the farther Eaſt (to this day) the more civill, the farther Weſt, the more Salvage. And and of the Iſle of Japan (now Zipangari) Venetus maketh this report : Incolæ religioni, literis, & ſapientie ſunt additiſſimi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi; nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more noſtro) ſacris in delubris exercent: unum cognoscunt Principem, unum Deum adorant: The Iſlanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters, and philoſophy, and moſt diligent ſearchers out of truth: there is nothing among them, more frequent than prayer, which they uſe in their Churches, after the manner of Chriſtians: They acknowledge one King, and worſhip one God. The antiquity, magnificence, civility, riches, ſumptuous buildings, and policie in government, is reported to be ſuch by thoſe who have bin employed into thoſe parts, as it ſeemeth to exceed, in thoſe formerly named, and divers 10 other particulars) all other Kingdomes of the World.

||. V.

The third Argument, from the wonderfull reſiſtance which SEMIRAMIS found in the Eaſt Indies.

But for a third argument, and alſo of a treble ſtrength to the reſt, I lay the invasion of Semiramis before the indifferent and adviſed Reader: who may conſider in what age ſhe lived, and how ſoon after the Worlds new birth ſhe gathered her Army (as Diodorus Siculus out of Cteſias reporteth) of more than three millions to invade India, 20 to which he adjoynd alſo 500000. Horſes; and 100000. Waggons: whereof if we believe but a third part, it ſhall ſuffice to prove that India was the firſt planted and peopled Country after the flood. Now as touching the time wherein ſhe lived: All Hiſtorians conſent that ſhe was the Wife of Nimrod, and the moſt approved Writers agree, that Ninus was the Son of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Son of Cuſh, Cuſh of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at ſuch time as Nimrod came to Shinaar, he was then a great Nation, as by the building of the City and Tower of Babel may appeare; and being then ſo multiplied and increaſed, the two deſcents caſt betwixt Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time thoſe multitudes, whereof her Army was compoſed. Let us then ſee with whom ſhe encountered in that War with this her powerful Army: even with a multitude, rather exceeding, than equalling her own conducted by Staurobates King of India beyond Indus; of whole multitudes this is the witneſſe of Diod. Siculus. STAUROBATES avitis majoribus, quim que erant SEMIRAMIDIS copis: STAUROBATES gathering together greater Troops than thoſe of SEMIRAMIS. If then theſe numbers of Indians had bene increaſed but by a Colonic ſent out from Shinaar (and that alſo after Babel was built, which no doubt took ſome time in the performance) this increaſe in the Eaſt, and this Army of Staurobates muſt have bene made of ſtone, or ſomewhat elſe by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might eaſily grow up in that time, from ſo great a Troop as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as ſhall bee demonſtrated hereafter in the Story of Iſrael) ſo 40 could not any ſuch time, by any multiplication natural, produce ſo many bodies of men as were in the Indian Army victorious over Semiramis, if the Colonies ſent thither had bene ſo late as Babel overturned, and the confuſion of Languages. For if we allow 65. years time after the Flood, before Nimrod was borne: of which, thirty yeares to Cuſh ere he begat Seba, after whom hee had Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabtecha: and then thirty yeares to Raamah, ere he begat Sheba and Dedan, both which were Gen. 10. 7. borne before Nimrod: and five yeares to his five elder brothers, which make fixty five, and then twice thirty yeares for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba and Dedan with others, to beget their ſonnes; and that a third Generation might grow up, which makes in all an hundred twenty five yeares; there will then remaine 50 ſix yeares to have been ſpent in travelling from the Eaſt, ere they arrived in Shinaar, in the year after the Flood 131. And ſo the followers of Nimrod might be of ſufficient multitude. But as for thoſe which make him to have arrived at Shinaar in the year 101. and the confuſion to have been at *Peleg*s birth, theſe men doe all by miracles: they beget whole Nations without the help of time; and build *Nimrod*s Tower in the Ayre; and not on thoſe low and marſh grounds (which require ſound foundations) in the Plains of Shinaar. For except that huge Tower were built in a day, there could be no confuſion in that year 101. or at *Peleg*s birth. And therefore it is farre more probable, that Nimrod uſurped Regall authority in the 131. year after Glyc. in Gen. 6.

de Turris ex-
fol. 173.

after the Flood, (according to Berosus) and that the work of Babel lasted forty yeares (according to GLYCAS) Hominiibus in ea perficienda totis 40. annis incassum laborantibus; Men labouring in vain 40. yeares to finish it. By which account it falls out that it was 170. yeares after the Flood, ere a Colomie was sent into East India; which granted (the one being the main Body, and the other but a Troop taken thence) it can hardly be believed that Storobates could have exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then Emperess of all the part of that world, gathered the most of Nations into one body.

|| V I.

The fourth Argument from divers considerations in the person of NOAH.

Fourthly, it is no way probable, that Noah, who knew the world before the Flood, and had lived therein the long time of 600. yeares, was all that space 130. yeares after the flood without any certain habitation: No, it will fall out, and better agree with reason, that Nimrod was but the conductor of those people, by Noah destined & appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the earth and the Westerne Worlds; (which tra-vailles Noah put over to young and able bodies) and that Noah himself then covered with many yeares, planted himselfe in the same place which God had assigned him; which was, where he first came down out of the Ark from the waters: for it is written, that after Noah came downe out of the Arke, he planted a Vineyard, and became a Husbandman, whose business was to dress and manure the Earth; and not to range over so many parts of the world, as from Armenia into Arabia felix, where he should (if the tradition be found) have left certain Colonies: thence into Africa towards Triton, then into Spain, where they say he settled other companies, and built Cities after the names of Noela and Noegla his Sons Wives: from thence into Italy, where they say he found his Sonne Cham the Saturne of Egypt, who had corrupted the people and subjects of Gomer in his absence: with whom Noah (as they make the story) had patience for three yeares; but then finding no amendment, they say he banisht him out of Italy. These be but the fancies of Berosus Ammianus, a plain imitation of the Grecian fables. For let every reasonable man conceive, what it was to traivelle far in such a forreit as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the Earth by the Flood, the samelay waste and over-grown for 130. or 140. yeares, and wherein there could hardly be found either part or passage through which men were able to creep for woods, bushes, and bryars that in those yeares were grown up.

And there are so many reasons, proving that Noah never came into the valley of Shi-naar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italy or Spain: For Noah, who was Father of all those Nations, a man revered both for his authority, knowledge, experience and piety, would never have permitted his children and issues to have undertaken that unbelieving presumptuous work of Babel. Rather by his presence and prevalent perswasions he would have bound their hands from so vain labours, & by the authority which he received even from God himselfe, he would have held them in that awfull subjection, as whatsoever they had vainly conceived or feared, yet they durst not have disobeyed the personall commandment of him, who in the beginning had a kinde of Regall authority over his children and people. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of mankind was by themselves purchased through cruelty and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise up building against his Almighty power, was as much as in them lay, a provocation of God to lay on them the same, if not a more sharp affliction. Wherefore, there is no probability, that ever he came so far West as Babylonia; but rather, that he sent those numbers which came into Shinaar (being the greatest troop, because they had the greatest part of the world to plant) under Nimrod, or those upon whom he usurped. Nauclerus and Celestinus take the testimony of Methodius Bishop of Tyre for current, that there were three Leaders of the people after their increase (to wit) Nimrod, Sephene, and Jochan: of which Nimrod commanded the issues of Cham, Jochan of Sem, and Sephene of Japhet. This opinion
I cannot judge of, although I will not doubt, but that so great a work as the Worlds plantation, could not be effected without order and conduction.

Of the sonnes of Sem: Jochan, Havilah, and Ophir, are especially noted to have dwelt in the East India. The rest of Sem's issues had also the Regions of Persia and the other adjoining adjoining to Indus, and held also a part of Chaldea for a time: for Abraham inhabited Ur, till he was thence called by God; and whether they were of the sons of Jochan, or of all the rest a certain number (Cham and his issue only excepted) that Noah kept with himself, it cannot be known. Of which plantation I shall speak at large in the Chapter following.

Now another reason which moves me to believe that Noah stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinaar, is, that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the story of the Hebrewes, or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah being the Father of all mankind, and the chosen servant of God, was too principall a person, to be either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in respect of his age and wearisome experience of the World) withdrawne himselfe, and rested a part with his best beloved, giving himself to the service and contemplation of God and heavenly things, after he had directed his children to their destined portions. For he landed in a warm and fertile soile, where he planted his Vineyard, and drest the Earth; after which, and his thank-giving to God by sacrifice, hee is not remembered in the Scriptures, because he was so farre away from those Nations of which Moses wrote: which were the Hebrews chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

|| §. VII.

Of the senselesse opinion of ANNIUS the Commentor upon BEROSUS: who findes divers places where the Ark rested; as the Caspian and Gordian hills which are three hundred miles asunder, and also some places of Scythia.

It remaineth now that we examine the Arguments and Authorities of Frier Annius, who in his Commentaries upon Berosus and others, laboureth marvailously to prove that the Arke of Noah rested upon the Armenian Mountains called Caspri; which mountains separate Armenia from the upper Media, & do equally belong to both. And because all his Authors speak of the mountains Gordizi, he hath no other shift to unite these opinions, but by uniting those far-distant mountains together. To effect which, he hath found no other invention, than to charge those men with error, which have carefully over-seen, printed, and published Platomys Geography, in which they are altogether dislevered. For that last edition of Mercators, sets these hills five degrees (which makes three hundred English miles) asunder. And certainly, if we look into those more ancient copies of Villanovannus and others, we shall finde nothing in them to help Annius withall: for in those the mountains Caspri stand seven degrees to the East of the Gordiaz, which maks 420. miles. And for those Authors by whose authority Annius strengtheneth himself, Diodorus whom he so much followeth, giveth this judgment upon them in the like dispute. Aberrantur vero omnes, non negligentia, sed regno-rum suarum ignorantia; they have altered (saith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the situation of Kingdomes. But for an induction, to prove that the Ark of Noah stood on the mountains of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquity of the Scythians: and to prove the same he citeth Marcus Portius Cato, who avoweth that 250. yeares before Nimrod, the earth was over-flown with waters, & in Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus; and that in Scythia the stock of mortall men was renewed. The same Author also teacheth, that the Umbri before remembered (who were so called, because saved from Deucalions Flood) were the sonnes of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex his venisse JANUM cum DYRIM, & Gallis progenitoribus Umbrorum; From these Scythians, he saith, that JANUS came with DYRIM, and with the Galli the progenitors of the Um-bri: And againe, Equidem principatus originis semper Scythiis tribuitur; Certainly, the Prime Antiquity of Off-spring is alway given to the Scythians. And herein truly I agree with Annius, that those Regions called Scythia, and now Tartaria, and by some Writers Sarmatia, Asiatica, were among the first peopled: and they held the greatest part of Asia under Tribute till Nimrod's time. Also Plinie called the Umbri which long since inhabited Italy, Gens antiquissima, a most ancient Nation, who descended of these Scythians. Now that which Annius laboureth, is to prove that these ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephewes of Noah) did first inhabit that Region of the mountains, on which the Ark rested; and confessing that this great Ship was grounded in Armenia, he feigneth a nation of Scythians called Araxee, taking name of the mountain Ararat, near the River of Araxes. And because his Author Cato helpeth him in part (to wit, That in Scythia mankind was restored after the great flood 250. years before Ninus) and in part utterly destroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Sages as, In Scythia Sage renatum mortale genus; in Scythia Sage mankind was restored, he therefore in the Proemio of his Commentary upon Berojus, leaveth out the addition of Sage altogether in the repetition of Cato his words, and writes, homines in Scythia Salvatos. For Scythia Saga or Saca; is undoubtedly under the Mountaines of Paropamisus; on which, or near which it is most probable that the Arke first took ground: and from thence the East parts (according to Moses) came all those companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinaar or Babylonia.

But now the best authority which Amnius hath, is out of Diodorus: where he hath read that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name à Scythia Rege eorum, from Scythia their King. But (in a word) we may see his vanity, or rather (indeed) his fallhood in citing this place, For Diodorus, a most approved and diligent Author, beginneth in that place with these words: Fabulantur Scythæ; The Scythians fable; and his Interpreter in the table of that work giveth this title to that very Chapter. Scytharum origo & successus, fabula; The original and success of the Scythians, a fable. And (indeed) there needs no great disproof hereof, since Ptolomy doth directly delineate Scythia Saga or Saca, and sets them in 130. degrees of longitude: and the Persians (saith Herodotus) call all the Scythians, Saces; which Pliny confirmeth: for in respect that these Saca (saith Pliny) are the next Scythians to the Persians, therefore they gave all the rest that name. Now that any Nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no man believeth. But this supposed Scythia Araxea in Armenia lieth in 78. degrees of longitude (that is) 42. degrees distant from the Saca; and the Country about Araxes Ptolomy calleth Colchene and Soduene & Sacapene without any mention of Scythia at all; and yet all those which are or were reputed Scythians either within Imaus or without, to the number of 100. several Nations, are by Ptolomy precisely feid down.

But to come to those latter Authors, whereof some have written, others have seen a great part of those North-East Regions, and searched their antiquities with great diligence: First Marius Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: for Scythia without these Mountains is also beyond our purpose) Scythia inter Imaum montem ea est, que proprio vocabulo Gassaria hoc tempore dicitur: à Meridie Saccis, Sogdianis, Margianis, usque ostia Oxæamnis in Hyrcanum mare excurrent; & parte ipsius maris hinc usq; ad Rhæsumini ostia terminatur: Scythia within the mountaine Imaus is that part of the World which in their owne speech is at this time called Gassaria; and the same is bounded on the West side by Sarmatia Asiatica (or of Asia) on the East by the Imaus Mountaines: on the North by unknown Lands: on the South by the Saccæ (which are in the Saca) the Sogdiani, and the Margiani, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a part of the same Sea as far as the mouth of Rha.

Now if Niger lets all Sarmatia Asiatica to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (que à maxime sanè Regio est, & que innumeras nationes complectitur) which is a great Region, comprehending innumerable nations (saith Niger) much of it being between Scythia and Armenia, doth sufficiently warrant us, that Armenia can be no part of Scythias and to make it more plain, he discovereth Sarmatia it self from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, which he leaveth on the right hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the West bound of Scythia.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian or Scythian Nations; neither doth his fellow Frier John Plancarpio (cited by Vincentius in his description of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neither doth Haytonus, an Armenian borne, of the blood of those Kings (though afterward a Monk) ever acknowledge himself for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian Races descended: though he write that story in a large, gathered by Nicholas Salcuti, and (by the commandement of Pope Clement the fifth) in the year 1307. published.

Neither doth Matthias a Michon (a Canon of Cracovia in Polonia) a Sarmatian borne, and that travelled a great part of Sarmatia Asiatica, finde Armenia any way within the compasse of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whose Travails are extant) hath observed so much of those Regions as he hath done: proving and disproving many things, heretofore subject to dispute. And among others he burieth that ancient and received received opinion, That out of the Mountains, Rhiphai, and Hyperborei in Scythia, spring the Rivers of Tanais or Don, Volga or Edel; providing by unanswerable experience, that there are no such Mountains in rerum natura; and (indeed) the Heads and Fountains of those famous Rivers are now by the Trade of Muscovia knowne to every Merchant, and that they arise out of Lakes, low, wooddie, and marish grounds. The River of Tanais or Don, ariseth to the South of the Citie Tulla, some twentie English miles, out of a Lake called Iwanowesero, in the great wood Ogemizkilies or Jephphanolies, Volga, which Ptolomie calls Rba, and the Tartars call Edel, riseth out of a Lake called Fronom, in the great Wood Vodkaizki: from which Lake the two other famous Rivers flow, of Bosphoruses (now Neyper) and Dniuna or Dniudna. And this learned Polonian doth in this Sig. Herbelem. 10 fort bound the European Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Russians, Lithuanians, Muscovians, and those adjoining, bounded on the West by the River of Vissa, the Name perchance mis-printed Vissa for Vistula, a River which parts Germania and Crazeus calleth this River Wislun, Nig- ver Wislun, Nig- ger Dravaman- ca, Pon. Mela, Vistula & Plin. Vistula. Sarmatia: and for the East border he nameth Tanais, or Don. Sarmatia Asiatica he cutteth from Europe by the same River of Tanais, and the Caspian Sea, to with-hold it from stret- ching farther East: this Asian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolomie calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem: Scythia within the Mountaine Imaus. And the same Matthias Michon farther affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Frier Amnius would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Asiatica it selfe above three hundred and a few odd yeeres before his owne time: these be his words: Constat eam esse gentem novam, & adventitiam à partibus Orientis (mutatis sedibus) paulo plus abhinc trecentis annis Asia Sarmatiam ingressam: It is manifest (saith he, speaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late planted Nation, come from the coast of the East: from whence they entred into Asia, & gat new sates a little more than 300. yeeres since. For (indeed) before that time the Gothes or Foulci inhabited Sarmatia Asiatica. And this Matthias lived in the year 1511. and this his Discourse of Sarmatia was printed at Augusta in the yeere 1506. as Eusebius in his Chronologie witnesseth. Now these Scythians (saith he) came from the East, for in the East it was that the Ark of Noah rested, and the Scythæ Saca were those people which lived at the North foot of those Mountains, of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or begin to mixe themselves with the great Imaus. And were there no other testimony than the general description of the Earth now extant, and the witness of Ptolomie, it is plaine, that betweene all parts of Armenia, and Scythia, there are not only those three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caspian Sea: on the East shore of which Sea, but not on the West, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeed) a Nation of Scythians (called Ariace) between Jaxartes and Jaisus; but what are these Scythians to any Ariace, or Scythia Araxea, which Amnius placeth in Armenia, more than the Scythians of Europe?

|| VIII.

40 The first Argument, The Vine must grow naturally nere the place where the Arke rested.

TO this if we adde the consideration of this part of the Text, That Noah planted a Vineyard, we shall find that the fruite of the Vine or Rayns did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the Arke was supposed: for the Vine was a stranger in Italie and France, and brought from other Countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a farre colder Country. For Tyrreus first brought Vines into France, and Saturnus into Latium: yea at such times as Brennus and the Gauls invaded Italie, there were few or no Vines in France. For (saith Plutarch in the life of Camillus) the Gauls remained betweene the Pyrenei and the Alpes, Servius Aeneas 50 nere unto the Senones, where they continued a long time, till they drunke Wine, which was first brought them out of Italie; and after they tasted thereof, they hasted to inhabit that Country, which brought forth such pleasant fruite: so as it appeareth, that the Plant of the Vine was not naturall in France, but from Italie brought thither; as by Saturne from else where into Italy.

Now it is manifest, that Noah travelled not far to seeke out the Vine. For the Plantation thereof is remembered, before there was any counsaile how to dispose of the world among his children: and the first thing he did, was, to till the ground, & to plant a Vineyard, after the Sacrifice and Thanksgiving to God; and wherefoever the Arke rested, there there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appear, that he travelled far: for the Scriptures teach us, that he was a Husband-man, and not a wanderer.

An answer to an objection out of the words of the Text: The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole earth.

And that all the children of Noah came together into Shinar, it doth not appear, saving that it may be inferred out of these words (from thence) because it is written: So that the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the Earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Tower: for those were from thence dispersed into all the Regions of the North and South, and to the Westward. And by these words of Sybilla (as they be converted) it seemeth that all came not together into Shinar; for they have this limitation: Quidam eorum turrem edificarunt altissimam, quasi per eam celum essent ascensuri: Certaine of them built a most high Tower, as if they meant thereby to have scaled the Heavens.

An answer to the objection of the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the Hills there.

But before I conclude this part, it is necessarie to see and consider, what part of Scripture, and what reason may be found out, to make it true or probable, that the Arke of Noah was forsaken by the waters on the Mountains of Armenia. For the Text hath onely these words: The Arke rested on (or upon) the Mountains of Ararat, or Armenia, faith the marginall note of the Geneva: the Chaldean Paraphrast calls it Kardus, of which, the highest hath the name of Lubar, faith Epiphanius. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint do not convert at all, but keepe the same word) is taken to be a Mountain of Armenia; because Armenia it selfe had anciently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the height (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, That the Arke first fate thereon.

But these suppositions have no foundation: for neither is Ararat of Armenia alone, neither is any part, or any of those Mountains of equal stature to many other Mountaines of the World; and yet it doth not follow, that the Arke found the highest Mountaine of all other to rest on: for the Plains were also uncovered before Noah came out of the Arke. Now, if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, we might give more credit to the conceit. For in the Bookes of the Sybils, it is written, that the Mountains of Ararat are in Phrygia, upon which it was supposed that the Arke layed after the Flood. And the better to particularize the place and seate of these Mountains, and to prove them in Phrygia, and not Armenia: they are placed where the City of Celenes was afterward built. Likewise in the same description the maketh mention of Marjjar, a River which runneth through part of Phrygia and afterward joyneth it selfe with the River Meander, which is far from the Gordian Mountains in Armenia. We may also finde a great mistaking in JOSEPHUS (though out of Berosus, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that JOSEPHUS sets Ararat betwene ARMENIA and PARTHIA, toward ADIABENE, and affirmeth withall, that in the Province of Cæron (by others Kairos and Arnos, so called by reason that the waters have from thence no descent, nor issue out) the people vaunt that they had in those dayes reserved some peices of Noahs Arke. But Parthia toucheth no where upon Armenia; for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a Province of Assyria: so that all Media and a part of Assyria is betwene Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the discovery of the Mountaines Gordiei was first borrowed out of Berosus by JOSEPHUS, yet the Text which JOSEPHUS citeth out of Berosus differs far from the words of that Berosus, which wandereth up and downe in these dayes, set out by ANNIVS. For Berosus, cited by JOSEPHUS, hath these words: Fertur & navigii hujus pars in Armenia apud montem Gordieorum supersesse, & quosdam Bitumen inde abrasum secum reportare, quo vice annuleti loci hujus homines uti solent: (which is) It is reported also that a part of this ship is yet remaining in Armenia upon the Gordian Mountains; and that divers doe scrape from it the Bitumen or Pitch, and carrying it with them, they use it in stead of an annulet. But ANNIVS his Edition of the Fragment of Berosus useth these words: Nam elevata ab aquis in Gordieis montis vertice quiescit, cujus adhuc dicitur aliqua pars esse, & homines ex illa Bitumen tollere quo maxime utuntur ad expiationem: For the whole Arke being lifted up by the waters, rested on the top of the Gordian Mountaines, of which it is reported that some parts remaine, and that men doe carry thence of the Bitumen to purge by Sacrifice therewith: so as in these two Texts (besides the difference of words) the name is diversly written. The ancient Berosus writes Gordiei with a (C.) and the Fragment Gordiei with a (G.) the one that the Bitumen is used for a preservative against Poyson or Inchantment; the other in Sacrifice. And if it be said that they agree in the generally, yet it is reported by neither from any certain knowledge, nor from any approved Author: for one of them, useth the word (fertur) the other (dicitur) the one, that so it is reported, the other, that so it is said; and both but by heare-say, and therefore of no authority nor credit. For common bruit is so infamous an Historian, as wise men neither report after it, nor give credit to any thing they receive from it.

Edition

Furthermore, these Mountaines which Ptolomie calls Gordiei, are not those Mountaines which himselfe giveth to Armenia, but he calleth the Mountaines of Armenia, Moschici. These be his own words: Montes Armenia nominantur ii, qui Moschici appellantur, qui protendantur usque ad superjacentem partem Ponti Cappadocum; & mons qui Paryardes dicitur: The Mountaines of Armenia are they which are called Moschici, stretch along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians: also the Hill which is called Paryardes: which Mountaines Plinie calleth Paryedri, and both which lye to the North of Gordiai or Baris, Plin. l. 6. c. 9. in 43. and 44. and a halfe; and the Gordian Mountaines in 39. and a halfe: from the Northmost of which did the Georgians take their names, who were first Gordians, and then Georgians, who amidst all the strength of the greatest Infidels of Persia and Turkie, doe still remaine Christians. Concerning the other suppositions, that the Mountaines of Gordiei, otherwise Baris, Kardus or Lubar (which Ptolomie calleth Tergodasion) are the highest of the World, the same is absolutely false.

||. XI.

Of Caucasus, and divers far higher hills than the Armenian.

For the best Cosmographers with other, that have seene the Mountaines of Armenia, find them far inferior, and under-set to divers other Mountaines even in that part of the World, and else where: as the Mountaine Athos betwene Macedon and Thracie, which Ptolomie calls Olympus, now called Lacar, (saith Casfakus) is far surmounting any Mountaine that ever hath beene seene in Armenia: for it casteth shade three hundred furlongs, which is seven and thirtie miles and upwards: of which Plutarch; Athos ad*umbrat latera Lemnie bovis: Athos shadoweth the Cow of Lemnos. Also the Mount of Olympus in Thessalie, is said to be of that height, as neither the Windes, Clouds or Raine overthrow it. Again, the Mountaine of Antandrus in Mysia, not farre from Ida, whence the River Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is also of a farre more admiration than any in Armenia, and may be seene from Constantinople. There are also in Mauritania neere the Sea the famous Mountaines of Atlas, of which HERODOTUS: Extat in hoc mari Mons cui nomen Atlas, ita sublimis esse dicitur, ut ad illius verticem oculi mortalium pervenire non possint: Upon this Coast there is a Mountaine called Atlas, whose height is said to be such, as the eye of no mortall man can descerne the top thereof. And if we may beleeve Aristotle, then are all these inferior to Caucasus, which he maketh the most northerly both for breadth and height: Caucasus Mons omnium maximus, qui aestivum ad ortum sunt, acumine atque latitudine, cujus juga a Sole radiantur usque ad anticini-*Summ ab ortu: & iterum ab occasu: Caucasus (saith ARISTOTLE) is the greatest Mountaine both for breadth and height of all those in the North-east, whose tops are lightened by the Sunbeams, usque ad anticinium) which is, saith Macrobius betwene the first crowing after midnight and the break of day: Others affirm, that the top of this Mountaine holds the Sunbeams when it is darke in the Valley; but I cannot beleeve either, for the highest Mountaine of the World knowne, is that of Tenerife in the Canaria: which although it hath nothing to the Westward of it for 1000. Leagues together but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not enjoy the Sun's company at any such late houres. Besides these Mountaines which Aristotle calleth Cascafi, are those which separate Colchis from Iberia

Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth divide both Colchis, Iberia, and Albania from Sarmatia: for he acknowledgeth that the River of Phasis riseth in the same Mountaine, which himself calleth Caucasus, and that Phasis springeth from those Hills which funder Colchis from Iberia, falling afterward into Euxinus: which River (it is manifest) yeeldeth it self to the Sea, two degrees to the North of Trapesus (now Trabesunda) howsoever Mercator bring it from Paryarden.

||. XII.

Of divers incongruities if in this Story we should take Ararat for Armenia.

SO as it doth first appear, that there is no certainty what Mountain Ararat was: for the Books of the Sybls set it in Phrygia, and Berosus in Armenia: and as for Berosus authority, those men have great want of proofs that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Baris was the highest Hill, and therefore most likely that the Arke grounded thereon, the assertion and supposition have equal credit: for there are many Hills which exceed all those of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Arke should fit on the highest.

Thirdly, it cannot be proved that there is any such Hill in Armenia, or in verum natura, as Baris: for Baris (saith Hierome) signifieth high Towers: and so may all high Hills be called indifferently; and therefore we may better give the name of Baris to the 20 Hills of Caucasus (out of which Indus riseth) than to any Hills of Armenia. For those of Caucasus in the East, are undoubtedly the highest of Asia.

Fourthly, the Authors themselves do not agree in what Region the Mountains Gordies stand: for Ptolomie distinguisheth the Mountains of Armenia from the Gordian, and calleth those of Armenia Moschici and Paryarden, as aforesaid. Now Paryarden is seated neer the middle of Armenia, out of which on the West-side riseth, Euphrates, and out of the East-side, Araxis: and the Mountains Moschici are those Hills which disjoyn Colchis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

||. XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia, to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no marvel that the same Ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all along: and even in India be called Ararat.

Lastly, we must blow up this Mountain Ararat it self, or else we must dig it downe, and carry it out of Armenia, or finde it elsewhere, and in a warmer Country, and (withal) set it East from Shinaar; or else we shall wound the Truth it self with the weapons of our own vain imaginations.

Therefore to make the mistaking open to every eye, we must understand, that Ararat (named by Moses) is not any one Hill, so called, no more than any one Hill among those Mountains which divide Italy from France, is called the Alpes: or any one among those which part France from Spain is the Pyrenian; but as these, being continuations of many Hills, keep one name in divers Countries: so all that long Ledge of Mountains, which Plinie calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolomie both Taurus, Niphates, Coatras, Coraxus, Sariphi, until they encounter and cross the Mountains of the great Imaus, are of one general name, and are called the Mountains of Ararat or Armenia, because from thence or thereabout they seem to arise. So all these Mountains of Hyrcania, Armenia, Coraxus, Casspi, Moschici, Amazonici, Heniochi, Scythici, (thus diversly called by Plinie and others) Ptolomie calls by one name Caucasus, lying between the Seas Casspium and Euxinus: as all those Mountains which cut asunder America, even from the new Kingdome of Granado, to the streight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as these Mountains of Ararat run East and West, so do those marvellous Mountains of Imaus stretch themselves North and South; and being of like extent well-neer, are called by the name of Imaus, even as Plinie called these former Hills Taurus, and Moses the hills of Ararat. The reason of several names given by Ptolomie, was, thereby the better to distinguish the great Regions and Kingdoms, which these great Mountains bound and disleaver; as Armenia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Media, Susiana, Persia, Parthia, Caramania, Aria, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Parapanisus: having ving all these Kingdoms either on the North or South side of them. For all the mountains of Asia (both the less and the greater) have three general names, (to wit) Taurus, Imaus, and Caucasus: and they receive other titles, as they sever and divide particular places and Regions. For these Mountains which funder Cilicia from the rest of Asia the less on the North side, are called Taurus; and those Mountains which part it from Comagena (a Province of Syria) are called Imaus: the mountains called Taurus running Eastward West, as Imaus doth North and South. Through Taurus the River of Euphrates forceth her passage, leaving the name of Imaus to the Mountains on her West-bank, and on her East side the Mountains are sometimes known by the name of Taurus, (as in Ptolomie's three Tables of Asia) and sometimes Niphates; (as in the fourth) retaining that uncertain appellation so long as they bound Armenia from Mesopotamia: and after the River of Ygrus cutteth them asunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, until they separate Assyria and Media; but then they call themselves Coatras, though between the upper and nether Media, they do not appear, but altogether discontinue. For at Mazada in Media they are not found, but run through the Eastern Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themselves Orontes, and towards the East part Coronus; out of the Southerne part whereof the River of Bagradas riseth, which divideth the ancient Persian from Caramania: and then continuing their course Eastward by the name of Coronus, they give to the Parthians and Hyrcanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themselves into the mountains of Sariphi, out of which riseth the River Margus, afterward yeelding her self to Oxus (now Abia): and drawing now neer their waies end, they first make themselves the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the Title of Parapanisus; and lastly of Caucasus, even where the famous River of Indus, with his principal companions Hydaspis and Zaredrus, spring forth and take beginning. And here do these Mountains build themselves exceeding high, to equal the strong Hills called Imaus of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35, 36, and 37. degrees of Latitude, and in 140. of Longitude: of the which the West parts are now called Delanquer, and the rest Nagracot; and these Mountains in this place only are properly called Caucasus (saith Ptolomie) that is, between Parapanisus and Imaus: and improperly, between the two Seas of Casspium and Pontus.

||. XIV.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountains Caucasus, and toward the East Indies: and of other excellencies of the soile.

Now in this part of the World, it is where the Mountain and River Janus, and the highest Mountains of that part of the world did Goropius Becanus conceive that the Ark, of old grounded after the Flood; of all his conjectures the most probable, and by best reason approved. In his Indoicythia he hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantastical opinions of this subject. And as the same Becanus also noeth, that as in this part of the World are found the best Vines: so it is as true, that in the same Line, and in 34, 35, & 36. degrees of Septentrional Latitude, are the most delicate Wines of the World, namely, in Judea, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewise in this Region of Margiana: and under these Mountains Strabo affirmeth, that the most excellent Vines of the World are found; the clusters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: and it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Palestina, where the searchers of the land, by Moses direction, found bunches of so equal bigness at Ejcol.

Numb. 13. 24.

The fruitfulness of this place (to wit) on the South bottome of these Hills, Curtius witnesseth. For in Margiana neer the Mountains of Meros did Alexander feast himselfe and his Army ten daies together, finding the most delicate Wine of all other.

||. XV.

The conclusion, with a brief repeating of divers chief points.

And therefore to conclude this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those Mountains do also traverse Armenia: yea, and Armenia it self sometime is knowne by the name

name of Ararat. But as Plinie giveth to this ledge of high Hills, even from Cilicia to Favoponius and Caucasus, the name of Taurus; and as the Hills of France and Germanie are called the Alpes; and all between France and Spain the Pyrenes; and in America the continuation of Hills for 3000 miles together, the Andes: so was Ararat the general name which Moses gave them; the diversity of appellations no otherwise growing, than by their dividing and bordering divers Regions and divers Countries. For in the like case do we call the Sea, which entrench by Gibraltar, the Mediterran and inland Sea; and yet where it watheth the Coasts of Carthage, and over against it, it is called Tyrrhenium: between Italy and Greece, Ionium: from Venice to Durazzo, Adriaticum: between Athen and Asia, Aegeum: between Sesue and Abydus, Hellepont: and afterward Pontus, Propontis, and Bosphorus. And as in these, so is the Ocean to the North-east part of Scotland called Duncaldonycum: and on this side, the Brittain Sea: to the East, the Germane and Baltick, and then the Frozen.

For a final end of this question, we must appeal to that Judge, which cannot erre, even to the Word of Truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plain sense: seeing it can admit neither distinction, nor other construction than the words bear literally, because they are used to the very same plain purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely, where the sense is plain (and being so understood, it bringeth with it no subsequent inconvenience or contrariety) we ought to be warie, how we fancie to our selves any new or so strange exposition; And (withal) to resolve our selves; that every word (as aforesaid) hath his weight in Gods Book. And therefore we must respect and reverence the testimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in such sort as Saint Augustine hath taught us touching the Gospel of CHRIST JESUS (which is) Nemo aliter accipiat (quod narratur Discipulis Christi) in Evangelio legere, quam si ipsam manum Dei, quam in proprio corpore gestabat, conspexerit; That no man otherwise take or understand that which he readeth in the Gospel (the Disciple of Christ having written it) than if he had seen the very hand of the Lord, which he bare in his own body, setting it down.

Gen. c. 11. v. 2.

The words then of Moses which end this dispute, are these: And as they went from the East, they found a Playne in the land of Shinaar; and there they abode: which proveth without controversy, that Nimrod, and all with him, came from the East into Shinaar; and therefore the Arke of Noah rested and took land to the East-ward thereof. For we must remember, that in all places wheresoever Moses maketh a difference of Countries, he always precisely nameth toward what quarter of the world the same were seated: as where he teacheth the plantation of Jofan, he nameth Sephar, a Mount in the East: where he remembreth Cains departure from the presence of God, he addeth; And Cain dwelt in the land of Nod towards the East-side of Eden: And when he describeth the Tents and Habitations of Abraham after he departed from Sechem, he useth these words: Afterwards removing thence unto a mountain East-ward from Bethel, he pitched his Tents: leaving Bethel on the West side, and Hai on the East: and afterward in the ninth Verse of the same Chapter it is written; And ABRAHAM went forth journeying towards the South: also when Ezechiel prophesieth of Gog and Magog, he sheweth that these Nations of Togorma were of the North quarters: and of the Queene of Saba it is written, that she came from the South to visit SOLOMON: And the Magi (or wisemen) came out of the East to offer presents unto Christ. And that all Regions, and these traivales were precisely set down upon the points of the Compasse and quarters of the world, it is most manifest: for Eden was due East from Judea; Saba South from Hierusalem: the way from Bethel to Egypt directly South; and the Celocryians, the Tubalines and Magogians inhabited the Regions directly North from Palestina, and so of the rest. But Armenia answereth not to this description of Shinaar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arrive in that Valley of Babylonia, is not a journeying from the East, nor so neer unto the East as the North: for Armenia is to the West of the North it selfe; and we must not say of Moses (whose hands the holy Ghost directed) that he erred toto cælo, and that he knew not East from west. For the body of Armenia standeth in forty three degrees Septentrional, and the North part thereof in forty five; and those Gordian Mountains, whereon it was supposed that the Ark rested, stand in forty one. But Babylonia, and the valley of Shinaar are situated in thirtie five; and for the Longitude (which maketh the difference between East and West) the Gordian Mountaines stand in 75. degrees, and the the valley of Shinaar in 79. and 80. And therefore Armenia lieth from Shinaar North-west, ninety five degrees from the East; and if Armenia had been but North, yet it had differed from the East one whole quarter of the compasse. But Gregory and Hierome warne us, In Scripturis ne minima differentia omitti debet: nam singuli sermones, syllabæ, apices, & puncta in divina Scriptura plena sunt sensibus; In the Scriptures the least difference may not be omitted: for every speech, syllable, note, or accent, and point in divine Scriptures are replenished with their meanings. And therefore seeing Moses teacheth us that the children of Noah came from the East, we may not believe Writers (of little authority) who also speak by hear-say and by report, ut fertur, & ut dicitur, as Berosus and Nicolas Damascenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all adventure. But this is infallibly true, that Shinaar lieth West from the place where the Ark of Noah rested after the flood; and therefore it first found ground in the East, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The East parts were first civil, which had Noah himself for an instructor: and directly East from Shinaar in the same degree of 35. are the greatest grapes, and the best wine. The great Armies also which overtopped in number those millions of Semiramis, prove, that those parts were first planted. And whereas the other opinion hath neither Scripture nor Reason sufficient: for my self I build on his words, who in plain terms hath told us, that the sons of Noah came out of the East into Shinaar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Arke rest on those Eastern mountains, called by one generall name Taurus, and by Moses the mountains of Ararat, and not on those mountains of the North-west, as Berosus first feigned, whom most part of the Writers have followed therein. It was, I say, in the plentiful warm East where Noah rested, where he planted the Vine, where he tilled the ground and lived thereon. *Placuit vero Noacho agricultura studium, in qua tractanda ipse omnium peritissimus esse dicitur: ob eamque rem sua ipsius lingua Ith-Adamath (hoc est) teluris vir appellatur celebratusque est. The study of Husbandry pleased Noah (saith the excellent learned man Arias Montanus) in the knowledge and order of which, it is said that Noah excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his own language a man exercised in the earth. Which also sheweth, that he was no wanderer, and that he troubled not himselfe with the contentions beginning again in the World, and among men, but stayed in his destined places, and in that part of the World where he was first delivered out of the prison of the Arke, whereinto God had committed him, to preserve him and mankind.*

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the Flood; and of the Sonnes of NOAH, SHEM, HAM, and JAPHET, by whom the Earth was re-peopled.

40

§. I.

Whether SHEM and HAM were elder than JAPHET.

OF these Sons of Noah, which was the eldest, there is a question made. S. Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Japhet for the youngest: and herein the opinions of Writers are divers. But this we finde every where in the Scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was never any respect given to the eldest in years, but in virtue; as by the examples of Enoch, Abraham, Jacob, and David, is made manifest. In a few words, this is the ground of the controversy; The Latine translation, and so the Genevea, hath converted this Scripture of Genesis the 10. v. 21. in these words: Unto SHEM also the Father of all the Sonnes of HEBER, and elder brother of JAPHET, were children born. But Junius agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same words in this manner: To SHEM also the Father of all the Sons of HEBER, and brother of JAPHET the eldest Sonne, were children borne: So the transposition of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Japhet, as it is in the vulgar translation placed before it, then had it been as plain for Japhet, as it is by these translations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing Gods blessings are not tyed to first and last in blood bloud, but to the eldest in piety, yet the arguments are stronger for Japhet than for Shem. And where the Scriptures are plainly understood without any danger or inconvenience, it seemeth strange why any man of judgment should make valuation of conjectural arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the five hundredth year of his life, begat the first of his three Sons, Shem, Ham, and Japhet: and in the six hundredth year (to wit) the hundredth year following, came the general flood; two years after which, Shem begat Arphaxad, which was in the year 602. of Noah's life, and in the year of Shem's life one hundred: so as Shem was but 100. years old, two years after the Flood: and Noah begat his first borne being 500. years old, and therefore were Shem the elder, he had then been an hundred years old at the flood, and in the six hundredth year of Noah's life, and not two years after. Which seeing the Scriptures before remembered hath denied him, and that it is also written: Then NOAH awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger sonne had done unto him (to wit) HAM; of necessity the first place doth belong to Japhet. This younger son, so converted by the vulgar and Geneva, Junius turns it filius minimus, His youngest son; but S. Chrysostome takes it other wife, and finds Cham to be the middle or second brother, and Japhet the youngest sonne of all: which Cham for his disobedience and the contempt of his Father (whose nakedness he derided) was disinherited, and lost the preeminence of his birth, as Esau and Ruben did. Pererius conceiveth that Ham was called the younger in respect of Shem the eldest, but avoweth withall, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of younger and youngest, because it wanteth the comparative degree. It is true that Shem himself was always named in the first place, yet whereas in the first verse of the tenth Chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Japhet: in the second verse Moses leaveth to begin with the issue by Shem, and reciteth the children of Japhet first. So the first place was given to Shem for his election and benediction, and for this weighty respect, that the Hebrew Nation, Abraham, the Prophets, David, and Christ our Saviour were descended of him. And therefore, whether we shall follow the vulgar Pagninus, and the Geneva, who agree in this convention, SHEM FRATER JAPHET major; or with the Septuagint, Iovius and Tremelius, SHEM FRATER JAPHET majoris; or with Pererius, SHEM FRATER JAPHET ille magnus: inferring that Shem was the great and famous brother of Japhet, let the Reader judge. But for ought that I have seen to the contrary, it appeareth to me that Japhet was the eldest. For where Pererius qualifieth the strength of the former argument, That Shem's age at the time of the flood did not agree with the eldership (with a supposition that the Scriptures took no account of smaller numbers) I do not finde in the Scriptures any such neglect at all: for it is written, that SHEM was an hundred years old, and begat ARPHAXAD two years after the flood; and again in the 12. verse: So SHELA lived after he begat EBAR, four hundred and three years, &c. so as the number of two years, of three years, of five yeares, and afterward of two yeares, were alwayes precisely accounted.

§. II.

Of divers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the world; as that all Histories must yield to MOSES: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that known great Lords of the first Ages were of the issue of HAM.

BUT let us goe unto the Worlds plantation after the flood, which being rightly understood, we shall finde that many Nations have supposed or feigned themselves those Ancestors and Fathers, which never saw or approached the bounds of their Countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plain in the Scriptures how the sons & issues of Noah were distributed, and what Regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the world was also peopled. And if any prophane Author may receive allowance herein, the same must be with this caution, that they take their beginning where the Scriptures end. For so far as the story of nations is therein handled, we must know, that both the truth & antiquity of the books of God find no companions equal, either in age or authority. All record, memory, & testimony of antiquity whatsoever, which hath come to the knowledge of men, the same hath have bin borrowed thence, & therefore later than it, as all careful observers of time have noted: among which thus writeth Eusebius in the Proem of his Chronology: MOSES is found more ancient than all those whom the Grecians make most ancient, as HOMER, HERODOTUS, and the Trojan Warre; and farre before HERCULES, MUSÆUS, LINUS, CHIRON, ORPHEUS, CASTOR, POLLUX, ÆSCULAPUS, BACCHUS, MERCURIUS, and APOLLO, and the rest of the Gods of the Nations, their Ceremonies, or holy Rites, or Prophets: and before all the deeds of JUPITER, whom the Greeke have seated in the top and highest Turret of their Divinity.

For of the three Jupiters remembered by Cicero, the ancientest was the son of Æther Cicero de Nat. Deorum 13. whose three sons begotten on Proserpina, were borne at Athens, of which Cecrops was the first King: and in the end of Cecrops time did Moses bring the children of Israel out of Egypt: Eduxit MOSES populum Dei ex Egypto novissime tempore CECROPIS Atheniensis Regis: MOSES brought the children of Israel out of Egypt in the last dayes of CECROPIS King of the Athenians, saith S. Augustine: and yet was not Cecrops the Founder of the Citie it self, but Thefeus long after him. But because the truth hereof is diversly proved, and by many learned Authors, I will not cut asunder the purpose in hand, by alledging many authorities in a needlesse question, but leave it to the proper place.

20 The Sons of JAPHET were,

Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Mesbach, and Tirras.	The Sonnes of GOMER were,	Askenaz, Riphab, Togorma,
	The Sonnes of JAVAN were,	Elisba, Tarshis, Kittim, and Dodanim.

First, we are to consider, that the world after the flood was not planted by imagination, neither had the children of Noah wings to fly from Shinaar to the uttermost border of Europe, Africa, and Asia, in haste, but that these children were directed by a wife Father, who knew those parts of the World before the flood, to which he disposed his children after it, and sent them not as discoverers, or at all-adventure, but assigned and allotted to every Son and their issues, their proper parts. And not to hearken to fabulous Authors, who have no other end than to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Augustus in the fiction of Æneas) or else to glorifie their own nations; Let us build herein upon the Scriptures themselves, and after them upon Reason and Nature. First therefore we must call to mind and consider, what manner of face the Earth every where had in the 130. year after the great inundation, and by comparing those fruitfullest Vallies with our own barren and cold ground, inform our selves thereby, what wonderful Desarts, what impassable fastness of woods, reeds, bryars and rotten grasse, what lakes and standing pools, and what marishes, fens, and bogs, all the face of the Earth (excepting the mountains) was pestered withall. For if in this our Climate (where the dead and destroying Winter depresseth all vegetative and growing Nature, for one halfe of the year in effect) yet in twenty or thirty years, these our grounds would all overgrow and be covered (according to the nature thereof) either with woods, or with other offensive thickets and bushments: much more did all sorts of plants, reeds, and trees, prosper in the most fruitful Vallies, and in the Climate of a long and warm Summer, and having withall the start of 130. years to raise themselves without controlement.

This being considered, it will appear, that all these people which came into Shinaar, and over whom Nimrod either by order or strength took the Dominion, did after the confusion of Languages, and at such time as they grew to be a mighty people, disperse themselves into the Regions adjoining to the said Valley of Shinaar, which contained the best part of Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldaea; and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated, some of them towards the South, others towards the West and North. And although there were allotted to Shem many Regions, both East and West from Shinaar, with the Dominion of Palestina, which the Canaanites first possessed; yet could he not enjoy the Lot of his Inheritance upon the sudden, but by time and degrees. For we finde, that Abraham, the true successeur of Shem, dwelt in Chaldea at Ur; and from thence (called by God) he rested at Charyan in Mesopotamia: from whence after the death of Shem he travailed to Sichem in Palestina: and yet there had passed between Shem and Abraham (reckoning neither of themselves) seven Descents, before Abraham moved out of Chaldea; where, and in Babylonia, all those people by Nimrod commanded, inhabited for many years, and whence Nimrod went out into Assyria, and founded Ninive. Indeed the great Masters of Nations (as far as we can know) were, in that Age of the Illuses of Ham; the blessing of God given by Noah to Shem and Japheth taking lesse effect, untill divers years were consumed; and untill the time arrived, which by the wisdom of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan, came the people and Princes, which held the great Kingdoms of Babylonia, 10 Syria, and Egypt for many Descents together.

§. III.

Of the Isles of the Gentiles in JAPHETHS Portion: of BEROSUS his too Speedy Seating GOMER the sonne of JAPHETH in Italy; and another of JAPHETHS Sons TUBAL in Spaine: and of the Antiquity of Longinque Navigation.

TO begin therefore (where Moser beginneth) with the sonnes of Japheth among whom the Isles of the Gentiles were divided: which division, as well to Japheth, 20 sonnes as to the rest which came into Shinaar, was (if the division were made at Phaleg's birth) in the year of the World 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the years after the Flood one hundred and one, of which question elsewhere.

The habitations proper to the sons of Japheth were the Isles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe with all the Islands adjoining, and compassing it about: Europe being also taken for an Island, both in respect that the Sea Hellepont and Egeum, Bosporus and Euxinus cut it off from the great Continent of Asia, as also because Europe it self is (in effect) surrounded with water, saving that it is fastned to the South and South-west, the Ocean to the West, and Brittish, Germane, and Baltick Sea, with that of Glaciale to the 30 North North-east, and North-west. Besides, it hath about it all the Cyclades or Isles lying between Greece and the lesser Asia, and the Isles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Crete, or Candia, Sicilia, Corsica, Sardinia, Malta, the Isles of Brittainie and Zealand, with their young ones adjacent.

This partition and portion of Japheth, with the part which he held in Asia, and the North, which was also very great, answereth to that blessing of God by Noah, Dilatet Deus JAPHETH; Let God spread abroad (or increase the Posterity of) JAPHETH, and let him dwell in the Tents of SHEM. For though Junius here useth the word (alliciat) and not dilatat: and the Geneva persuadeate; yet the Septuagint have dilatat or amplificet, and such was the blessing given to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham 40 and his seed for ever. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was a blessing by God to the Posterity of Japheth: noting not only an enlargement of Territories, but that thereby they should be made participant of Gods Church. But to come to Japheths sonnes, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if we may believe Berosus and Amnius, whose authority the greatest number of all our late Writers have followed) did in the tenth year of Nimrods Reign depart from Babylonia, and planted 50 Italy: which also Functius confirmeth in these words, Anno decimo NIMRODI, &c. In the tenth year of NIMRODS Reigne, GOMERUS GALLUS planted a Colonie in that Land afterward called Italy: and in the twelfth yeare of the same NIMRODS Reigne TUBAL seated himselfe in Austuria in Spaine (now called Biscay) which was in the 140. and 50 in the 142. yeares after the Flood, according to BEROSUS. But this opinion is very ridiculous. For before the confusion of Tongues, the children of Noah did not separate themselves, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinaar. Let us therefore consider with reason, what time the building of such a City & Tower required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any ready means to performe such a work as Nimrod had erected (and as Functius himself out of his Author Berosus witnesseth) ad altitudinem & magnitudinem montium; To the height and magnitude of the mountaines. Sure that both this City and Tower was almost builded, the Scriptures witnesseth: but the Lord came downe to see the Citie and Tower which the Sonnes of men had builded. Let us then but allot a time sufficient for the making of brick to such a Work, or of the greatest height (and therefore of circuit and foundation answerable) that ever was. For where the universall Flood covered the highest Mountains fifteen Cubits; Let us build us a Citie and Tower (saith NIMROD) whose top may reach unto the Heaven: meaning, that they would raise their work above fifteen Cubits higher than the highest Mountaine, otherwise they could not assure themselves from the fear of a second inundation: a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the work. They also began this building upon a ground, the most oppressed with waters of all the world: 10 as by the great ruine which these waters, forcibly over-bearing and over-flowing, made in the time of the succeeding Emperours, is made manifest, approved also by the Prophet Jeremy, speaking of Babylon in these words: Thou that dwellest upon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a substantiall foundation for so high a raised building on a marish ground: and to which, Glycas upon Genesis giveth forty years. For it seemeth, that the Tower was near finished when God overthrew it: it being afterward written, So the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the Earth, and they left to build the City. Out of which place it may be gathered (because the Tower is not then named) that they very near had performed the work of their supposed defence, which was the Tower: and that afterward they went on with the City adjoining, wherein they inhabited. It is also to be noted, that till such time as this confusion seized them 20 (whereupon the Tower was thrown down) these nations did not disperse themselves: for from thence the Lord scattered them upon all the Earth, (that was) when they perceived not one anothers speech. Now to think that this work in the newnesse of the World (wanting all instruments and materials) could be performed in ten years; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same year could creep through 3000. miles of Desert, with Women, Children, and Cattell: Let those light believers, that neither tye themselves to the Scripture, nor to reason, approve it, for I do not. And if the Arke of Noah was 100. years in building, or but near such a time, (and then) when the World had stood 1536. years, it were more than foolishnesse and madnesse it self, to think that such a 30 work as this could be performed in ten; when the World (from the flood to the arrival at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 131. yeares, and whereof they had spent some part in travailing from the East. Again, if all Asia set to their helping hands in the building of the Temple of Diana, and yet they consumed in that Work 400. years (or be it but halfe that time) and in such an Age as when the World flourished in all sorts of Artificers, and with abundant plenty of materials & carriages: This work of the Tower of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants supposed) be erected in those few years remembred. And for conclusion, let all men of judgment weigh with themselves how impossible it was for a nation or family of men, with their Wives, and Children, and Cattell, to travails 3000. miles through Woods, Bogs, and 40 Deserts, without any Guide or Conductor; and we shall finde it rather a work of 100. years than of 100. dayes. For in the West Indies, of which the Spaniards have the experience, in those places where they found neither path nor guide, they have not entred the Country ten miles in ten years. And if Nimrods people spent many yeares by the account before remembred in passing from the East India, or the higher part thereof, which standeth in 115. degrees of Longitude, untill they came into Shinaar, which lyeth in 79. degrees (the distance between those places containing 36. degrees, which makes 720. leagues, which is 2160. miles) and did all the way keep the mountains and hard ground; then the difference between Babylon and Biscay is much more: for the body of Biscay lyeth in ten degrees; and Babylon or Shinaar, (as aforesaid) in 79. so the 50 length of way from Shinaar to Austuria or Biscay is 69. degrees, which make 1380. leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod took divers years to finde Shinaar, which was but 2160. miles: or (supposing that the Ark rested in Armenia) little above 400. miles: there is no cause to the contrary, but to allow as many years to Gomer and Tubal to travails 3000. miles, to Countries less known unto them by far, than the Land of Shinaar was to Nimrod. For Paradise was known to Noah before the Flood: and so was the Region of Eden by Moses afterward remembred; but what he understood of most part of the World else it is unknowne. And therefore did Amnius ill advise himselfe to plant Gomer in Italy, and Tubal in Spaine, in the tenth and twelfth of No- rods

the purpose of his Prophecie, teacheth what Nations they were that should in vanity assayle Israel. He joyneth them together under their Prince Gog, and sheweth that their habitations were on the North quarters of Juda, and how feated and joyned together. Gog signifieth in the Hebrew (saith Saint Hierome) tectum or covering of a house: and Pimius upon Ezechiel affirmeth, that by Gog is meant Antichrist: for (saith he) Antichristus erit Diaboli tegumentum sub specie humana: That Antichrist shall be the covering of the Devil under humane forme. He addeth, that Magog is as much to say as Gog: the Letter (M) being an Hebrew Preposition, and importeth as much as of, or, from: so he taketh Magog for those people which follow Antichrist. So far Pimius; at least in this not amiss, that he expoundeth Magog not for any one person, but for a Nation: with which agree-eth this observation of Beroaldus, Magog (saith he) in Hebrew is written Ham-Magog, which sheweth Magog to be a Region or Nation: for the Letter (He) which is used but for an Emphasis (which the Hebrewes call Hetiajedia) is never added to proper names of men, but often to place. So as Gog was Prince of that Nation (called either Magog, or, according to others, the people of Gog) also Prince of Meshech, (or Mosoch) and of Tubal: as by the first Verse of the 29 Chapter is made manifest: Behold I come against thee Gog the chiefe Prince of MESHECH and TUBAL. This must needs be meant by the Successors of Seleucus Nicator, who did not (as other conquering Nations) seeke to make the Jewes their Tributaries only, but indevoured by all means, and by all kinde of violence to extinguish the Religion it selfe (which the Hebrewes profest) and the acknowledging of one true God: and to force them to worship and serve the mortall and rotten gods of the Heathen: of which nothing remained but the very name, and dead Images. Saint Ambrose and Isidore take Gog for the Nation of the Goths: belike, because they invaded Europe, and sacked Rome, and many other places and Cities thereof. Hermolaus Barbarus out of Pomp. Mela drives the Turkes from the Scythians, esteemed Magogians of Gog. Many take Gog for the proper name of a Man: others of a Region: others for a Nation inhabiting a Region, as Junius, who sayes that Gog is the name of a Nation, denominated from him whom the Greekes Stories call Gyges: who in former time having slaine Candaules the Lydian, gave his owne name to that Nation, thence after called Gygades: and thereof also the Cygean Lake; which Lake Strabo also findeth in Lydia, (of which Gyges was King) fortie Furlongs from Sardinia. Plinie calleth it Gygenum lagnum. Hierodotus and Nicator set it about the Rivers of Hillur, and Manderamus; but the difference is not great. Marinus Niger maketh mention of this Gyges King of Lydia: who after he had subdued the Countrey about the River Rhodium which runneth into the Hellepont, called the Promontorie Trapeze after his owne name Gyges. These Opinions doe also seeme to strengthen that of Junius. For Magog, saith he, is that part of Asia the lesse, which Halyattes obtained, and after him his Son Cresus; who (as Junius further notes) having mastered all those Regions as farre South as Libanus, in that Border built the Citie Gigarta or Gogkarta (which in the Syrian signifieth the Citie of Gog) seated in Celofyria, whose people were the ancient Enemies of the Jewes.

Now that Magog is found in Celofyria, Plinie affirmeth, saying; Celofyria habet Bambycen, quae alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur: Syris vero, Magog; Celofyria habet in it Bambycen, which by another name is called Hierapolis, but of the Syrians, Magog. He further telleth us that the monstrous Idoll Atergatis, called by the Greekes Derceto, was here worshipped. Lucian makes mention hereof, saying, that the Citie had anciently another name, which he yet expresseth not; forbearing perhaps the word Magog, as founding nothing elegantly in the Greeke. But if we may beleve Strabo, then was Edessa in Mesopotamia the same Bambyce or Hierapolis, where the same Idoll was worshipped. Ortelius is doubtfull whether one of these Authors did not mistake the place of this Bambyce or Hierapolis. So It may well enough be, that the same name and Religion was common to them both. Certaine it is, that both of them lay due North from Palestina, and were both subject unto the Kings of the Race of Seleucus. Now I do not condemne the Opinion of Hermolaus Barbarus following Josephus, but grant that perhaps Magog might also be the Father of the Scythians; notwithstanding that in this place, where Gog is made the Prince of Magog, the Nations of Celofyria, and the North parts adjoining be meant by Magog: for by a latter Plantation from these parts they might bee propagated into Scythia. Yet it is not to be denied, that the Scythians in old times coming out of the North-east wasted the better part of Asia the lesse, and posselt Celofyria, where they built both Scythopolis and Hierapolis, which the Syrians call Magog. And that to this Magog Ezechiel had reference, it is very plain: for this Citie Hierapolis or Magog standeth due North from Judea, according to the words of Ezechiel, that from the North quarters those Nations should come. For as the Kings of the South which infested the Israelites were the Pholomies, Kings of Egypt: so those of the North were the Kings of Asia and Syria, the Successors of Seleucus, the Successors of Alexander Macedon. Gulielmus Tyrim thinks that this Hierapolis is that Rager, mentioned in the Storie of Tobias. Plinie takes it not only to have been called Bambyce, as we have said, but also Edessa: not that by Euphrates; but another of the same name: now the known name is Alippo: for so Belonius expounds this Hierapolis, or Magog. This Citie had the Title of Sacred, as the Sacred Citie, (for so the word Hierapolis signifieth) yet was it a place of most detested Idolatry, and wherein was worshipped the Idoll of the Mermayde Atergatis, or Atergatis, according to Plinie, which the Greekes call Derceto. If then we confer the words of Ezechiel in the third verse of the thirty eight Chapter, wherein he joyneth together Gog, Meshech and Tubal; and withal remember that Hierapolis was the Citie of Magog, which also is seated directly North from Judea: with whom also Ezechiel coupleth Gomer, and all his bands of the North quarters; we may (as I conceive) safely conclude, that these Followers and Vassals of Gog (which were Northern Nations in respect of Judea) were not the Gomerians of France, nor the Tubalines of Spain, but a people of the lesser Asia, and Celofyria: and therefore that the opinions of Berosus, Josephus, and whosoever else hath followed them therein, are to be rejected. But if Josephus refer himself to later times, and think that some Colonie of the Tubalines might from Iberia and Asia passe into Spain (to wit) from that piece of Land between Colchis (or Mengrelia) and Albania (most part posselt by the Georgians) then is his judgement of better allowance. For without any repugnancy of opinions, it may be granted, that in process of time these people might from their first habitation, pass into the Countreies neer the Euxine Sea, and from thence in after-Ages into Spain.

Josephus makes mention of the Iberi, saying, that they were anciently called Tubelors, as of tubal; from whence (saith Iustine) they passed into Spain to search out the mines of that Region: having belike understood that it was a Southerly Countrey, and Mountainous. For it seemeth that the Tubalines called Chalybes lived altogether by the exchange of Iron, and other Metals, as Apollonius witnesseth in these following Verses, telling how the Argonautes did visit them:

*Hæc gens tellurem rigida non vertit aratro,
Sed ferri venas scindit sub montibus altis:
Mercibus hæc mutat, quæ vitæ alimenta ministrant.*

The Chalybes plough not their barren soyle,
But undermine high Hills for Iron Veins:
Changing the purchase of their endless toyle
For Merchandize, which their poor lives sustains.

But it is more probable, that Spain was first peopled by the Africans, who had ever since an affection to return thither, and to re-people it anew. This appeared by the Carthaginians of old, who were easily drawn to pass over the Straights into that Countrey: and after by the Moors who held Granado, and the South parts eight hundred yeers, till the time of Ferdinand and Isabel. And either of these opinions are more probable, so than that in the twelfth yeere of Nimrods Reigne, Tubal past into Spain, and therein built Saint Uval: a poor Town, and a poor device, God knows. Certain it is, that we must finde Mosoch or Meshech, and Tubal Neighbours, and Gomer and Togarma not far off, or else we shall wrong Ezechiel: for he called Gog the Leader or Prince of Meshech and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togarma their assistants. And that Meshech inhabited Asia, Functius (though he followed Berosus) confesseth, for these be his words: MESACUS, qui à MOSE MESECH, priuscos Mesos ab Adula monte usque ad Ponticam regionem posuit: hæc regio postea Cappadocia dicta est, in qua urbs Mazæca, &c. hæc est terra MAGOG principalis; MESACUS, whom MOSES calleth MESECH, placed the ancient

Mesians

Mesians from the Mount Adulas, unto the Coasts of Pontus. This Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Towne Mazica, &c. this is the principall Countrey of MAGOG. And this doth Annus also avow, and yet forgets that Gog was Prince both of Mesech and Tubal: and therefore that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous: Spain lying directly West, & not North from Indea. Also Ezechiel in the 27. Chapter, where he prophesieth of the destruction of Tyre, nameth Mesech and Tubal joyntly. And for a finall prooffe, that these Nations were of a Northern Neighbour Land (how far soever stretched) Ezechiel in the 38. Chapter makes them all Horlemen. Thou, and much people with thee, all shall ride upon Horses, even a great multitude and a mightie. Then if any man believe that these troups came out of Spain over the Pyrenes, and first passed over a part of France, Italie, Hungarie, and Sarmatia, and imbarqued againe about the Hellespont, or else compassed all Pontus, and Euxinus, to come into the lesser Asia, which is halfe the length or compasse of the then known World; he may be called a strong beleever, but he shall never be justified thereby. But on the contrary, it is knowne, that Seleucus was a Province neighbouring Palestina or Indea, and that Hierapolis (or Mageg) joyned unto it: whose Princes commanded all Syria, and Asia the lesse, (namely the Selencida) and held it, till Scipio Asiaticus overthrow Antiochus the Great: after which they yet posselt Syria till the time of Tigranes: and whether Meshech be in Cappadocia, or under Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the same Dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be said. First, he seated himselfe with Togorma, not far from Magog and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward he proceeded further into Asa the lesse; and in long tract of time his valiant Issue filled all Germania, relict long in France and Brittanie, and possessed the utmost borders of the earth, accomplishing (as Melancthon well notes) the signification of their parents name, which is Vimost bordering. But when these borderers wanted further place, wherein they might exonerate their swelling multitudes that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they returne upon the Nations occupying the Countries, through which they had formerly passed, oppressing first their Neighbours, afterwards the people more remote. Hereupon it was (as the worthy restorer of our Antiquities M. William Camden hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their old Language doth signifie Robbers; necessity enforcing them to spoyle their Neighbours, to whom in their original they were as neere joyned, as afterwards in the feates which they possessed. For that the Warlike nations of Germany were in elder Ages accustomed to be beaten by the Gauls, the authoritie of Caesar affirming it, is prooffe sufficient. But in times following they persued richer Conquests, and more easie though further distant, by which (to omit their other enterprises not here to be spoken of) they were drawne at length into Asa the lesse, and occupied those parts, which had formerly bene held by their Progenitors. I say not that they claymed those Lands as theirs by Descent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their owne Pedigree. Neyther can any man therefore deny, that they were of old seated in Asa, because in late Ages they returned thither; unless he will think, that all those Nations which from far parts have invaded and conquered the Land of Shinaar, may by that Argument be proved not to have issued from thence at the first.

Now concerning Samothers, for his excellent wisdom firnamed Dir, whom Annus makes the Brother of Gomer and Tubal (which Brother, Moses never heard of, who spake his knowledge of Japhets sons) they must finde him in some old Poet: for Fenestius, a great Berosian, confesseth: Quis hic Samoths fuerit incertum est; who this Samoths was, it is uncertain; neither is there any proof that he was that same Dir, whom Caesar saith the Gauls suppose to be their Ancestor; yea, and Vignier confelleth with Fenestius: Mays on ne sçait qui il estoit; No man knows who he was.

§. V.

Against the fabulous Berosus his fiction, That the Italian Janus was Noah.

BUT before I go on with Noah his Sonnes, I thinke it is necessarie to disprove the fiction which Annus hath of Noah himselfe; an invention (indeed) very ridiculous, though warranted (as hee hath wrested) by those Authors of whom himselfe hath Commented: as the Fragment of Berosus, Fabius, Pictor, Cato, Lavinius and others. For Annus seeks to persuade us, that Noah (surnamed Janus) was the same which founded Genoa, with other Cities in Italie, wherein he lived 92. yeeres. This to disprove, by Moses silence, is a sufficient argument to me, if there were nothing else to disprove it. For if he vouchsafed to remember the building of Babel, Erec, Achad, Chalne and Nineve by Nimrod, Noah was a man of too great make to be forgotten, with all the acts hee did in 92. yeeres. But it were a needlesse labour for me to disprove the authoritie of that Berosus, on whom Annus groundeth, seeing so many learned men have so demonstratively proved that Fragment to be counterfeited. Besides that, Tassianus the Assyrian, in his Oracion against the Greekes, avoweth, that the ancient and true Berosus wrote onely three Bookes, dedicated to Antiochus the successor of Seleucus Nicator: but Annus hath devised five Bookes, wherewith he honoureth Berosus. And whereas Berosus handled onely the estate of the Chaldeans and Assyrians, Annus hath filled this Fragment with the businesse of all the World. And if we may believe Eusebius better than Annus, then all the Kings of the Latines (before Erec) consumed but 150. yeeres: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Eneas arrivall into Italy there past 1126. (after the least rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codoman) 1291. For Janus (who was the first of their Kings) lived at once with Ruth, who married Boaz in the worlds yeare (as some reckon) 2717. after the Flood 1064. and Noah dyed 350. yeeres after the Flood: and so there past betwene Janus of Italie and Noah surnamed Janus 704. yeeres. For Saturnus succeeded Janus, Picus after Saturnus, Fannus after Picus, and Latinus followed Fannus: which Latinus lived at once with Tautanes the 27. King of Assyria; with Pelasgus of Peloponnesus; with Demophoon of Athens; and Sampson Judge of Israel. Now all these five Kings of the Latines having consumed but one hundred and fiftie yeeres, and the last of them in the time of Sampson: then reckoning upwards for one hundred and fiftie yeeres, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Janus lived.

True it is, that the Greekes had their Janus; but this was not Noah: so had they Ion the son of Xuthus, the son of Deucalion, from whom they draw the Iones, who were indeed the children of Lavan, the fourth son of Japheth. For the vulgar Translation (where the Hebrew word is Lavan) writes Greece, and the Septuagint, Hellas; which is the same. So had they Medus the son of Mada, whom they make the Parent of the Medes though they were descended of a farre more ancient Father, (to wit) Madai the third son of Japheth.

Lastly, we see by a true experience, that the British Language hath remained among us above 2000. yeeres, and the English speech ever since the invasion of the Angles, and the same continuance have all Nations observed among themselves, though with some corruption and alteration. Therefore it is strange if either Noah (by them called Janus) had left in Italie his Grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spaine, that no plaine resemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Scythian (which no time could have quite extinguished) should have bene found in the Languages of those Countries. For which reasons we doubt not but these personall Plantations of Janus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. in Italie, Spaine, or France, are merely fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themselves with the Grecian Janus which commanded them and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Troy but 150. yeeres (saith Eusebius) which was in the time of Latinus, the fift King: which also Saint Augustine and Iustine confirme: and this agreeth with reason, time, and possibilitie. And if this be not sufficient to disprove this vanity, I may out of themselves adde thus much: That whereas some of them make Vesta (others Camasena) the wife of this Janus, who instituted the holy Fire of the Vestal Virgins in Rome (the Latines and Romans taking from Janus all their Idolatrous and Heathenish Ceremonies) there is no man so impious, as to beleve that Noah himselfe (who is said by Moses to have walked with God, to be a just man, and whom God of all Mankind made choice of) could be either ignorant of the true and only God, or so wicked and ungratefull, to set up or devise any Heathen, Salvage, or Idolatrous adoration, or have instituted any Ceremonie, contrary to that which he knew best pleasing to God himselfe.

Lib. 18. de Civ.
Dei. c. 10.

Babylonia into Greece, but tooke Asa the lesse in his passage; and from thence past over the neereest way, leaving his own name to some maritime Province on that side, as he did to that part of Greece to be called. But yet Strabo himself beleeveth, that Ionia tooke the name from Ion the son of Xanthus: for so much he had learned from themselves; which was also the opinion of Pausanias. True it is, that the Greekes in after-times cast themselves into that part of Asia the lesse, opposite unto them, which they held for divers yeeres. And howsoever the Greekes vaunt themselves to be Fathers of Nations, and the most ancient; yet all approved Historians (not their owne) deride and disprove their pride, and vanity therein. For this dispute of Antiquity (among prophane Writers) is belsted between the Scythians and the Egyptians, as Isidore out of Trogus, in the warre between Vexors of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia, witnesseth: which preceded farre the reign of Ninus, and was long before the name of Greece was ever heard of. And it is also manifest, that in Cecrops time the Greekes were all salvages, without law or religion, living like brute beasts in all respects: and Cecrops (saith Saint Ansgilme) lived together with Moses.

Psal. 120. v. 5.

The sixth son of Iapheth was Meshech, whom the Septuagint call Mosech: (a part of those Nations commanded by Gog the chiefe Prince of Meshech and Tubal.) But this we must remember, that betweene Meshech the son of Aram, and Meshech (or Mosech) the son of Iapheth, there is little difference in name, and both by divers Interpreters diversly written. Montanus with the Vulgar writeth Meshech, the son of Aram, Met; the Geneva, Mash; Iunius, Mesch. But it may be gathered out of the 120. Psalm: that either Meshech the son of Iapheth, was the parent of those people, or gave the name to that Province wherein David hid himselfe: or else (which may rather seeme) that it tooke name from Meshech the son of Aram. For David bewailing his exile (while he lived among a barbarous and irreligious People) useth these words: Woe is me that I remaine in Meshech, and dwell in the Tents of Kedar: which Iunius converteth thus: Hei mihi quia peregrinor in diu: habito tanquam Scenita Kedareni. The Septuagint gives it this sense: Woe is me because my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the inhabitants of Kedar: with which this of the Latine agreeth; Heu mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus est, habitavi cum habitantibus Kedari. The Chaldean otherwise, and in these words: O me miserum, quia peregrinatus sum Assaniz, habitavi cum tabernaculis Arabum; O writeth, that I am, for I have travailed among those of Asia: I have dwelt in the Tabernacles of the Arabians. But howsoever or which soever conversion be taken for the best, yet all make mention of Kedar: which is a Province of Arabia Petraea; and the Chaldean putteth Assa in stead of Meshech, which is a Province of Arabia it selfe hath Meshech. And if it be to be taken for a Nation, (as it is most likely, because it answers to Kedar, the name of a Nation) seeing Meshech the son of Aram, 1 Chron. 17. is called Meshech, it is indifferent whether this Nation took name from Meshech or Meth, both bordering Judea, and Tubal. But as for those that take Meshech out of the word Mosech (given by the Septuagint) to be the Muscovian: sure they presume much upon the affinity of names, as aforesaid. Sure I am, that David never travelled so far North; (to him Muscovia was utterly unknown) but about the border of Kedar (it may be) was often in all the time of his persecution: the same being a city on the mountains of Sinir or Galaad. And yet Arias Montanus makes Mosech the Father of the Muscovians; and here, in also Melanchton runs with the tide of common opinion, and sets Meshech in Muscovia, though with some better advice of judgment; as, first seated in Cappadocia, and from thence travelling Northward: expounding the places of the 120. Psalm, (Hei mihi quid exilo in Meshech) to signifie, Gentis ejus feritatem in seipsum esse; That the ferity of that Nation exceeded: which fiercenes or brutality of the Muscovians, David never proved, or (perchance) never heard of. But the same ferity or cruelty which those Northern Muscovians had, may as well be ascribed to the Arabians and Kedarens. For this Country tooke name of Kedar the second sonne of Ismael, of whom a people of equall fiercenes to any of the world were begotten, both in those times and long after, even to this day (if the Arabians, Ismaelites, and Saracens, may be accounted one people): the same being foretold by the speech of the Angell to Hagar, Gen. 16. v. 12. And he shall be a wilde man: his hand shall be against every man, and every mans hand against him. Now Arabia the Desert (saith Pliny) confronteth the Arabians Cochlei on the East, and the Cedrai Southward, both which joyne together upon the Nabathai. So it appeareth as before before) that Meshech, Tubal, Gomer, Togarma, and Magog, neighboured Canaan and Israel, and that Kedar also did joyn to Meshech: all which were Regions of Syria, or of Asia the lesse, commanded by the succellours of Selencus, enemies of the re-establisment of Israel and Juda. But (as I have already said) it might well be, that long after the first plantation of Meshech (or Mosech) might pass into Cappadocia, and thence into Hyrcania, and give names, both to Mazega in the one, and to the mountains Moschici in the other, and from thence might send people more northerly into Muscovia, and so all opinions saved. But all salvage nations over-grown & uncultivated, do (for the most part) shew a late plantation, even as civility, letters, and magnificent building, witnesseth antiquity.

10 Tyrus, the seventh son of Iapheth, which Montanus reckons among the sons of Gomer, Mami in Cir, was the Father of the Thracians, as all Authors (worthy the examination) affirm. Josephus was the first that determined hereof: and because the Scriptures are altogether silent, what part of the world Tyrus peopled, the conjectures are indifferent, and give no ground at all of dispute. It followeth now to speak of the Sonnes of Gomer, which were three, of Ascanes and Riphat, the two elder Sonnes of Gomer.

Ascanes, Riphat, and Togorma.

§ VIII.

20 Ascanes was the Father of those which the Greeks call Regini, (saith Josephus) but he gives no reason why.

Ensebinus makes Ascanes the Father of the Goths. The Jewes in their Targum make him the root of the Germane Nation; but their expostions are commonly very idle. Pliny findeth Ascania in Phrygia, near the Rivers of Hilias and Cios: Melanchton being of the same opinion, that the Tuiscones were descended of the Ascanes: (for Tuiscones, saith he, is as much to say, as of the Ascanes, proprio articulo die Ascanes) and that the word signifieth a Religious Keeper of fire: it being an ancient superstition to pray at the fire of Sacrifices, as afterwards at the Tombs of Martyrs. Not far from Phrygia was the lake Ascania, known by that name in the Romanes time. And among the Kings which came to the succour of Troy, was Ascanius (Deo similis, saith Homer) like unto God: because he was beautifull and strong: for in the same manner doth Virgil grace Aeneas, Os humerosq; Deo similis: in face and body like one of the gods: Virgil also remembreth such a River, together with the Hills Gargara: as, Illos ducit amor trans Gargara, transq; sonantem Ascanium: Appetite leads them both over the mountains Gargara, & the roaring Ascanius. But this Pliny maketh more plain in the description of Phrygia. For he placeth the City of Brillion upon the River Ascanius, which is adjoining to Myfia, and is near the border of the Trojan Empire: and the lake Ascanes he directs us to finde by the description of Prussa, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lyeth far within the Countries of Bithynia: and then from Prussa to Nicea are accounted 25. miles, in which way this lake lieth, even between Prussa and Nicea. And so Iunius (as I conceive him) takes them of Ascanes, to be the inhabitants of Pontus and Bithynia, and those North parts of Asia. Stephanus de Urbibus makes it a City of Troas, built by Ascanius the son of Aeneas: saying, that there was another of that name in Myfia. Of Ascania a lake of Bithynia, Ptolemy witnesseth: and Strabo giveth Ascania both a Lake, a River, and a Town in Myfia, neer unto Cios; which also agreeth with Pliny. For Pliny findeth Prussa (before spoken of) near Cio, and calleth the Islands before Troy, Ascanes.

Now, whether these places took name of Ascanes, the son of Gomer, or of Ascanius the son of Aeneas, it might be questioned: sure it is, that Ascanius which brought succour to the Trojans, could not take his name from Aeneas sonne, who was then either exceeding young, or rather unborn: and it seemeth that the Countries whence those succours came, were not out of any part of Phrygia or Myfia, but farther off, and from the North parts of all Asia the lesse, which by Hieremy is called Ascanes, by the figure Synecdoche, as Iunius thinketh. Out of those testimonies therefore which deceive not, we may confidently determine. For of the Prophet Hieremy wee shall learne of what Nation the Ascanes were, whose words are these: Set up a Standard in the Land, blow the trumpet among the Nations against her, call up the Kings of Ararat, Minni, and Ascanes, against the son of Philip, went forth of the Land of Cethim, and slew Darius King of the Persians, and Medes. Josephus sets Cethim in the Isle of Cyprus, in which (saith he) there remaineth the City Citium, the Countie of Zeno the Philosopher (witnesseth Laertius) which City Pin-tur upon Ezechiel affirmeth, that it stood in S. Hieromes time. So it may be that all the Islands in ancient times by the Hebrews were called the Islands of Cethim: and in that sense might Cyprus be so called also; and yet because Tharsis was the very next Port to Cyprus, and directly over against it, it is also very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharsis: and finding that Island too straight for his people after they were increased, and that the rest of the Coasts, both on Asia side and Greece, were inhabited by his father and brothers, he sent Colonies over the Aegean Sea, & inhabited Macedonia, 10

Dodanim the fourth son of Javan, and the youngest brother (by the most opinions) fate down at Rhodes, as near Cethim, Tharsis, and Elisa, as he could. For Dodanim and Rhodanim are used indifferently by many Translators: the Hebrew (D) and the Hebrew (R) are so like, as the one may easily be taken for the other, as all Hebricians affirm. There is also found in Epirus the City of Dodona, in the Province of Molossia. And as Cethim, when he wanted soile in Cyprus: so Dodanim (seated in a far less Island) did of necessity send his people farther off, and keeping alongst the Coast, and finding Peloponnesus in the possession of Elisa, he passed a little further on the Westward, and planted in Epirus. And though the City of Dodona was not then built, or (perchance not so ancient as Dodanim himself, yet his Posterity might give it that name in the memory of 20 their first Parent, as it happened all the World over. For names were given to Cities, Mountains, Rivers, and Provinces, after the names of Noahs children and grand-children; not in all places by themselves, but by their successors many years after: every of their Families being desirous to retain among them by those memories, out of what branch themselves were taken and grafted elsewhere. And because great Kingdoms were often by new Conquerours newly named, and the greatest Cities often fired and demolished, therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gave their own names, or the names of their Ancestours, to Mountains and Rivers, as to things (after their judgments) free from any alteration.

Thus then did Javan settle himself and his children in the edge and frontier of Asia 30 the less, towards the Sea-shore: and afterward in Greece, and the Islands and neighbour Provinces thereof, as Japheth their Father had done in the body of the lesser Asia, together with Javans brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Metsch, and the rest round about him. And in like sort did Chus (the son of Cham) people Babylonia, Chaldea, and the borders thereof towards the West and South-west: and the sons of Chus (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it self) travailed Southward in Arabia felix, & South-westward into Arabia Petrea: the rest of his children holding the Regions adjoining to Nimrod. Mizraim the brother of Chus in like manner took the way of Egypt: and his brother Canaan the Region of Palestina adjoining. The sons of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all those Nations came, which were afterward the Enemies 40 both to the Hebrews, and to those of the sons of Shem, which spread themselves towards the West, and the borders of the Mediterran Sea: of which I shall speak hereafter. But first of the sons of Cham or Hams, which were four:

Chus, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan.

§. X.

That the seat of Chus the eldest son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill Translations of Scripture, grounded on the mistaking of this point. 50

||. I.

Of Josephus his Tale of an Ethiopesse wife of Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seat of Chus.

That Ham was the Father of the Egyptians, it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 105. Psalm, verse 23. Then Israel came to Egypt, and Jacob was a stranger in the Land of Ham: and in the 78. Psalm, Hee slew all the first-borne in Egypt, even the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of Ham. There is also also found a great City in Thebaida, called Oheramis: (as it were the City of Ham) of which name Herodotus also discovers an Island in the same Region. But because Chus Herod. in En- 107p. is the elder son of Ham, it agreeth with order to speak first of him. Now though I have already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) proved that Chus could not be Ethiopia: yet seeing it cometh now to his turn to speak for himself, I will adde some farther proof to the former. For, the manifestation hereof lets many things straight, which had otherwise very crooked contructions, and senseless interpretations. Surely, howsoever the Septuagint and Josephus have herein failed, that Chus could not be Ethiopia, but Arabia: (to wit) both that Arabia called Petrea, and a 10 part of Arabia the Happy and the Desert: which Regions Chus and the Chusites presently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they first fate down all together. And there is nothing which so well cleareth this Controversie, as the true interpretation of the place, Num. 12. v. 1. where Moses his Wife is called a Chusite; together with some places which speak of Nabuchodonosors Conquests. For whereas Josephus and the Septuagint in the place Num. 12. v. 1. as also elsewhere, understand Chus for Ethiopia, we must give credit to Moses himself herein; and then it will appear that Josephus was grossly mistaken, or vainly led by his own invention. For Josephus presuming that Chus was Ethiopia, and therefore that the wife of Moses (which in Scripture, Num. 12. v. 1. is called a woman of Chus) was a woman of the land of Ethiopia, feigneth 20 that Tharbis the Daughter of the King of Ethiopia, fell in love with the person and fame of Moses, while he besieged Saba her Father's City; and to the end, to obtain Moses for her Husband, she practised to betray both her Parents, Country, and Friends, with the City it self, and to deliver it into Moses hands: The Tale (if it be worth the reciting) lieth thus in Josephus. After he hath described the strength of the Ethiopian City Meroe, which he saith at length Chambyses called so from the name of his Sister, (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these words: Hic cum Moses desiderare exercitum otiosum egre ferret, hoste non audente manus confere, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Ethio- 30 pum Regi filia nomine Tharbis, &c. which tale hath this sense in English: When Moses was grieved that his Army lay idle, because the Enemy besieged durst not sally and come to battle, he made means to send unto him by one of her trustiest servants, to offer her self unto him, and become his Wife; Which Moses on this condition entertained, that she should first deliver the City into his possession; whereunto she condescending, and Moses having taken oath to perform this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

||. II.

A dispute against the tale of Josephus.

This Tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Josephus fashioned; and therein also utterly mistaken himself, in naming a City of Arabia for a City of Ethiopia: as he names Ethiopia it self to have been the Country of Moses his Wife, when (indeed) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Ethiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and modern, teach us, saying, that the Sabeans are Arabians, and not Ethiopians; except Josephus can persuade us, that the Queen of Saba which came from the South to hear the wisdom of Solomon, were a Negro, or Black-moor. And though 50 Damianus à Goes speak of certain Letters to the King of Portugal from Presler John, of the Abissines: wherein that Ethiopian King would persuade the Portugals, that he was descended of the Queen of Saba and of Solomon; yet it doth no where appeare in the Scriptures, that Solomon had any Son by that great Princess: which had it bin true, it is likely that when Sisac King of Egypt invaded Roboam, and sackt Hierusalem his Brother (the Son of Saba and Solomon) who joyned upon Egypt, would both have impeached that enterprise, as also given aid and succour to Roboam against Sisac, who drew from him ten of the twelve Tribes to his own obedience. Neither is it any thing against our opinion of Moses his Wife, to have bin an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach us, that Moses married the daughter of Jethro Priest of Midian or Adrian: which standing on the North Coast of the Red Sea, over against the body of Egypt, and neer Eston, where Solomon provided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Edumæa joyneeth to the Tribe of Juda by the North, to Arabia Petraea by the East, to the Mediterranean by the West, and to the Red Sea by the South-east. And if we mark the way which Moses took when he left Egypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appear that he was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it self, he had formerly lived forty years; where it seemeth, that besides his careful bringing up in Egypt, he was instructed by Jethro in the Egyptians learning. For Iosephus confesseth, and Saint Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. But on the other side, this Text makes much against Iosephus, where it is written in Exod. the second, Therefore Moses fled from Pharao, and dwelt in the Land of Madian or Midian, and not in Ethiopia. And in the third Chapter it is as plain as words can express, in what Region Madian was, where it is written, When Moses kept the sheep of Jethro his Father in Law Priest of Madian, and drove the Flock to the Desert, and came to the mountain of God in Horeb. Now that Mount Horeb is not in Ethiopia, every Infant knoweth. And if we may believe Moses himself, then was not the Wife of Moses purchased in that manner which Iosephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Countrey and friends) neither had she the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was she a Negro, but a Madianite. And as God worketh the greatest things by the simplest means: so it pleased him from a Shepherd to call Moses, and after him David, and by them to deliver his people first and last. For Moses, sitting by a Well (as disconsolate and a stranger) defended the daughters of Reuel from the other Shepherds, and drew them Water to water their Sheep: upon which occasion (by God ordained) he was entertained by Jethro, whose daughter he married, and not for any betraying of Townes or Countries.

From hence also came Jethro to Moses at Rephidim, not far from Idumæa, and finding the insupportable government of such a multitude, he advised him to distribute this weighty charge, and to make Governours and Judges of every Tribe and Family. And so if Jethro had been an Ethiopian, it had beene a farre progress for him to have passed through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moses, and to have found Moses in the border of Idumæa: the Egyptians hating Moses and all that favoured him. But the passing of Moses through Arabia Petraea (which joyneeth to Madian) proveth that Moses was well acquainted in those parts, in which the second time he wandered forty years, and did by these late travails of his, seek to instruct the children of Israel in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the Land of plenty and rest. For he found them nourished up with the milk of Idolatry, and obstinate in the Religion of the Heathen, and finding that those stiff plants could not be bowed or declined, either by persuasion or by miracle, he ware them out in the Deserts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from thofe he might receive fruit, agreeable to his own desire, and Gods Commandments.

Lastly, this opinion of Iosephus is condemned by Augustinus Chrysamenis, where also he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who avowed that Moses had married both Tharbis and Sippora: His own words have this beginning: Mentitur etiam Apollinaris duas uxores habuisse Moses, &c. Apollinaris also lyeth, in affirming that Moses had two wives: and who doth not perceive these things feigned by them? for it is manifest that the Wife of Moses was Zephora, Daughter to the Priest or President of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Ethiopia beyond Egypt; being the same that joyneeth to Arabia: So far Chrysamenis.

||. III.

Chus ill expounded for Ethiopia. Ezech. 29. 10.

Now as Chus is by the Septuagint converted Ethiopia, and the wife of Moses therefore called Ethiopia, also in the conquest of Nebuchodonosor is Ethiopia written for Arabia. For by the words of Ezechiel, it is manifest that Nebuchodonosor was never in Ethiopia. Behold (saith Ezechiel, speaking of the person of this great Assyrian) I came upon upon thee and upon thy Rivers, and I will make the Land of Egypt utterly waste and desolate, from the Tower of Seveneh, even to the borders of the blacke-Moore: which last words should have beene thus converted: From the Tower Seveneh to the borders of the Chusites or Arabians betweene which two is situated all Egypt. For to say, from the borders of Seveneh to the Ethiopians, hath no sense at all, Seveneh it selfe being the border of Egypt, confronting and joyning to Ethiopia, or the Land of the blacke-Moore. So as if Nabuchodonosor conquest had beene but betweene Seveneh and the border of Ethiopia, it were as much to say, and did expresse no other victory than the conquest of all that Land and Countrey, lying betweene Middlesex and Buckingham, where both the Counties joyne together, or all the North parts of England betweene Barwick and Scotland: for this hath the same sense with the former, if any man sought to expresse by these two bounds, the Conquest of England: Barwick being the North border of England, as Seveneh or Syena is the South bound of Egypt, seated in Thebaida, which toucheth Ethiopia. But by the words of Ezechiel it appeareth, that Nabuchodonosor never entered into any part of Ethiopia, although the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneva, and all other (in effect) have written Ethiopia for Chus.

||. IV.

Another place of Ezechiel, cap. 30. vers. 9. in the like manner mistaken.

And as the former, so is this place of Ezechiel mistaken, by being in this sort converted: In die illa egredientur nuntii a facie mea in trieribus ad conterendam Ethiopia confidentiam: Which place is thus turned in English by the Genevans: In that day shall there Messengers goe forth from me in ships to make the carelesse Moores afraid. Now the Latine for (ships) hath the Greeke word Trieres for Triremes, which are Gallies of three bankes, and not ships. But that in this place the Translation should have been (as in the former) amended by using the word Chus or Arabia for Ethiopia or the black-Moore, every man may see which meanly understandeth the Geography of the world, knowing that to passe out of Egypt into Ethiopia there need no Gallies or Ships, no more than to passe out of Northampton into Leicestershire: Ethiopia being the conteminate Region with Egypt, and not divided so much as by a River. Therefore in this place of Ezechiel it was meant, that from Egypt, Nabuchodonosor should send Gallies alongst the coast of the Red Sea, by which an Army might be transported into Arabia the Happy and the Stony (sparing the long wearisome march over all Egypt, and the Desert of Pharan) which Army might thereby surpriseth them unawares in their security and confidence. For when Nabuchodonosor was at Seveneh within a mile of Ethiopia, he needed neither Gallies nor Ship to passe into it; being all one large and firme Land with Egypt, and no otherwise parted from it, than one In-land shire is parted from another: and if he had a fancy to have rowed up the River but for pleasure, he could not have done it: for the fall of Nilus (tumbling over high and steepy Mountaines) called Catadupe Nili, were at hand.

Lastly, as I have already observed, the sons of every father seated themselves as neer together as possibly they could, Gomer and his sons in Asia the lesse; Javen and his sons in Greece, and the Islands adjoining; Shem in Persia and Eastward. So the Sons and Grand-children of Chus from the River of Gehon (their Fathers first seate) inhabited upon the same, or upon some other contiguous unto it, as Nimrod and Harilab on the one side, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabecha (with the rest) did on the other side. And to conclude in a word, the Hebrewes had never acquaintance or fellowship, any warre, treaty of peace, or other intelligence with the Ethiopian black-Moore, as is already remembered in the Chapter of Paradise.

||. V.

A place, Esay 18. v. 1. in like manner converted, by taking Chus for Ethiopia.

And as in these places before remembered, so in divers others is the word Ethiopia put for Arabia or Chus, which puts the story (where it is so understood) quite out of square, one Kingdom thereby being taken for another. For what sense hath this part of Scripture, Eſay 18. Væ terra Cymbalorum alarum quæ eſt trans flumina Æthiopie; or according to the Septuagint in theſe words: Væ terra navium alarum quæ eſt trans fluvios Æthiopie, Woe to the land ſhadowing with wings, which is beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia, ſending Embaſſadours by ſea, even the veſſels of reeds upon the waters. Væ terra umbræ ore; Woe to the Land of the ſhadie coaſt, ſaith Iunius. The former Tranſlators underſtand it in this ſenſe; That the waters are ſhadowed with the ſails, which are ſignificatively called the wings of the ſhips; the other, that the coaſt of the Sea was ſhadowed by the height of the Land.

But to the purpoſe: That this Land here ſpoken of by the Prophet Eſay, is Egypt, no Interpreter hath doubted. For they were the Egyptians that ſent this meſſage to the Iſraelites which Eſay repeateth, and by the former tranſlation every man may ſee the tranſpoſition of Kingdomes: for hereby Egypt is tranſported unto the other ſide of Æthiopia, and Æthiopia ſet next unto Judea, when it is the Land of Chufſ and Arabia indeed that lyeth between Judea and Egypt, and not Æthiopia, which is ſeated under the Equinoctial Line. And of this, Berolani asketh a material queſtion, (to wit) what Region that ſhould be, of which the Prophet ſpeaketh, & placeth it beyond the rivers of Æthiopia. Nam de ignota aq regione dici nequit; For it cannot be ſaid that he treateth of an unknown Region. Now if Æthiopia it ſelf be under the Equinoctial line, with whom the Jews had never any acquaintance, why ſhould any man dream that they had knowledge of Nations far beyond it again, and beyond the Rivers of Æthiopia? except we ſhall impudently think that the Prophet ſpoke he knew not what, or uſed an impertinent diſcourſe of thoſe Nations, which were not diſcovered in 2000. years after, inhabiting as far South as the Cape of Good Hope, commonly known by the name of Bona eſperanza.

||. VI.

That upon the like miſtaking, both Terraca in the ſtory of Senacherib, and Zera in the ſtory of Ala are unadvieſedly made Æthiopians.

And by this tranſlation is the ſtory of Senacherib utterly miſtaken in the cauſe of his retreat. For Senacherib was firſt repulſed at Peliſſum, at the very entrance of Egypt from Judea: when having certain knowledge that Thirrhakeh, (which all the Inter-³⁰preters called King of Æthiopia) was on the way to ſet on him, he began to withdraw himſelf: and fearing to leave his Army in two parts, he ſent threatening Meſſengers to Eſechia King of Juda, perſwading him to ſubmit himſelf: the Tenor whereof is ſet down in the ſecond of Kings in theſe words: Have any of the gods of the Nations delivered his Land out of the hands of the King of Aſſur? Where is the god of Hamah, &c. By which proud Embaſſage, if he had obtained entrance into Jeruſalem, he then meant to have united that great Army before Jeruſalem, commanded by Rabſackeh, with the other which lay before Peliſſum, a great City upon the branch of Nihus next Arabia. For Senacherib had already maſtered the moſt part of all thoſe cities in Judea & Benjamin with a third Army (which himſelf commanded) being then at the ſiege of Lebna. But upon the re-⁴⁰mor of that Arabian Army led by the King Thirrhakeh (whom Joſephus calls Tharſicu) Rabſackeh haſted from the ſiege of Hiernſalem, and found Senacherib departed from Lachis, and ſet down before Lebna, which was afterwards called Eleutheropolis, as ſome have ſuppoſed. But while he had ill ſuccesſs at Peliſſum and feared Thirrhakeh, God himſelf, whom he leaſt feared, ſtrook his Army before Jeruſalem by the Angel of his power, ſo as 158000. were found dead in the place, as in the life of Eſechias is hereafter more largely written. And that this Army of Thirrhakeh was from Arabia, Joſephus himſelf makes it plain. For he confeſſeth in the tenth Book, the firſt Chapter of the Jews Antiquities that it was come to Senacherib's knowledge, that the Armie which was a foot (both to relieve the Egyptians and the Jews) marched towards him by the way of the Deſart: Now the ⁵⁰Deſart which lay indifferent between Hiernſalem and Peliſſum, was that of Pharan or Sin, which alſo toucheth on the three Arabia's, to wit, the Stony, of which it is a part: the Deſart, and the Happy; and by no other way indeed could the Arabians come on to ſuccour either Peliſſum or Hiernſalem. But that there is any Deſart between Peliſſum and the South part of Egypt, hath never yet bene heard of, or deſcribed by any Coſmographer or Hiſtorian. So then this deſcription of the ſecond of Kings, ver. the ninth, hath the ſame miſtaking as the reſt. For here the word (Chufſ) is alſo tranſlated Æthiopia; and in this ſenſe have all the Interpreters, (but Iunius) expreſſed the beginning of the ninth Verſe: ^{ff}

He heard alſo men ſay of Thirrhakeh King of Æthiopia &c. whereas it ſhould have been thus converted with Iunius: Audient autem de Thirrhakeh Rege Chufſi; He heard alſo of Thirrhakeh King of the Chufſites. For they were the Chufſites and Arabians, whoſe houſes and Cities were next the fire, and upon whom the very ſmoake of Juda flaming was blown, being their neereſt Neighbours: and ſo were not the Æthiopian Black-Moors ^{Plin. l. 5. c. 91.} under the Equinoctial, whom neither war nor peace (which diſcovereth all Regions) ever found out, ſaith Plinie. For this King was no more King of Æthiopia than Zera was, who invaded Aſa King of Juda, with an Army of a Million, and three thouſand ^{2 Chron. c. 19.} Chariots. Indeed, how ſuch an Army and thoſe Chariots ſhould paſs through all Egypt, (the Kings of Egypt being mighty Kings) let all men that know how theſe Regions are ſeated, and how far diſtant, judge. For Princes do not eaſily permit Armies of a Million to run through them; neither was there ever ſuch ſtrength of Black-Moors heard of in that part of the World, or elſewhere. Neither are theſe Æthiopians ſuch travellers or Conquerors; and yet is this King Zera alſo called King of Æthiopia. But the word Chufſi being firſt ſo converted for Æthiopia, the reſt of the Interpreters (not looking into the ſeats of Kingdoms, or the poſſibilities of attempts, or invaſions) followed one another in the former miſtakings.

||. VII.

A farther expoſition of the place, Eſay 18. i.

Concerning theſe words in that eighteenth Chapter of Eſay, Navium alarum, Winged ſhips, (to the Septuagint turn it) or Cymbalo alarum (according to the Latine) ſaith whiſtling in the winds, or terra umbræ ore (after Iunius) the Land of a ſhadowed coaſt, or, the Land ſhadowing with wings, as our Engliſh Geneva hath it. The two firſt interpretations of the Septuagint and S. Hierome, have one ſenſe in effect. For the ſails are commonly called the wings of a ſhip; and we uſe to ſay ordinarily when our ſhips ſaile ſlowly, that the wanteth wings: (that is) when her ſails are either worn or too narrow: and we alſo uſe the ſame phraſe of the winde whiſtling in the ſails. And it may be ³⁰that the Egyptians employed ſo many of thoſe ſmall ſhips, as their ſails were ſaid to give a ſhadow over the Red Sea. But to make both interpretations good, Pintus (upon Eſay) affirmeth, that the word (Sabal) doth ſignifie both to ſhadow and to gingle (which is) to make a kinde of Cymbaline ſound: ſo as the meaning of this place (ſaith Pintus) is this: Woe to thee, O Egypt, which doſt promiſe to others ſafe-guard, under the ſhadow of thy wings; which (indeed) ſeemeth to agree with the argument of the eighteenth Chapter of Eſay; and this phraſe is often elſewhere uſed, as in the ſixteenth Plaſm: Sub umbra alarum tuarum protege me; Defend me under the ſhadow of thy wings. The Boats of Reede ſpoken of are of two kinds; either of baſket-willow covered with hides (as anciently in Brittain) or a Tree made hollow in the bottom, and built upon both ſides with ⁴⁰Canes. Of the one fort I have ſeen in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

§. XI.

Of the plantation and antiquities of Egypt.

||. I.

That Mizraim the chief planter of Egypt: and the reſt of the ſons of Ham, were ſeated in order one by another.

⁵⁰ The ſecond ſon of Ham was Mizraim; (who according to the place of a ſecond brother) was ſent ſomewhat farther off to inhabit. For Chufſ firſt poſſeſt Chufſ on the Weſt ſide of Gehon chiefly: and from thence, as he increaſed in people, ſo he entered Arabia, and by time came to the border of the Red Sea, and to the Southeaſt ſide of Judea. Mizraim his brother (with Phu) paſt over into Africa. Mizraim held Egypt; and Phu (as a third brother) was thruſt farther off into Mawritania. Canaan took the Sea-coaſt, and held the ſide of Paleſtine: and theſe four brothers poſſeſt all that Tract of Land, from Gehon in Chaldea, as far to the Weſt as the Mediterran Sea: comprehending all Arabia Deſerta, and Petrea, all Canaan which embraceth Galilee, Samaria, and and Judea; with the two *Egypt*s, whereof the neather is bounded by Memphis on the South, and by the Mediterran Sea on the North: and Thebaida (called the upper Egypt) stretcheth it self toward the South as far as Syene, the border of the *Aethiopian*s or black Moors. All the rest of the coast of Africa Westward, Phut peopled; which brothers had not any other Nation or Family that dwelt between them. And in the same manner did all their sons again, and all the sons of the rest of *Noah*s children, sort themselves.

§. II.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be known: and of the Egyptians Lunary 10 yeeres, which made their antiquities seem more fabulous.

THis flourishing Kingdom posselt by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, and became Egypt, at such time as Egyptus (otherwise Ramesses, as some think) the son of Belus, chased thence his elder brother Danau, shifting him into that part of Greece now called Morea, by whom the Argives were made Danai, abandoning their proper names: which happened 877. yeeres after the Flood, in the time of Josua, as S. Augustine conjectureth out of Ensebius. But in Homers Odyssey it appeareth that the Egyptians were so called at the time of the Trojan Warre. And before this, Egypt was knowne by divers other names, as Oceana, Aria, Osiriana, &c. And Manethon (whom Tosephus citeth in his first booke against Appion) numbred all the Kings of Egypt after Moses departure, who 20 consumed 393 yeeres. By which other men conjecture, that the Egyptians took on them that name 330. yeeres after Iosua, and about 1000. yeeres after the Flood. But where Tosephus in the same booke taketh Isreal to be those Hyefor, which he also calleth Pastores or Shepherds, which are said to have reigned in Egypt 511. yeeres: whom also he calleth his Ancestors, (meaning the Ancestors of the Jewes) in this I am sure he was grossly deceived, or that he vainly boasted: for the Israelites had no such Dominion as Manethon saith, nor abode in Egypt so long a time by many yeeres.

Of the Egyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirme (saith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330 Kings before Amasis, who was contemporary with Cyrus; and that they had 30 memory and glory of 13000. yeeres; and that the Stars had four times changed their course, and the Sun twice set in the East. These Riddles are also rise among the Athenians and Arcadians, who dare affirm, that they are more ancient than Jupiter and the Moon; whereof Ovid:

Arcades: & Luna gens prior illa fuit.*

The Arcadians the earth inhabited Ere yet the Moon did shine, or Jove was bred.

But for those 13000. yeeres it may well be true; seeing it is certain that the Egyptians reckon their yeeres by Moneths, which makes after that account not above 1000. or 1100. yeeres, whether we take their Moneths or Lunary yeeres to have been of the first kinde of 27. daies and eight hours; or otherwise 29. daies and twelve hours; or after any other of those five diversities of their Lunary yeeres.

§. III.

Of certain vain assertions of the Antiquity of the Egyptians.

GErardus Mercator in his Chronology, reasoneth for the Egyptians Antiquity in this manner: That the sixteenth Dynasty (where Ensebius begins to reckon the Egyptians times) had beginning with the general Flood: and that therefore the first of the other fifteen reached the Creation, or soon after it. To which conjecture of Mercator, Pererius maketh this answer; That therein Mercator was first deceived, because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty was at once with the general Flood: which Ensebius maketh 292. yeeres after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the shepherds Dynastia (being in number 17.) in the time of their first King, Sathis, to have been in the yeere of the World 1846. which

Ense-

Ensebius findeth in the Worlds age 2140. For the 16. Dynastia was begun but in the 292 yeeres after the Flood, as they account, and continued 190. yeeres. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh every Dynastia to endure 115. yeeres, Ensebius reckoneth many of them at lesse than 100. yeeres: for the 28. had but sixe yeeres, the 29. but 20. and the 30. but 18. yeeres.

Now Annus in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all these 15. Dynasties lasted but 162. yeeres: and that the first of the 15. began but in the 131. yeere after the flood: so as where Mercator makes all the 15. to precede the flood, and the 16. to have been then in being at the time of the flood, Annus makes them all after it. But the contrariety of fallshood cannot be hidden, though disguised. For Annus had forgotten his former Opinion and assertion, that it was in the 131. yeere that Nimrod, with the sons of Noah, came into the Valley of Shinar: so he forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confusion of Speech there was no dispersion, nor far-off plantation at all. And though he hastily conveyed Gomer into Italy, and Tubal into Spain, in the tenth yeere of Nimrods reign: (which was ten yeeres after his arrival into Babilonia) yet herein he is more unadvised. For he makes Egypt posselt, and a government established in the very first yeere of the arrival of Nimrod into Shinar, before all partition, or any expedition far off or neere in question: for from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord scatter them upon all the earth.

§. IV.

Against Pererius: that it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within 200. yeeres after the Creation; at least, that both it, and the most parts of the World were peopled before the Flood.

But whereas Pererius seeketh to overthrow this Antiquity of the Egyptians touching their Dynasties, (which Ensebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I do not find any great strength in this opinion of Pererius (to wit) that it was either unlikely or impossible that Egypt should be peopled within 100. or 200. yeeres after Adam, in the first Age. And whereas he supposeth that it was not inhabited at all before the general Flood, I do verily beleve the contrary: and that not only of Egypt, but the better part of all World was then peopled: Pererius his words are these; Quomodo enim primos mundi ducentos, vel etiam centum annos Adami proles adeo multiplicari potuit, ut ad Egyptum usq; habitandum & complendum propagata sit, &c. For how could the children of Adam be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred yeeres of the World, and so propagated as to inhabit and fill Egypt? for allowing this (saith Pererius) we must also confesse, that there were then both the Allyrians and other Nations.

Now seeing that the Scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our saving beleefe, it is lawfull for every man to be guided in this and the like questions by the best reason, circumstance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I do not gainsay any mans opinion out of any crossing or cavilling humours: for I thinke it the part of every Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibility of union, than out of froward subtilty, and prejudicate resolvednesse, to maintaine factions needlesse, and dangerous contentions.

First therefore, for this opinion, that Egypt was not planted so soone after Adam, no, nor at all before the Flood, I say, that there is no reason why we should give a lesse increase to the sons of Adam, than to the sons of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded those which came after the Flood double, and (after a few yeeres) treble, is an infallible proof of their strength and ability, to beget many Children: and at that time, so they observed no degrees of kindred, nor consanguinity. And that there was a speedy increase of people, and in great numbers, it may in some sort appear by this, that Cain, who (being fearefull that the death of Abel would have beene revenged on him) withdrew himselfe from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, and there, by the helpe of his owne issues, built a City, (called Enoch) after the name of his first-borne. Now if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinar with so many multitudes, as sufficed to build the City and Tower of Babel: and that to this increase there was given but 130. yeeres by Ensebius, and after the account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly understood, by the birth of Siphax id.

M

Sathis,

Solub, Heber, and Phalegh) but one hundred and one year : I see no cause to doubt, but that in the infancy of the first age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, even within 130. years, the same (if not a greater) number might be increased; and so within 70. years after (that is, by such time as the World had stood 200. years) as well Affria, Syria, and Egypt might be peopled before the flood, as they were within the same or lesse time after it. Neither doth it agree with the circumstance or true story of the Babyloni- an and Assyrian Empire, that all those people, which were increased in the first 100. or 130. years after the flood, came into Shinar and Babylonia. For that ever Noah himself came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authority to prove it, so all probable conjecture and reason it self denies it. Again, those multitudes and powerful numbers, which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, considered with her own Army of three millions, (and she left not all her Kingdomes empty) do well prove, that if the World had such plenty of people in so few years after the flood, it might also be as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their own account, Nimrus governed Babylonia and Affria but 292. years after the flood of Noah. And these Troops of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Eastern Kingdomes, from Media to the Mediterran Seas; when there had now past from the flood to the time of this her invasion somewhat less or more than 360. years : for much more time the true Chronologie cannot allow; though I confesse, that in respect of the strange greatnels of Semiramis Army, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short a time as can well be given. And if but one 20 half be true of that which is said, That her Army consisted of 1300000. Footmen, and 500000. Horsemen, it must needs be, that long before Semiramis Reign, the greatest part of Asia (whence her huge Army was gathered) was full of people; yea Arabia it self (much part whereof is barren) must long before this time of Semiramis have been plentifully peopled; when Nimrus having a determination to make himself Master of all Nations, entred (notwithstanding) in league with the King thereof; whom therefore he either feared, or sought his assistance. And if Arabia were then so well replenished, I see no cause but Egypt might also be peopled. Now if we may beleeve Trogus Pompeius (Epitomis : d by Justine) Egypt was a most flourishing and magnificent nation before Nimrus was born. For these be his own words, speaking of Nimrus: Erre quidem temporibus antiquioribus 30 Vexoris Rex Egypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient Vexoris King of Egypt, and Tanais King of the Scythians: of which the one invaded Pontus, the other Egypt. And how full of people all that part of the World was, the Conquests of Nimrus witness, who subdued with no small force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterward the Bactrians; yea, all that whole body of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Clellas numbeth the Armies wherewith Nimrus invaded Zoroaster, at 1700000. Footmen, and 200000. Horsemen: & the stories generally shew, that though Zoroaster Army was far short of this, yet it was greater than any that those parts of the world ever since beheld. But to what end should I seek for foreign authority? for no man doubteth but that Egypt was peopled by Misraim, the son of Ham; and that it was an established Kingdome, filled with many Cities in Abrahams time, the Scriptures tell us. And sure, to prepare and cultivate a desolate and overgrown ground, to beautifie it with many Cities, Lawes, and Policies, cannot be esteemed a labour of a few daies; and therefore it must be inhabited in a les time than 200. years after the flood; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the flood. For if so many millions of men were found within 300. years after the generall flood, so as not onely Babylon, and Affria, Bactria, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Egypt, Palestina, yea the far-off Lybia on the one side, and India on the other, and Scythia (inferiour to neither) were all filled : into what small corners could then all those Nations be compressed, which 1656. years brought forth before the flood? even necessity, which cannot be resisted, cast the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the known world; especially where death forbore the father, and made no place for the son, till he had beheld living Nations of his own body.

||. V.

Of some other reasons against the opinion of Pererius.

For what a strange increase did the long lives of the first Age make, when they continued 800. or 900. years? Surely we have reason to doubt, that the World could not containe them, rather than that they were not spread over the World. For let us now reckon the date of our lives in the Age of the World : wherein if one exceed 50. years, ten for one are cut off in that passage, and yet we finde no want of people; nay 10 we know the multitude such, as if by Wars or pestilence they were not sometimes taken off by many thousands, the earth with all the industry of man could not give them food. What strange heaps then of souls had the first Ages, who enjoyed 800. or 900. years, as aforesaid? These numbers, I say, cannot be counted nor conceived. For it would come to the same reckoning in effect, as if all those which have been borne in Brittain since 3. or 4. hundred years before the Norman Conquest (saving such as by accident or by violence were cut off) were now alive; and if to these there were added as many as by Polygamy might have been increased. For (to omit, that the Gyants and mighty ones of the first Age observed no law of Matrimony) it is to be thought that those lovers of the World and of pleasure, when they knew the long and liberal time 20 which nature had given them, would not willingly or hastily present themselves to any danger which they could fly from or eschew. For what humane argument hath better perswasion to make men careless of life, and fearless of death, than the little time which keeps them asunder, and that short time also accompanied with so many pains and diseases, which this envious old Age of the World mingleth together, and soweth with the seeds of mankind?

Now if that Berosus or Annius may be alledged for sufficient Authours, whom Pererius himselfe in this question citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Josephus confirmed, that the City of Enoch was seated near Libanus in Syria : and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cain time, I see no cause why Palestina (which is also a Province of 30 Syria) and Egypt (which neighboureth it) could be left desolate both all the lifetime of Cain, and all those times between his death and the Flood, which were by estimation 700. or 800. years. And sure though this fragment of Berosus with Annius his Comment be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or lost) yet all things in Berosus are not to be rejected. Therefore Saint Hierome, for such Authours gives a good rule : Bona eorum eligamus, vitemus contraria; Let us choose what is good in them, and reject the rest. And certainly in the very beginning of the first Book, Berosus agreeth (in effect) with Moser, touching the generall Flood : and in that first part Berosus affirmeth, that those mighty men and Gyants which inhabited Enoch, commanded over all Nations, and subjected the universal World : and though that phrase 40 (of all the World) be often used in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the second of the Acts, That there were dwelling at Hiernsalem Jewes, men that feared God of every Nation under Heaven : yet by the words which follow in Berosus, it is plain, that his words and sense were the same : for he addeth, from the Suns rising to the Suns setting; which cannot be taken for any small part thereof. Again, we may safely conjecture that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his sons at adventure, or left them as Discoverers, but directed them to those Regions which he formerly knew had been inhabited. And it cannot be denied that the earth was more passable and easie to travail over before the flood, than after it. For Pererius himselfe confesseth, that Attica (by reason of mud and slime which the water left upon the earth) was uninhabited 200. years 50 after Ogges flood; whereby we may gather, that there was no great pleasure in passing into far Countries, after the generall deluge, when the earth lay (as it were) inclosed for 100. or 130. years together. And therefore was the face thereof in all conjecture more beautifull, and less cumbersome to walk over, in the first Age, than after the generall overflowing.

of the words of Moses, Gen. 10. v. ultimo, whereupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

I Afly, whereas Pererius draws this Argument out of the last Verse of the tenth of Genesis; And out of these were the Nations divided after the Flood: quo significatur talem divisionem non fuisse ante diluvium; By which it appeareth (saith Pererius) that there was no such division before the Flood; which he also seeketh to confirm out of the eleventh of Genesis, because the division of tongues was the cause of the dispersion of the people. This consequence, quo significatur, &c. seemeth to me very weak: The Text it self rather teacheth the contrary: For out of these (saith Moses) were the Nations divided in the earth after the flood; inferring, that before the flood the nations were divided out of others, though after the flood out of these only. But whatsoever sense may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawn to the times before the flood, or to any plantation or division in that age: for if there were none else among whom the Earth could be divided after the flood, but Noah's sons, wherein doth that necessary division controul the planting of the World before it? And whereas it is alledged that the confusion of speech was the cause of this dispersion; it is true, that it was so for that present; but if Babel had never been built, nor any confusion of languages at all, yet increase of people and time would have enforced a farther-off and general plantation: as Berosus saies well, that when mankind were exceedingly multiplied, Ad comparandas novas sedes necessitas compellebat, They were driven by necessity to seek new Habitations. For we finde (as it is before said) that within 300. years after the Flood, there were gathered together into two Armies such multitudes, as the Valley about Babylon could not have sustained those numbers, with their increase, for any long time; all Asia the greater and the lesser; all Scythia, Arabia, Palestina, and Egypt, with Greece, and the Islands thereof; Mauritania and Lybia, being also at that time fully peopled. And if we beleeve Berosus, then not only those parts of the World, but (within 140. years after the Flood) Spain, Italy and France were also planted: much more then may we think, that within 1656. years before the flood, in the time of the chief strength of mankind, they were replenished with people. And certainly, seeing all the world was overflowed, there were people in all the World which offended.

||. VII.

A conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian antiquities: with somewhat of Phut (another son of Ham) which peopled Lybia.

T Herefore, for the Antiquity of the Egyptians, as I do not agree with Mercator, nor judge with the Vulgar, which give too much credit to the Egyptians Antiquities: so I do not think the report of their Antiquities so fabulous, as either Pererius or other men conceive it. But I rather incline to this, that Egypt being peopled before the flood, and 200. or 300. years more or lesse after Adam, there might remaine unto the Sons of Mizraim some Monuments in Pillars or Altars (of stone or metall) of their former Kings or Governours: which the Egyptians having added to the List and Roll of their Kings after the flood, in succeeding time (out of the vanity of glory, or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inserted. And that the memory of antiquity was in such sort preserved, Berosus affirmeth it of the Chaldeans, and so doth Epigenes. For they both write, that the use of Letters and the Art of Astronomy was known to the Babylonians 5634. years before Alexanders Conquest: and this report Annio findeth to agree, and reach to the time of Enoch, who was born 1034. 50 years before the flood, and wrote of the Worlds destruction, both by Water and Fire; as also of Christ his coming in judgment, as Saint Jude hath witnessed. But leaving these Antiquities to other mens judgments, and every man to his own reason, I will conclude this Plantation of Egypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it took the name of Egypt from Egyptus the sonne of Belus, as aforesaid. Being divided into two Regions, that part from Memphis or Nicopolis to the Mediterranean Sea, was called the inferiour Egypt; furnished also Delta: because the severall branches of Nilus breaking asunder from one body of the River, gave it the forme of the Greek letter Delta, which is the form of a Triangle. That branch, which ran toward the North-east and imbraced the Sea, next unto the Desarts of Sur & Pharan, had on it the City of Pelusiun, where Senacherib was repulsed: The other branch, which yielded it self to the Salt-water towards the North-east, is beautified by that famous City of Alexandria: The upper part of Egypt is bounded between Memphis and Syene near Ethiopia, and had the name of Thebaida, of that ancient City of Thebes; which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. Gates, and therefore called Civitas centum portarum; and by the Greeks Diospolis; in the Scriptures No-hamon, which signifieth multitudes of inhabitants, exceeding belief. Josephus calls Egypt Megis of Mizraim: and Herodotus affirms that it had once the name of Thebais.

Phut the third sonne of Ham took the next portion of Land to his brother Mizraim, and inhabited Lybia: whose people were anciently called Phutæ, (saith Josephus) and Pliny mentioneth the River Phut in Mauritania: which River from the mountain Atlas (known to the inhabitants by the name of Dyris) he maketh to be distant the space of two hundred miles. It also appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezechiel, that Phut, Chus, and Lud were contermini and associates with the Egyptians.

§. XII.

Of the eleven Sons of Canaan, the fourth Son of Ham.

||. I.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan: with the names of his eleven Sonnes.

Canaan (the fourth son of Ham) posselt all that Region called by the Romanes Palestina; in the Scriptures Galilea, Samaria, and Judea; in the later times knowne by the name of the Holy Land and Jurie: the limits whereof are precisely set downe by Moses, Genesis the tenth, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goest to Gerar untill Azzah, and as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorrhah, and Admah, and Zebaim, even unto Lafsa. Now howsoever these words of the Hebrew Text (as thou goest) be converted, Moses meaning was that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan, and Zidon the North; Sodom and Gomorrhah the East, and the other Cities named, stood on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right line from Gaza in the way of Egypt, the uttermost Territory of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the Land of Canaan. Now the sons of Canaan which posselt this Country, and inhabited some part of the borders thereof, were in number eleven.

1. Zidon.
2. Heth or Chetbus.
3. Jebusi or Jebuseus.
4. Emori or Emoreus, or Amoreus.
5. Girgesshi or Girgeseus.
6. Hevi or Chiveus.
7. Arki or Harkens.
8. Seni or Sineus.
9. Arvadi or Arvadens.
10. Zemari or Samareus, or Tzemareus.
11. Hamathi, or Hamathens, or Chamathens.

Of which the most renowned were the Hethites, Girgessites, Amoriters, Hevites, Iebusites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were descended of Zemari or Samareus, or from some of his.

||. II.

Of the Portions of Zidon and Heth.

Zidon the first borne of Canaan, built the famous City of Zidon in Phenicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Asher: for Asher, Zabulon, and Nephthali had a great part of the ancient Phenicia distributed among them; but the Asherites could never obtain Zidon it self.

Gen. 10. 19.

Gen. 23.

Gen. 27. 46.

Kin. 7. 5.

The second Son of Canaan was Heth or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites, or Hittites, one of those seven principal Nations (commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out; namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hebron, near the Torrent Bersar, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the uttermost limit of Canaan, having the Desert of Pharam to the South: for about Bersabe (otherwise Putens Juramentum) four miles from Gaza dwelt Heth and his Posterity, as far to the North-east as Hebron, and Mamre; and of Ephraim the Hittite did Abraham buy the field of Sarab's buriall. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her self to Isaac, saying, That she was weary of her life for the daughters of Heth. The Giants Anakim were of these Hittites, a strong and fierce to nation, whose entertainment by the Kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the seventh of the Kings; Israel hath hired against us the Kings of the Hittites.

||. III.

Of the Jebusites and Amorites.

Jebuseus, the third sonne of Canaan, of whom came the Jebusites, and whose principal seat was Jebus, (afterward Hierusalem) were also a valiant and stubborn Nation, and held their City and the Country near it, till such time as David by Gods assistance recovered both: yet were not the Jebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Solomon. 20

Amoreus was the fourth son of Canaan, of whom the Amorites took name, who inhabited that Land to the East of Jordan below the Sea of Galilee, having Arnon and the mountains of Galaad on the East, and Jordan on the West: of whom Og (King of Basan) and Sihon (overthrown by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations dispersed within the bounds of Canaan: as behind Libanus in the edge of Celojyria, or Syria Libanica. They had also their being in the mountains of Iuda, and in Idumea near the Metropolis thereof, called Dmna. And hereof it came that all the Canaanites were sometime called Amorites: as in Genesis the fifteenth: For the wickedness of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerfull Nation, we finde in the Prophet Amos: 1st destroyed I the Amorites before them, whose height was like the height of a Cedar, and hee was strong as the Oak.

||. IIII.

Of the Gergesites, Hivites, and Harkites.

The fift son of Canaan was Gergesius, or Gergeson, (otherwise Girgasi) who inhabited on the East side of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolomy sets the City Gerasa, which Iosephus calls Gesera, in the Territory of Decapolis. Here it was that Christ dispossest the possessed with devils; and the Gergesites desired him to depart 40 their Coasts: because their swine, filled with the evill spirits, drowned themselves in the Sea of Galilee. Gergesius also built Beritus (sometime Geris) afterward Felix Iulia, three miles from the River Adonis in Phenicia: in which the Romans held a Garrison: and to which Augustus gave many large privileges.

Hevus: the sixth son, and Father of the Hivites, inhabited under Libanus near Emath. These Hivites, howsoever the Caphthorim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomy the second is remembered) yet many of them remained all the War of Iosua and afterward to the time of Solomon. For God was not pleased utterly to root out these nations, but they were sometimes made Tributaries to the Israelites, and at other times served (in their falling away from the true worship of God) to afflict them: for as it is 50 written, Judges: the third: They remained to prove Israel by them, whether they would obey the commandments of God.

The seventh sonne was Araceus or Harki, who between the foot of Libanus and the Mediterran Sea, (over against Tripolis) built the City of Archas, Arce, or Arca, afterwards Arachis.

||. V.

||. V.

Of Sini and Arvadi.

Sineus the eight son, Hierosolymitanus sets at Caparorsa, which Ptolomy finds in Indea, not far from Jebus; to the South thereof, saith Iunius. But it is more probable, that Sineus founded Sin, which S. Hierome calls Sim: Ptolomy, Sinyra: Mela and Pliny, Sinyrus: Brochard, Sycon; (called Synochin) near Arca. Pterius thinks that Sineus inhabited the Desarts of Sinai, or thereabout; but hereof there is no other certainty than the report of Brochard, who took view of all these places, affirming, that Sineus built Sinochin, as Zidon built Zidon. There is also another Nation of Cini written with the letter C, (otherwise Kenai) who descended of Hobab the son of Raguel the Madianite, who assisted the Israelites in their conduction through the wilderness of Pharan. But these Cinei were admitted among the Israelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephthalims, beside Jude. 4. their habitations with the Amalekites: against these Cinei, Balaam prophecied, that they 74. 19. 33. should be destroyed by the Assyrians.

The ninth son was Aradeus or Arvadus, who in the Isle of Aradus built the City Aradus: opposite against which Island on the Maine of Phenicia, they founded another City of that name, which for opposition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this City came S. Peter (saith Clement) and in this Isle preached the Gospel, and founded a Church in honour of our Lady: but we find no such worke of his in the Acts of the Apostles. 20 Both these two were very famous, and places of Skilfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembreth in his prophecies against the Iryians: The inhabitants of Zidon and Arvad were thy Mariners. Cap. 27. v. 8.

||. VI.

Of Zemari.

Of Samareus, or Zemari, the tenth son, there are divers opinions. Some think that he inhabited in Celojyria at Edeffa, and founded Samaraim, which in Iosua is placed in the Tribe of Benjamin. There is also Samarajim (of the same orthography) upon the Mountaine of Ephraim (saith Beroaldus) mentioned in the second of Chr. c. 13. v. 22. Beroal. in Chra. which the Latine converteth amisse (saith he) by Semeron. The Hierosolymitan Paraphrast 14. makes Samareus (of whom were the Perizzites) the parent of the Emisiani, which Pliny calls the Hemissemi, in Celojyria; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before remembered. But that they founded Samaria, both the Hebrew Orthographic, and this place in the 1 of Kings (speaking of Omri) disproveth: And he bought the Mountain Samaria or Shemeron of one Shemar, for two talents of Silver, and built in the Mountaine; and called the name of the City which he built, after the name of Shemar, Lord of the mountaine, Samaria. But of all these places 40 I shall speake more at large in the conquest of the holy Land, by the children of Israel. Of whomsoever the Samaritanes were descended, sure I am, that they were ever a perfidious Nation, and base: for as long as the state of the Jewes stood up, they always called themselves Jewes: when it suffered or sanke, they then utterly denied to be of that Nation or Family; for at such time as they were returned from their first captivity, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Assyrians, and partly of the Naturals.

||. VII.

Of Hamathi.

The last of Canaan's sons was Hamatheus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamathi (saith Beroaldus:) of which (the aspiration taken away) the same is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamatheus was present. Iosephus and S. Hierome confound Emath with Antioch: not that Antioch which standeth on the River Orontes, on the frontier of Comagena, between the Mountaine Caljiss and the Province of Pteria, and Seleucia, of which Saint Peter was Bishop, and in which Saint Luke and Ignatius were borne; but Antioch, surnamed Epiphania, as Beroaldus supposeth, which standeth betweene 50

Apamea and Emesa in Cassiotis. Yet indeed, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch upon Orontes, and that which neighboureth Emesa, are farther off seated from Canaan, than ever any of those Nations straggled. And whereas S. Hierome setteth Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephthali; it is manifest, that Epiphania, which standeth to the North of Emesa, hath all the Province of Laodicea betweene it and any part of the Land divided. And if Libanus it selfe were not shared among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong unto them: for both the Provinces among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania and any part of the holy Land: and therefore Emath so taken could not be a part of Nephthali, as in the thirteenth of Joshua is directly proved. For Joshua counting the lands that remained unpossessed, reckoneth all Mount Libanus towards the Sun-rising, from Baalgad under Mount Hermon, until we come to Hamath. And this reason (among others) is used, that Emath was not in Nephthali, or any way belonging to the children of Israel: because David accepted the presents of Tobu King of Emath, and (therewithall) conditions of peace: which he would not have done, if that Territory had ever belonged to the children of Israel, but would have recovered it without composition, and by strong hand, as he did the rest. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great weight. For if the promise which God made, be considered, as it is written in Deuteronomy, then might Emath be comprehended, though seated altogether without the bounds of the land promised, according to the description of Moses and Joshua: for Emath is indeed situate on the other side of the Mountain of Hermon, which joyneth to Libanus: and is otherwise called Iturea. But whereas Hamath is named in Joshua 19. v. 35. and written in the Latine version Emath, therein (saith Beroaldus) was S. Hierome mistaken. Emath or Iturea is that over the Mountaines, and the City in Nephthali should be written Hamath: and so the Septuagint (understanding the difference) write it Ammath and not Emath, the same which indeed belongeth to the Nephthalims, seated on the South side of Libanus, to the East of Aledim: which City S. Hierome writes Emath; Josephus, Hamath; others, Emathin, or Amathicos, and the people Cap. 18. & 19. Amalek; of which (as I take it) Rabakeb vaunterth in the second of Kings. Where is the god of Hamath?

||. I.

That most of the sons of Chush were seated in Arabia the happy: and of the Sabaeans that robbed Job: and of the Queene that came to Solomon.

Sheba or Saba was the eldest son of Chush, the eldest son of Ham; to make a difference betweene Him and his Nephew Sheba, the son of his brother Raama or Regma, (or Ragma after Montanus:) his name is written with a single (s) Samech, and Sheba the son of Regma with an (s) asperat, which is the Hebrew Schin. Sheba the eldest son of Chush, Regma his brother, and Sheba the son of Regma, possesse both the shores of Arabia felix. Saba tooke that part toward the Red Sea, as neereft his Father Chush, and the Land of the Chushites: Regma and Sheba the East coast of the same Arabia, which looketh into the Gulfe of Persia; of which Pliny: Sabaei, Arabum populi, propter thura clarissimi ad utraq; maria porrectis gentibus habitant; The Sabaeans, people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincense, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas, (to wit) the Persian, and the Arabian or Red Sea. This Countrey was afterwards called Arabia, a populi mixtione, saith Postellus. To this agreeth Ptolomy, who setteth the City of Saba towards the Arabian or Red Sea, and the Citie Rhegama towards the Persian; with whom also we may leave Saba: for so much Montanus gathereth out of Ptolomy, because because he remembereth a Nation (called Sabaei) neere the Persian Sea; and Massabathe which defended of them. But Montanus hath sent Regma, (or as he calls him) Rhama, into Carmania, for which I see no reason. Josephus, who only attended his owne fancies, hath banished Saba or Seba to the border of Ethiopia. But Beroaldus thinkes it strange, that the Sabaei, which stole away Jobs Cattle, should runne through all Egypt and all Arabia Petrea, and finde out Job in Tracanis, betweene Palestina and Celsyria, 1200. miles off. Now, as this conjecture was more than ridiculous, so do I thinke, that neither the Sabaei on the Red Sea, nor those toward the Persian Sea, could by any meanes execute the stealth upon Job, which soever Beroaldus shall take for neereft. But these were the Sabaei of Arabia the Desart, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth out of his own experience, that the Citie Saba is seated: the same which Ptolomy calls Sive, now Semisacae; and from this Saba in Arabia the Desart, came those Magi or Wise men, which worshipped Christ, saith Melchior, whose words are these: The Magi came neither out of Mesopotamia (as Chrysostome, Hierome, and Ambrose supposed) nor out of Arabia the Happy, as many wise men doe believe, but out of Saba in Arabia the Desart: which City, when my selfe was there, was (as I indeed it) called Semisacae. And to approve this opinion of Guilandinus, it appeareth that these Sabaei were neighbours to Job, and lay fit to invade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well those on the Persian Sea, as those on the Red Sea) are so disjoyned with large Desarts, as there is no possibilitie for strangers to passe as them, especially with any numbers of Cattell, both in respect of the mountaines, of the sands, and of the extreme want of water in those parts: Ubi nec homines, nec bestia videntur, nec arbor, imò nec arbores, nec gramin aliquod, sed non nisi montes saxosi, altissimi, asperissimi; Where there are found neither men, nor beasts, no not so much as birds, or trees, nor any pasture or grasse, but only sharpe, and high, stonie, and cragie mountaines. Beroaldus and Pererius conceive, that the Queen of Saba which came to visit Solomon, was of the Sabaei on the East side of Arabia felix; but the contrarie seemeth more probable, and that she was Queen of Saba towards the Red Sea: for Solomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petrea, betwixt Idumaea and the Red Sea, as far downe as Atidan or Midian, and Ezion Caber: and this Queene of Saba, which inhabited the West part of Arabia Felix, being his neighbour, might without any far travell enter his Territories, free from all danger of surpris by any other Prince or Nation.

But to avoid tediousness, it is manifest that Seba or Saba, Sabta, Raama, or Regma, with his Sons Sheba and Dedan, and Sabteca, were all the possessors of Arabia the Happy, and the Desart: onely Havilah and Nimrod dwelt together on the East side of Chush, who held Arabia Petrea. Now for Sabta, there is found of his name the City of Sabatha or Sabota in the same Arabia: of which both Plinie and Ptolomy; who withall nameth Sabotale, within the wals whereof there were sometimes found sixtie Temples. Ezechiel joyntly the Father and the son together, The Merchants of Sheba and Raama were they Merchants. And that they were the Eastern Arabians, their merchandise witnesseth, formerly repeated in the Chapter of Paradise. For Josephus his fancies, that Saba was the Parent of the Ethiopians about Meroc, and Sabta of the Ethiopians Astabari, they be not worthy any farther answer than hath already beene given: especially seeing these Cities, preserving the memorie of the names of Saba, and of Sabta in Arabia, were yet remaining in Ptolomies time, though in some letters changed. As also in the coasts adjoining, the names of other of the brethren of the familie of Chush, with little alterations are preserved. In Arabia the Desart is found the City Saba or Sive, (now Semisacae) with the Citie of Rhegama: for Rhegma; and the Nation by Ptolomy himselfe called Rabeni of Raamah. In Arabia the Happie is found the Citie of Rhegama, & Rabana; which also keepeth the sound of Rhegma, the Citie of Saptha or Sapah, not far from the East-coast of Arabia: as also the Metropolis and chiefe Citie in the bodie of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabatha, and to the West of Sabatha towards the Red Sea, the great Citie of Saba; and the Nation adjoining, Sabaei; and to the South thereof againe toward the freight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Sabe. To all these his brothers and nephews which were seated on the East side of Arabia, Havilah by the passage of Sygria was a neighbour, to whom he might passe by Boate even unto Rhegma the Citie of Raama, or Rhegma, yet neere the River of Lar towards the mouth of the Persian Sea, which stood in Ptolomies time.

||. II.

Josephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the issue of Chush, to have bene seated in the West Ethiopia, disproved out of Ezechiel and Hieremy.

And whereas Josephus (whom in this S. Hierome followeth, as not curious herein) sent Dedan the son of Raamah into West Ethiopia, it is strange that Ezech. should couple Sheba, Raamah, and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15. Verse, and Sheba, and Raamah in the 22. Verse, to be the Merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in West Ethiopia, which is distant from Raamah and Sheba (the habitation of his father and brother) 10 above foure thousand miles. Besides which, the merchandise that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Blacke-moors. For they of Dedan (saith Ezechiel) were thy Merchants in precious clothes for thy Chariots; and these Westerne Ethiopians never saw cloth, till the Portuguese, seeking those Coasts, traded with them: the merchandise of the Countrey being Hides, Elephants teeth, some Gold and Amber, Civet Cats, and Rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: and all these they exchanged for linnen, or iron chiefly.

But in those dayes, the West part of Africa within the body of the land was knowne only by imagination: and, being under the burnt Zone, was held uninhabitable. And therefore that the Negroes of the West Ethiopia, which inhabite about Serra Liona, of 20 Niger, could either passe by Sea or Land to Tyre, in the bottome of the Mediterranean Sea, were a strange, or rather a foolish fancy. Now to put it out of dispute that Dedan also dwelt by the rest of the children of Chush, which seats they held by that name in the time of Hieremy the Prophet, let us heare Hieremy his owne words: Fly, ye Inhabitants of Dedan, for I have brought the destruction of Elau upon him. Hereby it appeareth, that Dedan was a Neighbour to the Idumeans: and Idumea is a Province of Arabia Petraea: and Dedan which dwelt on the North part of Arabia felix, joyned in that part to Petraea, the seat of his Grand-father Chush, which neighbourhood and fellowship of Dedan and the Idumeans, is also confirmed by Ezechiel: I will stretch out my hand upon Edom, and destroy Min and Beast out of it, and I will make it desolate from Teman: and they of Dedan shall fall by the sword.

§. XIII.

Of the issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, Chap. 9. Vers. 7.

After Chush, it followeth to speake of Mizraims sons, whose names (saith Saint Augustine) were plurall, to signifie the Nations, which came of them. Ludim, the elder son of Mizraim, was the Father of the Lybians in Africa: and the rest of his Brothers dispersed themselves into all the Regions adjoining. Among the sons of Shem there is also Lud; but he is differenced from Lud the son of Mizraim by the singular number: the sonne of Shem being written Lud; the sonne of Mizraim, Ludim: and yet these Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference both of Names and Nations. For, that Ludim the son of Mizraim was the Parent of the Lybians in Africa, and that he was seated not far from Mizraim his father, appeareth by the Prophet Hieremy, who joyned them in this sort together: Come up ye Horses, and raze ye Chariots, and let the valiant men come forth, the Blacke-moors, and the Lybians which beare the shield: for those Nations assisted the Egyptians, being of one Parent descended. And in Ezechiel, Phut and Lud are joynd together. Ethiopia (or Chush) saith Ezechiel, c. 30. v. 3. and Phut, and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the Land that are in leace, shall fall with them by the sword: which is as much to say, as the sons of Chush, (which were the Chusites) the sons of Mizraim, (which were the Egyptians) and the Lybians (descended of his son Lud) with other the Inhabitants of Egypt and Africa, shall fall together. Hierosolymitanus finds also in Africa a Nation of the Lydians. And I beleve it: because Hieremy joyneth the Lybians, and Lydians together in the place before remembered. But Lybia in Africa is by the Hebrewes called Ludim (saith Arias Montanus) though 2 Chron. 12. 3. they seeme to be called Lubim or Lubel, a name somewhat neere the word Lybier, and by which it may seeme that the truer writing writing is, not Lybier, but Lybier. Neither is it here to be omitted, that Ptolemy upon the thirtieth of Ezechiel understandeth that which is spoken in the third Verse of Lud, not to be meant of the Lybians at all: for he will have this threatening to be meant against the people of Lyda, a City (saith he) between Egypt and Palestina, which opinion I could not mislike, if the City of Lyda were so seated. But Lyda (which should be written Lyda with a double D, and is the same City which was afterward Daispolis, in which S. Peter cured Aenes of the palsy) standeth neere the Torrent Gaas, not far from Joppe the Port of Hierusalem. Yet it is not impossible but that this City might have Lud for the Founder. For there are many Cities of one name founded in all the Regions of the 10 World, and far asunder; as after the names of Alexander, Seleucus, and Antiochus, many Cities called Alexandria, Seleucia, and Antiochia, so of divers others. S. Hierome maketh Lubim to be the Father of Lybys, who was the third son of Mizraim: and so doth Ptolemy; and either opinion may be true.

The termination in the Hebrew, is commonly a figure of the plural number, as aim, of the dual.

Cap. 46. v. 9.

The rest of Mizraims sons have no proper Countries given them in the Scriptures, saving Caslubim and Caphtorim, of whom came the Philistims, whom the Scriptures call Peleth.

These Caslubim inhabited Casstotis, a Region lying in the enterence of Egypt from Palestina, in which the Lake Sirbonis, and the Mountain Cassus are found, not far from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphtorim seated neer Caslubim in that Tract of Egypt called Setbroitis, not far from Pelusium. Strabo calls it Setbroitis; Stephanus and Pliny, Setbroitis, of the City Setbron: which Ortelius takes to be the same which Ptolemy calls Hercules parva. Of the Caslubim and Caphtorim came the Philistims, which are called by the Septuagint Allophyls (which is) Alienigene, Strangers, or of a strange kindred. These Philistims inhabited the South part of the holy Land towards Egypt, of whom Palestina tooke name. For the Hebrewes (saith Isidore) do not use the letter (P) but in stead of it (ph). Their principall Cities were Gaza, Ascalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron: and the people of them called Gassai, Ascalonites, Azotites, Gethites, and Accaronites: Isidore affirms, that Ascalon was first called Philistim: and of that City the Country adjoining. But where Isidore had it, I know not.

The first knowne King of the Philistims, was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abraham's wife; with whom Abraham made a covenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gerar; but it is written that he was also King of the Philistims, in these words: Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech King of the Philistims unto Gerar. Now in regard that this or some ancienter Abimelech governed the commonwealth greatly to his glory, the rest of his successors called themselves by the same name. The Philistims commanded that Tract of Land upon the mediterranean Sea to the Northward, from the Castle of Pilgrims (otherwise Casarea Palestine, or Straton's Tower) which was the South border of Phenicia, to Gaza, or to the River of Egypt. The Anakims or strong Gyants were of these Philistims: and Goliath was of Geth, one of the five Cities above named. They had sometimes five Kings, saith Lyrannus. They mastered the Israelites at severall times above 150. yeeres, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakened by Sampson and Samuels; but in the end, this yoke was taken off by David, and laid on themselves.

It is objected, that because these Cities and the Countries adjoining, were held by the sons of Mizraim, therefore did the Israelites dispossesse the sons of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this saith Pererius, that although the Palestines or Philistims held it in the time of Joshua, yet at the time of the promise it was posselt by the Canaanites, as in the second of Deuteronomy. The Hevites dwelt in the Villages unto Gaza. And what marvel, if the Canaanites being the greater part the denomination were from them? For that the Philistims were of Caphtor, and so of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, besides Moses, the Prophet Hieremy witnesseth: The Lord will destroy the Philistims: the remnant of the issue of Caphtor: and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philistims are said to be the reliques of Caphtorim: Have not I brought up Israel out of the Land of Egypt, and the Philistims from Anei c. 9. v. 7. Caphtor, and Aram from Kir? So I read this place with divers of the learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, and Palestinos de Cappadocia, & Syros de Cyrene, this conversion Beroaldus condemneth, where Caphtor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a City directly West from Egypt, betwene Ptolomais or Barce and Apollonia: but Kir in Asia under the Assyrians: Junius hath it Kir, and not Cyrene: and so hath the Geneva.

But Peregrinus calls Caphtorim Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he mean Cappadocia in Palæstina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Pontus in the North of Asia the lesse. For whether they inhabited Sethreites, or Cappadocia of Palæstina, it is not certainly knowne. And sure in this manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa but for a place in Media. For it is written in the second of Kings, that Teglathphalzer King of the Assyrians carried away the inhabitants of Damafcus into Kir: and so Josephus seems to understand this Kir for Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene Media superior: for it was the manner and policy of the Assyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other Nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syramedia: because the Syrians by the Assyrians were therein captived.

§. XV.

Of the issue of Sem.

||. I

Of Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

It remaineth lastly to speake of the Sons of Sem, who are these:

1. Elam, or Elam,
2. Assur,
3. Arphaxad,
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

The posterity of Sem, Moses recounteth after the rest: because from them he proceeded in order with the Genealogie and Story of the Hebrewes: (For of Sem was Abraham descended.)

Of these five sons, the Scriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxad onely, and only the children of him & Aram; the rest are barely spoken of by rehearsal of their names, saying that it may be gathered, that Assur (who was supposed to found Ninive) was also said to be the Father of the Assyrians, whose issues, and the issues of Cham, instantly contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Assyrians, sometimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the virtue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also teacheth us that all the East parts of the World were peopled by Assur, Elam, and Lud (saying India) which I beleeve Noah himselfe first inhabited: and to whom Ophir and Haavilah the sons of Joſan afterward repaired, Hiflizi Sem ab Euphrate in partem Aſie uſq; ad Oceanum Indicum tenuerunt; These sons of Sem (saith S. Hierome) held all those Regions from Emphrates to the Indian Ocean.

Jof. Ant. l. 1. c. 7.

Cap. 8. vers. 2.

Ptol. Asia tab. 5.
Dan. 8. 2.

Of Elam came the Elamites, remembered, Abſ. 2. v. 9. and the Princes of Perſia; which name then began to be out of use and lost, when the Perſians became Masters of Babylonia; the East Monarchy being established in them. Some prophane writers distinguish Elam from Perſia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Suſa (which the Scriptures call Suſan) in Elam was the Kings ſeate of Perſia (witnesseth Daniel): And I saw (saith he) in a vision, and when I saw it, I was in the palace of Suſan, which is in the Province of Elam. This City is embraced by the River Euleus (according to Ptolomy) in Daniel, Ulat; and seated in the border of Suſiana.

Assur (as most Historians beleeve) the second son of Sem, was Father of the Assyrians, who disdaining the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Ninive, of equal beauty and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we ſhal in due place diſprove that opinion. Every mans hand hath bene in this Story, and therefore I ſhall not need herein to ſpeake much: for the Assyrians ſo often invaded and ſpoiled the Israelites, deſtroyed their Cities, and led them Captives, as both in Divine and Humane letters there is large, and often mention of this Nation.

But howſoever Herodotus and D. Scylax extend this Empire, and honour this Nation with with ample Dominion; yet was not the ſtate of the Assyrians of any ſuch power, after ſuch time as Sardanapalus loſt the Empire. For Senacherib, who was one of the powerfullſt Princes among them, had yet the mountain Taurus for the utmost of his Dominion toward the North-eaſt, and Syria bounded him toward the Weſt, notwithstanding theſe vaunts of Senacherib in Eſay the 37. Have the Gods of the Nations delivered them? of whom my Fathers have deſtroyed: as Gozan, and Haran, and Reſeph, and the children of Eden which were at Telaſſars Where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, and the King of the City Sebatnaim, Hena and Iuah? All theſe were indeed but petty Kings of Cities, and ſmall Countries, as Haran in Meſopotamia: Reſeph in Palmyrena: Hamath or Emath in Iwrea, under Libanus: the Ile of Eden: Seſpar, and others of this ſort. Yea, Nabuchodonosor, who was moſt powerfull, before the conqueſt of Egypt, had but Chaldea, Meſopotamia, and Syria, with Palæſtina, and Phœnicia, parts thereof. But in this queſtion of Assur, I will ſpeak my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whoſe plantation I have omitted among the reſt of the Chuſites, becauſe he eſtabliſhed the firſt Empire: from whom the moſt memorable ſtory of the World taketh beginning.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldeans, ſaith Saint Hierome and Joſephus; but it muſt be thoſe Chaldeans about Ur: for the ſons of Cham poſſeſt the reſt. It is true that he was the father of the Hebrewes: for Arphaxad begat Shela, and Shela, Heber, of whom hereafter.

And that Lud, the fourth ſon of Shem, gave name to the Lydians in Asia the leſſe, is the common opinion, taken from Joſephus and S. Hierome; but I ſee not by what reaſon he was moved to ſtraggel thither from his friends.

||. II.

Of Aram, and his Sons.

Aram the ſift and laſt Son of Shem was the Parent of the Syrians: of which Damaſcus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrus (ſaith Enſebius out of Joſephus) which Syrus lived before Moſes was borne; the ſame which others call the ſon of Apollo. Meſopotamia alſo being but a Province of Syria, had the name of Aram Nabarajim, which is as much to ſay, as Syria duorum ſuorum; Syria compaſſed with two Rivers, (to wit) Tygris and Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Meſopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram: and the Greeks Meſopotamia ſimply.

Arise and get thee to Padan Aram (saith Iſaac to Jacob) to the house of Bethuel thy mothers father, and thence take thee a wife. Strabo alſo remembereth it by the ancient name of Aram, or Aramea, as theſe his own words converted witneſſe: Quos nos Syros vocamus, ipſi Syri Aramœnos & Aramœos vocant; Thoſe which we call Syrians (saith he) themſelves call Aramœnians and Arameans.

Against this opinion, that Aram the ſon of Sem was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in general; (and not onely of thoſe in Syria Inter-Amnis, which is Meſopotamia) I ſome read, Gen. 22. 21. Kemuel, the Father of the Syrians: where others out of the original read Kemuel, the ſon of Aram. Neither is it any inconvenience for us to underſtand the word (Aram) here, not for the Nation, but for the name of ſome one of notes; the rather, becauſe in the hiſtory of Abraham and Iſaac (which was in time long before *Kemuel*s Poſterity could be famous) we finde Meſopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition: ſometimes with Nabarajim, and ſometimes of Padan, to diſtinguiſh it from another Aram, which (as it ſeemes) then alſo was called Aram. For whereas Iuſtus thinks in his notes upon Gen. 25. 20. that Padan Aram ought to be reſtrained to ſome part of Meſopotamia, (to wit) to that part which Ptolomy calls Ancobartitis (ſo called from the River Chaboras, which dividing it, runneth into Euphrates) the promiſcuall uſe of Padan Aram, and Aram Nabarajim (which latter appellation queſtionleſſe comprehends the whole Meſopotamia) may ſeem to refute this opinion: eſpecially ſeeing the ſignification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it ſignifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agreeth with this Region: becauſe the two Rivers, (as it were) yoked together goe along it. The Reliques of the name Padan appear in the name of two Cities in Ptolomy, called Abadana: (as Tunius hath well noted) the one upon Chaboras, the other upon Euphrates.

The sonnes of Aram were,
 Uz, Or Hus.
 Hul.
 Gether, and Mesob or Mes.

Hierom. in trad. Hebraic. Uz or Hus inhabited about Damascus, and built that City, saith Josephus and S. Hierome. But Josephus mistaking this opinion, both in them and in Lyra, who also followeth Josephus, affirmeth that Abrahams Steward Eliezer was the Founder thereof; though it were likely that Hus the eldest son of Aram dwelt near unto his father, who inhabited the body of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the same, adjoining to Arabia the Desert, & 10 to Damanea or Tracoonitis, whereof the Prophet Hieremy: Rejoyce and be glad O daughter of Edom that dwellest in the Land of Hus. Hus therefore is seated beyond Jordan, in the East Region of Tracoonitis, adjoining to Basan, having Batanea Golanitis, and the Mountain Seir to the East, Edrai to the South, Damascus North, and Jordan West: having in it many Cities and people, as may also be gathered out of Hieremy: And all sorts of people and all the Kings of the Land of Hus. In this Region dwelt Job, descended of Hus, the son of Nabor, the brother of Abrahams (saith St. Hierome) and married Dina the daughter of Jacob, saith Philo.

Hierom. Lam. Cap. 4. vers. 21.

Cap. 25. v. 20.

Hul the second son of Aram, S. Hierome makes the Father of the Armenians, and Gether the third son, Parent to the Acarnanians, or Carians: which opinion, (because I finde not where to set him) I do not disprove, though I see no reason why Gether should leave the fellowship of his own brethren, and dwell among strangers in Asia the less. Junius gives Hul (whom he writes Chul) the Desert of Palmyrena, as far as Euphrates, where Ptolemy setteth the City of Cholle.

Gether (saith Josephus) founded the Baſtrians: but Josephus gave all Noabs children feathers, to carry them far away in all haſt. For mine own opinion, I alwaies keep the rule of Neighbourhood, and think with Junius (to wit) That Gether seated himself near his brothers, in the body of Syria, and in the Province of Caſſiotis, and Selencis, where Ptolemy placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Pliny called Gindareni.

Junius also giveth to Mes or Mesob the North part of Syria, between Cilicia and Mesopotamia, near the mountain Masfus. The certainty of those Plantations can no otherwise be known than by this probability, that Aram the Father (of whom that great Region took name) planted his sons in the same Land about him: for he wanted no Scope of Territory for himself and them; neither then when the World was newly planted, nor in many hundred years after: and therefore there is no reason to cast them in the desert parts of the World, so far asunder. And as necessity and policie held them together for a while; so ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children, set them asunder. For although these sons of Aram, and the sons of the rest of Noabs children, kept themselves within the bounds of some or large Kingdomes; yet therein every one also sought a Province apart, and to themselves; giving to the Cities therein built their own names, thereby to leave their memory to their Posterity: the use of letters being then rare, and known to few.

In this sort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Provinces: every one emulating and disdainning the greatness of other, as they are thereby to this day subject to invasion, expulsion, and destruction: so as (Nova Hispania and Peru excepted, because those Countries are inaccessible to strangers) an easie force will cast them out of all the rest.

Chap. 8. Sect. 7.

Mes the fourth son is made the Parent of the Maonians: of whom something hath bin spoken already. Arphaxad the third son of Shem, begat Shelah, and Heber. Heber had two sons, Phaleg and Joſſan: and in Phalegs time was the Earth divided.

III.

Of the division of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sonnes of Heber, of the issue of Sem.

THE many people which at the division (at Phalegs birth) were then living, and the through Plantation of all the East part of the World (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the Earth were divided at either. The Hebrewes (saith Pererius out of Sedar Holam, one of their Chronicles) affirm that this partition happened at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was borne in the year after the flood 101. and lived in all 239. years, which numbers added, makes 340. And therefore was it so many years after the flood, ere the children of Noah severed themselves. But to this opinion of the Hebrews, and the doubt they make how in so few years as 101. (the time of Phalegs birth) so many people could be increased, Pererius gives this answer, That if 70. persons of the Family of Jacob increased to 60000. fighting men in 215. years, (besides women, children, and impotent persons) how much more is it likely, that so soon after the Flood the children of Noah might in a shorter time bring forth many multitudes, having received the blessing of God, Increase and multiply, and fill the earth? What strength this answer hath, let others judge: for the children of Israel were 70. and had 215. years time: and the sons of Noah were but three, and had but 101. years of time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceive that Phaleg took that name after the division, in memory thereof: as Josephus and S. Auguſtine, who reason in this manner. If the division were at Phalegs death (which happened in the year, which is commonly held to be the 48. of Abrahams, but was by more likely computation 12. years before his birth) then was the division 38. years after Nimus, who governed 52. years: in the 43. year of whose Reigne Abraham was borne. But when Nimus began to rule the Assyrians, 80. years before this division (as this division is placed by the Hebrewes, Hierome and Chrysostome) then was the earth so peopled in all the East and Northern parts, as greater numbers have not been found at any time since. For Nimus associating to himself Arius King of Arabia, a people who at that time (saith Diod. Siculus) plurimum opibus atq; armis præstabant, Exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, subdued many Cities in Armenia; received Bazaras into grace; then invaded Media, and crucified Pharnus the King thereof, with his Wife and seven Children; vanquished all those Regions between Nilus and Tanais, the Egyptians, Phœnicians, the Kingdomes of Syria, and all the Nations of Persia, to the Hyrcanian Sea. For the numbers which followed Nimus (already remembered out of Ctesias) against Zoroaster and others: and Zoroaster on the other side, who made resistance with 400000. prove it sufficiently, that if the division had not happened before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no division at that time at all. For some of them were so ill satisfied with their partitions, as they sought to be masters of all, and greater Armies were there never gathered than by Nimus and Semiramis: wherefore in this opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

Per. in Gen. lib. 15. c. 10.

But for that conceit, that if the division had been made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then sufficient numbers borne to fill the earth: It was never meant that the earth could be filled every where at the very instant, but by times & degrees. And surely whatsoever mens opinions have been herein, yet it is certaine, that the division of tongues and of men must goe neare together with the ceasing of the work at Babel: and that the enterprife of Babel was left off instantly upon the confusion of Languages, where followed the execution of the division; and so neither at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was borne in the year 101. after the Flood, which was the year that Nimrod came into Shinaar, or ten years after he arrived, saith Berofus.

Now if it be objected that Phaleg (the Etymology of whose name signifieth division) must have lived without a name, except the name had bin given him at the time of this confusion and partition: to this objection it may be answered, That the change of names upon divers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures: for Jacob was called Israel after he had wrestled with the Angel; Abraham was first Abram; and Edom, Esau; and 50 that Phaleg being a principal man in this division had his first name upon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly, whereas the Hebrewes, Saint Hierome and Chrysostome account Heber for a great Prophet, if that by giving his sonne the name of Phaleg, he foretold the division which followed: to this I say, I doe not finde that Heber deserved any such honour, if he had thereupon so called his sonne: for division and dispersion followeth increase of people of necessity; and this Propheſie (if any such had been) might also have reference to the division, which afterwards fell amongst the Hebrewes themselves.

But if we give a reasonable time to the building of the Tower and City of Babel, in which time many people (by reason and by demonstrative proof) might be increased: and that upon the fall thereof the confusion and division followed (whereupon Phaleg took name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous.

||. IV.

Of the sonnes of Jochan, the other sonne of Heber.

1. Elmodad.
2. Saleph, or Salep, or Sheleph.
3. Asamath, or Chatzar.
4. Jare, or Jaraab, or Jerath.
5. Hadoram.
6. Uzal, or Uxal.
7. Dicklach, or Diela.
8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.
9. Abimael.
10. Sheba, or Seba.
11. Ophir, or Opir.
12. Havilah, or Chavila, and 13. Jobab.

The sonnes of Jochan were,

Al those sonnes of Jochan (according to Saint Hierome) dwelled in the East parts of the World, or India, even from the River Cophe or Chos, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certain places of those thirteen sonnes cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Moses being general: And their dwelling was from Melba as thou goest unto Separ a Mount in the East. Of all these thirteen Sons, there were only three memorable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Havilah. Concerning whose names, to avoid confusion, it is to be observed, that among the sons of Chus, two of them had also the names of Sheba and Havilah. Abraham had also a third Saba, or Sheba, his grand-child by his wife Keturah. But Seba the son of Chus, and Sheba the sonne of Rhegusa his Nephew, we have left in Arabia felix: and Havilah the son of Chus upon Tygris. Saba the grand-child of Abraham was (as some have thought) the Father of the Sabeans in Persia: of which Nations Dionysius de Orbis sin maketh mention. Primum Sabaei; post hoc sunt Passagarde; prope vero hoc sunt Tascti: The first are Sabeans; after these be Passagarde; and near these the Tascti. And whereas it is written: But unto the Sonnes of the Concubine which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and sent them away from Iaac his sonne (while he yet lived) Eastward to the East-Country: Hereupon it is supposed, that this Saba the son of Abraham wandered into Persia: for Persia was accounted the furthestmost East-Country in respect of Judea; which also Ovid setteth under the Sun-rising. Yet seeing the rest of Abraham's sons seated themselves on the borders of Judea, I rather chool to leave Saba the sonne of Abraham in Arabia the Desert, where Protony setteth a Citie of that name.

But Saba the son of Jochan, the son of Heber, (as I conceive) inhabited India it selfe. For Dionysius after in his Periegesis, (or description of the World) which he wrote in Greek verse, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabei. Taxilis hoc inter medius habitatis Sabeis; In the middle of these dwell the Sabei, and the Taxili, saith Dionysius.

||. V.

Of Ophir one of Jochan's sons, and of Peru, and of that voyage of Solomon.

Ophir also was an inhabitant of the East India, and (as S. Hierome understands it) in one of the Islands plentiful with gold, which are now known by the name of Moluccas. Josephus understands Ophir to be one of those great head-lands in India, which by a general name are called Chersonese, or Peninsule: of which there are two very notorious; Calicut and Malacoe. Peruvius takes it rightly for an Island, as S. Hierome doth, but but he sets it at the head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the *Ado*uccas farther East.

Arias Montanus out of the second of Chronicler, the third Chapter and sixth Verse, gathers that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the West Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, or the South Sea; by others, Mare pacificum. The words in the second of the Chronicler are these: And he over-layed the house with precious stones for beauty; and the gold was gold of Parvaim. Junius takes this gold to be the gold of Havilah, remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise: And the gold of that Land is good: finding a Town in Characene a Province of Susiana, called Barbatia; so called (as he thinks) by corruption for Parvaim: from whence those Kings subjected by David, brought this gold, with which they presented him; and which David preserved for the enriching of the Temple.

But this fancy of Peru hath deceived many men, before Montanus, and Plessir, who also took Ophir for Peru. And that this question may be a subject of no further disputes, it is very true that there is no Region in the world of that name: sure I am, that at least, America hath none, no not any City, Village, or Mountain so called. But when Francis Pizarro first discovered those Lands to the South of Panama, arriving in that Region which Atabaliba commanded (a Prince of magnificence, riches, and dominion inferior to none) some of the Spaniards utterly ignorant of that language, demanding by signs (as they could) the name of the Country, and pointing with their hand athwart a river or torrent, or brook that ran by, the Indians answered Peru, which was either the name of that brook, or of water in general. The Spaniards thereupon conceiving that the people had rightly understood them, set it down in the Diurnal of their enterprise, and so in the first description made, and sent over to Charles the Emperor, all that west part of America to the South of Panama had the name of Peru, which hath continued ever since, as divers Spaniards in the Indies assured me; which also Acosta the Jesuite in his natural and moral History of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus also findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Jucatan) took that name of Jochan, who as he supposed navigated from the utmost East of India to America: it is most true, that Jucatan is nothing else in the language of that Country, but [What is that?] or [What say you?] For when the Spaniards ask'd the name of that place (no man conceiving their meaning) one of the salvages answered Jucatan (which is) [What ask you?] or [What say you?] The like happened touching Paria, a mountainous Country on the South side of Trinidad, and Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men doe) the names of those new Regions which they discovered, pointed to the Hills afar off, one of the people answered, Paria, which is as much to say, as, high Hills or Mountains. For at Paria begins that marvellous ledge of mountains, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan, from eight degrees of North latitude to the 52. of South: and so hath that Country ever since retained the name of Paria.

The same happened among the English, which I sent under Sir Richard Greenville to inhabit Virginia. For when some of my people asked the name of that Country, one of the salvage answered, Wingandacon, which is as much to say, as You wear good clothes, or gay clothes. The same happened to the Spaniard in asking the name of the Island Trinidad: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that self place which the Sea encompassed, they answered, Caez, which signifieth an Island. And in this manner have many places, newly discovered, been intituled, of which Peru is one. And therefore we must leave Ophir among the Moluccas, whereabout such an Island is credibly affirmed to be.

Now although there may be found gold in Arabia it self (towards Persia) in Havilah, now Susiana, and all alongst that East Indian shore; yet the greatest plenty is taken up so at the Philippines, certain Islands planted by the Spaniards, from the East India. And by the length of the passage which Solomon's Ships made from the Red Sea (which was 3. years in going and coming) it seemeth they went to the uttermost East, as the Moluccas or Philippines. Indeed these that now goe from Portugal, or from hence, finish that navigation in two years, and sometimes less: and Solomon's Ships went not above a tenth part of this our course from hence. But we must consider, that they evermore kept the coast, and crept by the shores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the use of the compass was known, it was impossible to navigate athwart the Oceans, and therefore Solomon's Ships could not finde Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for the Spaniards themselves (had it not been for the plenty of gold in the East India Islands, farre above the mines of any one place of America) to sail every year to the West part of America thither, and there to have strongly planted, and inhabited the richest of those Islands: wherein they have built a City called Manila. Solomon therefore needed not to have gone farther off than ophr in the East, to have sped worse: neither could he navigate from the East to the West in those dayes, whereas he had no coast to have guided him.

Tostatus also gathereth a fantastical opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Opbir to be a Country, whose mountains of gold are kept by Griffins: which mountaines Solinus affirmed to be in Scythia Asiatica, in these words: Nam cum auro & gemmis affluant, Griffes tenent univ[er]sas, alites ferocissim[as], Arimafsi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas these Countries abound in gold and rich stones, the Griffins defend the one and the other: a kinde of Fowle the fiercest of all other; with which Griffins a nation of people called Arimafsi make War. These Arimafsi are said to have been men with one eye onely, like unto the Cyclopes of Sicilia: of which Cyclopes, Herodotus and Aristus make mention: and so doth Lucan in his third Book: and I alernus Flaccus: and D. Siculus in the story of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine own opinion) I beleve none of them. And for these Arimafsi, I take it that this name signifying one-eyed, was first given them by reason that they used to wear a vizzard of defence, with one sight in the middle to serve both eies; and not that they had by nature any such defect. But Solinus borroweth these things out of Pliny, who speaks of such a nation in the extreame North, at a place called Gisolithon, or the Cave of the North-east winde. For the rest, as all fables were commonly grounded upon some true stories, or other things done: so might these tales of the Griffins receive this moral: That if those men, which fight against so many dangerous passages for gold, or other riches of this World, had their perfect senses, and were not deprived of halfe their eye-sight (at least of the eye of right reason and understanding) they would content themselves with a quiet and moderate estate; and not subject themselves to famine, corrupt air, violent heat, and cold, and to all sorts of miserable diseases. And though this fable be feigned in this place, yet if such a tale were told of some other places of the World, where wilde Beasts or Serpents defend mountains of gold, it might be avowed. For there are in many places of the World, especially in America, many high and impassable mountains, which are very rich and full of gold, inhabited onely with Tigers, Lions, and other ravenous and cruel beasts: unto which if any man ascend (except his strength be very great) he shall be sure to finde the same war which the Arimafsi make against the Griffins: not that the one or other had any sense of the gold, or seek to defend that mettall, but being disquieted, or made afraid of themselves or their young ones, they grow iraged and adventurous. In like sort it may be said that the Alegartos, (which the Egyptians call the Crocodyles) defend those pearls which lye in the Lakes of the Inland: for many times the poor Indians are eaten up by them, when they dive for the pearl. And though the Alegartos know not the pearl, yet they find favour in the flesh and blood of the Indians, whom they devour.

ll. V I.

of Havilah the sonne of Joſtan, who also passed into the East Indies: and of Melſa and Sepher named in the bordering of the Families of Joſtan: with a conclusion of this discourse touching the plantation of the World.

OF Havilah the sonne of Joſtan, there is nothing else to be said, but that the general opinion is, that he also inhabited in the East India in the Continent, from which Opbir past into the Islands adjoining. And whereas Ganges is said to water Havilah, it is meant by Havilah in the East India, whose took name of Havilah the son of Joſtan: but Havilah, which Pijon compasseth, was so called of Havilah, the son of Chush, as is formerly proved by this place of Scripture: Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah as thou comest to Shur, which is before Egypt. But that Saul ever made War in the East India, no man hath suspected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteen sons of Joſtan, these three, Saba, Havilah, and Opbir, though at the first seated by their brethren about the hill Mafius or Mesb, Gen. 10. 30. (to wit) between Cilicia and Mesopotamias yet at length either themselves or their issues removed into the East India, leaving the other other Families of Joſtan, to fill the Countries of their first plantation, which the Scripture defines to have been from Mesb unto Sepear. And although S. Hierome take Mesb to be a Region of the East India, and Sepear a Mountain of the same (which Mountain, Montanus would have to be the Andes in America) those fancies are far beyond my understanding. For the word (East) in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to Judea, is never farther extended than into Persia. But Mesb is that part of the Mountaine of Mafius in the North of Mesopotamia, out of which the River Chaboras springeth, which runneth by Charra: and in the same Region we also finde for Sepear (remembered by Moses) Sippara by Polony, standing to the East of the Mountain Mafius; from whence Joſtan having many sons, some of them might pass into India, hearing of the beauty and riches thereof. But this was in proceſſe of time.

The other fashion of planting I understand not, being grounded but upon mens imaginations, contrary to reason and possibility. And that this Mountain in the East was no farther off than in those Regions before remembered, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the same phrase is used: as in Numbers 25. Bala the King of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the mountaine of the East; which was from the East part of Mesopotamia. For Bala brought Balaam out of Mesopotamia, (witness this place of Deuteronomie: Because they hired Balaam the sonne of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Nabarajim, to curse thee: for Aram Nabarajim was Syria finiorum, which is Mesopotamia, as Cap. 23. ver. 4.

This plantation of the World after the flood doth best agree (as to me it seems) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And these be the reports of reason and probable conjecture; the guides which I have followed herein, and which I have chosen to goe after; making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their own fancies, be they ancient or moderne. Neither have I any end herein, private or publick, other than the discovery of truth. For as the partiality of man to himself hath disguised all things: so the factious and hireling Historians of all Ages (especially of these latter times) have by their many volumes of untrue reports left Honour without a monument, and Vertue without memory; and (in stead thereof) have erected Statues and Trophies to those, whom the darkeſt forgetfulness ought to have buried, & covered over for evermore. And although the length & disolving nature of time hath worn out or changed the names and memory of the Worlds first planters after the flood, (I mean the greatest number and most part of them) yet all the footsteps of Antiquity (as appears by that which hath been spoken) are not quite worn out nor over-grown: for Babylon hath to this day the sound of Babel; Phenicia hath Zidon, to which City the eldest son of Canaan gave name; so hath Cilicia, Tharſis; and the Armenians, Medes, Hiberians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumeans, Libyans, Moors, and other Nations, have preserved from the death of forgetfulness some signes of their first Founders and true Parents.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Government.

§ I.

Of the proceeding from the first Government under the eldest of Families to Regall, and from Regall absolute, to Regall tempered with Lawes.

IT followeth now to entreat how the World began to receive Rule and Government, which (while it had scarcitie of people) under-went no other Dominion than Paternity and Eldership. For the Fathers of Nations were then 23 Kings, and the eldest of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was alwayes used both for the Magistrate, and for those of Age and Gravity: the same bearing one signification almost in all Languages. For in the eleventh of Numbers, God commanded Moses to gather together 70. of the Elders of the people, and

Gover-

Governour over them: the Hebrew bearing the same sense which the Latine word Senes or Seniores doth. So it is written in Susanna, Then the Assembly beleved them as those that were the Elders and Judges of the people. And so in the words of those false Judges and witnesses to Daniel, Shew it unto us, seeing God hath given thee the office of an Elder. Demosthenes useth the same word for the Magistrate among the Grecians. Cicero in Cato giveth two other reasons for this appellation: Apud Lacedaemonios qui amplissimum Magistratum gerunt, ut sunt, sic etiam appellantur Senes; Among the Lacedaemonians the chiefe Magistrates, as they were, so they are called Eldermen: and again, Ratio & prudentia nisi essent in senibus, non summum Concilium Majores nostri appellarent Senatum; If reason and aduancement were not in old men, our Ancestours had never called the highest Councell by the name of a Senate.

But though these reasons may well be given, yet we doubt not but in this name of (Elders) for Governours or Counsellours of State, there is a sign that the first Governours were the Fathers of Families; and under them the eldest Sons. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard take the word (Signor) and out of it (Seignourie) for Lordship and Dominion: signifying (according to Loyseau) puissance in propriete, or proper power. The kinds of this Seignourie, Seneca makes two: the one, Potestas aut imperium, Power or command: the other, Proprietas aut dominium; Propriety or mastership: the correlative of the one is the subject of the other the slave. Ad Caesarem (saith he) potestas omnium pertinet; ad singulas proprietas; Caesar hath power over all, and every man professeth his owne: and again, Caesar omnia imperio possidet, singuli dominio; Caesar holdeth all in his power, and every man possesseth his owne. But as men and vice began abundantly to increase: fo obedience (the fruit of natural reverence, which but from excellent feed seldome ripeneth) being exceedingly over-shadwed with pride, and ill examples, utterly withered and fell away. And the soft weapons of paternal perswasions (after mankind began to neglect and forget the Original and first giver of life) became in all over-weak, either to resist the first inclination of evill, or after (when it became habitual) to constrain it. So that now, when the hearts of men were onely guided and steered by their own fancies, and toft to and fro on the tempestuous Seas of the World, while wisdom was severed from power, and strength from charity: Necessity (which bindeth every nature but the immortal) made both the wife and foolish understand at once, that the estate of reasonable men would become far more miserable than that of beasts, and that a general floud of confusion would a second time over-flow them, did they not, by a general obedience to order and dominion, prevent it. For the mighty, who trusted in their own strengths, found others again (by interchange of times) more mighty than themselves: the feeble fell under the forcibles; and the equal from equal received equal harms. In somuch that the licentious disorder (which seemed to promise a liberty upon the first acquaintance) proved upon a better trial, no less perillous than unindurable bondage.

These Arguments by Necessity propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed, perswaded all nations which the Heavens cover, to subject themselves to a Master, & to Magistracy in some degree. Under which Government, as the change (which brought with it lesse evill, than the former mischiefs) was generally pleasing: so time (making all men wise that observe it) found some imperfection and corrolive in this cure. And therefore the same Necessity which invented, and the same Reason which approved soveraign power, bethought it self of certain equall rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundles) might also discern her own limits. For before the invention of Lawes, private affections in supream Rulers made their own fancies both their Treasurers and Hangmen: measuring by this yard, and waighing in this ballance, both good and evill.

Foras wisdom in Eldership preceded the rule of Kings; so the will of Kings forewent the inventions of Lawes. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur: arbitria principum pro legibus erant; The people were not governed by any other lawes than the wils of Princes. Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to be good, neither did those mens vertues value them which were not fancied by their Kings, nor those mens vices deforme them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt; Love sees one while too much, another while stark nothing. Hence it came to passe, that after a few yeares (for direction and restraint of Royal power) Lawes were established: and that Government which

firmum iudici-um, & immutabilis providen-

had this mixture of equality (holding in an even ballance supreme power and common right) acquired the title of Regall: the other (which had it not) was knowne for Tyrannicall: the one God established in favour of his people: the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancy of this Regall authority, Princes as they were chosen for their vertues onely, so did they measure their powers by a great deale of moderation. And therefore (saith Fabius Pictor) Principes, quia iusti erant, & religionibus dediti, jure habiti Dii & dii; Princes because they were just and religious, were rightly accounted and called Gods.

And though (speaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be ascribed to Reason and Necessity; yet it was God himself that first kindled this light in the mindes of men, whereby they saw that they could not live and be preserved without a Ruler and Conductor: God himselfe by his eternall providence having ordained Kings; and the law of Nature Leaders, and Rulers over others. For the very Bees have their Prince; the Deere their Leaders; and Cranes (by order imposed) watch for their owne safety.

The most High beareth rule over the Kingdomes of Men; and appointeth over it whomsoever he pleaseth. By me (saith Wisdom, spoken by the Ion of God) Kings reigne; By me Princes rule; and it is God (saith Daniel) that setteth up Kings, and taketh away Kings. And that this power is given from God, Christ himselfe witnesseth, speaking to Pilate; Thou couldst have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above.

It was therefore by a threefold Justice that the World hath beene governed from the beginning, (to wit) by a Justice natural: by which the Parents and Elders of Families governed their Children, and Nephewes, and Families; in which government the Obedience was called naturall Piety: Again, by a Justice divine drawne from the Lawes and Ordinances of God; and the Obedience hereunto was called Conscience: And lastly, by a Justice civill, begotten by both the former; and the Obedience to this we call Duty. That by these three thofe of the eldest times were commanded, and that the rule in generall was Paternall, it is most evident: for Adam, being Lord over his own Children, instructed them in the service of God his Creator; as we read, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had beene taught by their Parent, the 30 Father of Mankind.

¶ II.

Of the three commendable sorts of Government with their opposites: and of the degrees of humane society.

What other Policy was exercised, or State founded after such time as mankind was greatly multiplied before the Floud, it cannot be certainly knowne, though it seeme by probable conjecture, that the same was not without Kings in that first Age: it being possible that many Princes of the Egyptians (remembered among their antiquities) were before the generall Floud: and very likely, that the cruell Oppressions in that Age proceeded from some tyranny in Government, or from some rougher forme of Rule, than the Paternall.

Berosus ascribeth the rule of the World in those dayes to the Gyants of Libanus, who mastered (saith he) all Nations from the Sun-rising to the Sun-set. But in the second Age of the World, and after such times as the rule of Elderhip failed, three severall sorts of Government were in severall times established among men, according to the divers natures of Places and People.

The first, the most ancient, most general, and most approved, was the Government of one, ruling by just Lawes, called Monarchy: to which Tyranny is opposed, being also a sole and absolute Rule, exercised according to the will of the Commander, without respect or observation of the Lawes of God, or Men. For a lawfull Prince or Magistrate (saith Aristotle) is the Keeper of Right and Equity: and of this condition ought every Magistrate to be, according to the rule of Gods word: Judges and Officers shall thus make their City: And these shall judge the people with righteous judgement.

The second Government, is of divers principal Persons established by order, and ruling by Lawes, called Aristocracy, or Optimum potestas; to which Oligarchia (or the particular faction and usurpation of a few great-ones) is opposed: as the Decem viri, or Triumviri, and the like.

The third is a State popular, (or Government of the people) called Democratia, to which is opposed Ochlocratia, or the turbulent unjust ruling of the confused multitude, seditiously swaying the State, contrary to their own Lawes and Ordinances. These three kinds of Government are briefly exprest by Tholofanus; unius, paucorum, & multorum: Of one, of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of policy since the second increase of mankind, the same grew in this sort: First of all, every Father, or eldest of the Family gave Lawes to his owne issues, and to the people from him and them increased. These, as they were multiplied into many households (man by nature loving society) joynted their Cottages together in one common Field or Village, which the Latins call Vicius of the 10 Greek βύα, which signifieth a House; or of the word (Via) because it hath divers waies and paths leading to it. And as the first House grew into a Village, so the Village into that which is called Pagus, (being a society of divers Villages) so called of the Greeke πάγος which signifieth a Fountaine: because many people (having their habitations not far asunder) dranke of one Spring or Streame of water. To this word the English Hundreds, or (as some thinke) Shires, answereth not unfitly.

But as men and impiety began to gather strength, and as emulation and pride between the Race of the one and the other daily increased: so both to defend themselves from out-rage, and to preserve such goods as they had gathered, they began to joyne and set together divers of their Villages, inwironing them first with banks and ditches, 20 and afterwards with wals: which, being so compalled, were then called oppida; either ab opponendo se hostibus, because wals were opposed against Enemies; or ab opibus, because thither they gathered their riches for safety and defence: as also they were called Urbes, or urbes, because when they were to build a City, they made a Circle with a Plough (saith Varro) therewith measuring and compassing the ground which they went to inclose or fortifie. And although Urbs and Civitas be often confounded, yet the difference was anciently in this, that Urbs signified no other than the very wals and buildings, and Civitas was taken for the Citizens, inhabiting therein: so called of Civis, and that, ab eo quod multitudo coivit, of coming together. But all inhabitants within these wals are not properly Citizens, but only such as are called Free-men: who bearing proportionably the charge 30 of the City, may by turnes become Officers and Magistrates thereof: the rest goe under the name of Subjects, though Citizens by the same generall name of Subjects are also known. For every Citizen is also a Subject but not every Subject a Citizen: perhaps also some Citizen (as the chiefe Magistrate, if he be to be termed one of the Citizens) is no Subject; but of this we neede not stand to inquire. The word (Magistrate) is taken Magistro, from a Master, and the word (Master) from the Adverb Magis (as also Magisteria, Precepts, of Art) or else from the Greeke word (Μεγιστος); and so the Greekes call them Magistratus whom the Latines call Magnates, or Magistratus.

The office and duty of every Magistrate Aristotle hath written in few words. A Magistrate or Prince (saith he) is the keeper of right and equity; but the same is best taught by 40 Saint Paul, who expresth both the cause efficient, and finally, (that is) by whom Magistrates and Princes are ordained, together with their duties and office. A Magistrate is the Minister of God for thy wealth; but if thou doe evil, feare: for he beareth not the sword for nought. For he is the Minister of God, to take vengeance on him that doth evil. He also teacheth in the same place; That every soule ought to be subject to the higher powers, because they are by God ordained, and that whosoever resisteth that power, resisteth God, the giver and fountaine thereof: and shall not only be therefore subject to the judgment and condemnation of Man, but of God: For ye must be subject (saith he) not because of wrath onely, but also for conscience sake.

The examples are not to be numbered of Gods punishments upon those that have resisted Authority, by God ordained and established. Neither ought any subject therefore to resist the power of Kings, because they may be taxed with injustice or cruelty: for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a tyrannous hand: and the Commandement of obedience is without distinction. The Prophets and Christ himselfe subjected themselves to the power of Magistracy. Christ commanded that all due to Caesar should be given unto him: and he payed Tribute for himselfe and Peter. Hieremy commanded the Israelites (even those that were Captives under Heathen Kings) to pray for them and for the peace of Babylon. So Abraham prayed for Abimelech; and Jacob blessed the King of of Egypt: And it is acceptable in the sight of our Saviour (saith Paul) that ye make Supplications and Prayers for Kings, and for all that are in authority: and if for such Kings as were Idolatrous, much more for Christian Kings and Magistrates. And so much did Saint Chrysostome in his Homily to the people prefer Monarchicall Government, as he rather commended the rule of Kings (though Tyrants) than that they should be wanting: Præstat Regem tyrannum habere, quàm nullum; Better a tyrannous King, than no King: to which also Tacitus subscribeth: Præstat (saith Tacitus in the first of his History) sub malo principe esse, quàm nullo; It is better to have a bad Prince than none at all. And be they good Kings (which is generally presupposed) then is there no liberty more safe, than to serve them: 10 Neque enim libertas tutior ulla est (saith Claudian) quàm Domino servire bono: No liberty (saith he) more safe for us than to be servants to the veritious. And certainly howsoever it may be disputed, yet is it safer to live under one Tyrant, than under 100000. Tyrants: under a wife man that is cruel, than under the foolish and barbarous cruelty of the multitude. For as Aegislavus answered a Citizen of Sparta that desired an alteration of the Government, That kinde of rule which a man would disdain in his owne house, were very unfit to governe great Regions by.

Lastly, as many Fathers erected many Cotages for their many children: and as (for the reason before remembered) many Households joynted themselves together, and made Villages; many Villages made Cities: so when these Cities and Citizens joynted together, and established Laws by consent, associating themselves under one Governor, and Government; they so joynted, were called a Common-wealth: the same being sometimes governed by Kings; sometimes by Magistrates; sometimes by the people themselves.

§. III

Of the good Government of the first Kings.

Now this first Age after the Floud, and after such time as the people were increased, and Families became strong, and the dispersed into several parts of the world, 30 was by ancient Historians called Golden: Ambition and Covetousness being as then but green, and newly grown up, the seeds and effects whereof were as yet but potential, and in the blowth and bud. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then sought for no larger Territory than themselves could compass and manure: they erected no other magnificent buildings, than sufficient to defend them from cold and tempest: they cared for no other delicacy of fare, or curiositie of dyet, than to maintain life: nor for any other apparel, than to cover them from the cold, the raine and the Sun.

And sure if we understand by that Age (which was called Golden) the ancient simplicity of our Fore-fathers, this name may then truly be cast upon those elder times: 40 but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the same may be attributed more to any one time than to another, (I mean to one limited time and none else) it may be doubted. For good and Golden Kings make good and Golden Ages: and all times have brought forth of both sorts. And as the infancy of Empery, (when Princes played their Prizes, and did then only woo men to obedience) might be called the Golden Age; so may the beginning of all Princes times be truly called Golden. For be it that men affect honour, it is then best purchased; or if honour affect men, it is then that good deservings have commonly the least impediments: and if ever Liberality overflow her banks and bounds, the same is then best warranted both by policy and example. But Age and Time do not only harden and shrink the openest and most jovial hearts, but the experience which it bringeth with it, layeth Princes torne citsates before their eyes, and (withal) perswadeth them to compassionate themselves. And although there be no Kings under the Sun whose means are answerable unto other mens desires: yet such as value all things by their own respects, do no sooner finde their appetites unanswered, but they complain of alteration, and account the times injurious and iron. And as this falleth out in the Reign of every King, so doth it in the life of every man, if his daies be many: for our younger years are our Golden Age; which being eaten up by time, we praise those seasons which our youth accompanied: and (indeed) the grievous alterations in our selves, and the pains and diseases which never part from us but at the grave grave, make the times seem fo differing and displeasing: especially the quality of mans nature being also such, as it adoreth and extolleth the passages of the former, and condemneth the present fstate how juſt ſoever : Fit humane malignitatis vitio, ut ſemper vetera in laude, præſentia in ſatidio ſint; It comes to paſſ (ſaith Tacitus) by the vice of our nature, that we alwaies extoll the time paſt, and hold the preſent fatidious: For it is one of the errors of wayward Age : Quod ſunt laudatores temporis ædii That they are praiſers of the fore-paſſed timer, forgetting this advice of Solomon : Say not then, Why is it that the former duries were better then theſe ? for thou doeſt not inquire wiſely of this thing : to which purpoſe Seneca ; Majores noſtri queſiti ſunt, & nos querimus poſteri queruntur, exorſos, eſſe mores, regerenda nequitiam, in deterius res hominum & in omne meſas labi : Our Anceſtors have complained we do complain, our children will complain, that good manners are gone, that wickedneſſe doth reign, and all things grow worſe and worſe, and fall into all evil. Theſe are usually the diſcourſes of Age and Miſfortune. But hereof what can we add to this of Arminius : Novares quondam; vetus fiet, & vetus temporibus : quibus cepit nova ſuit & repentina. What-foever is new, in time ſhall be made old : and the ancientſt things when they took beginning were alſo new and ſodayn. Wherefore not to ſtand in much admiration of theſe firſt times, which the diſcontentment of preſent times have made Golden, this we may ſet down for certain. That as it was the virtue of the firſt Kings, which (after God) gave them Crowns : ſo the love of their people thereby purchaſed, held the ſame Crowns on their heads. And as God gave the obedience of Subjects to Princes : ſo (relatively) he gave^{to} the care and juſtiſc of Kings to the Subjects ; having reſpect, not only to the Kings themſelves, but even to the meanelt of his Creatures : Nunquam particulari bono ſervit omne bonum; The infinite goodneſſe of God doth not attend any one only : for he that made the ſmall and great, careth for all alike : and it is the care which Kings have of all theirs, which makes them beloved of all theirs ; and by a general love it is, that Princes hold a general obedience : For, Poteſtas humana radicatur in voluntatibus hominum. All humane power is rooted in the will or diſpoſitions of men.

§. IV.

Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vain vaunt thereof without virtue.

And with this Supreme Rule and Kingly authority began also other degrees and differences among Subjects. For Princes made election of others by the same Rule, by which themselves were chosen; unto whom they gave place, trust, and power. From which employments and Offices sprung those Titles, and those degrees of Honour, which have continued from Age to Age to these daies. But this Nobility, difference from the vulgar, was not in the beginning given to the Succession of Blood, but to Succession of Virtue, as hereafter may be proved. Though at length it was sufficient for those whose Parents were advanced, to be known for the Sons of such Fathers: and so there needed then no endeavour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excell, upon whom glory or worldly Nobility necessarily descended. Yet hereof had Nobility denomination in the beginning. That such as excelled others in virtue, were so called: Hinc dictus Nobilis, quasi virtute præ aliis notabilis. But after such time as the deserved Honour of the Father was given in reward to his Posterity, Saint Hierome judged of the Succession in this manner: Nihil aliud video in Nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod Nobiliter quadam necessitate constringantur, ut ab antiquorum probitate degenerent; I see no other thing to be affected in Nobility, than that Noblemen are by a kind of necessity bound, not to degenerate from the virtue of their Ancestors. For if Nobility be Virtue & antique divitie; Virtue and ancient riches, then to exceed in all those things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glory, and the like, do no otherwise define Nobility, than the word (animal) alone doth define a reasonable man. Or if honour (according to L. Vives) be a witness of virtue and well-doing: and Nobility (after Plutarch) the continuance of virtue in a Race or Linage: then are those in whom Virtue is extinguished, but like unto painted and printed Papers, which ignorant men worship in stead of Christ, our Lady, and other Saints: men in whom there remain but the dregs and vices of ancient Virtue: Flowers, and Herbes, which by change of soile and want of manuring are turned to Weeds. For what is found praise-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure Fountains, if in all the rest of their course they run foule, filthy, and defiled? Ex terra fertilis pro- Pint. in French ducitur aliquando Cicuta venenosa, & ex terra sterilis pretiosum aurum; Out of fruitful ground aristeth (sometimes paysoning Henbane, and out of barren soyle precious Gold. For as all things consist of matter and form, so doth Charron (in his Chapter of Nobility) call the Race and Linage to be the matter of Nobility: the form (which gives life and perfect being) he maketh to be Virtue, and Quality, profitable to the Common-weale. For he is truly and entirely Noble, who maketh a singular profession of publike Virtue, serving his Prince and Country, and being defended of Parents and Ancestors that have done the like. And although that Nobility, which the same Authour calleth personal, (the same which our selves acquire by our Virtue and well deservings) cannot be ballanced with that which is both natural by Descent, and also personal; yet if Vertue be wanting to the natural, then is the personal and acquired Nobility by many degrees to be preferred:

For (saith Charron) this Honour (to wit) by Descent, may light upon such a one, as in his own nature is a true Villain. There is also a third Nobility which he calleth Nobility in Parchment, bought with Silver or Favour: and these be indeed but Honours of affection, which Kings with the change of their fancies with they knew well how to wipe off again. But surely if we had as much sence of our degenerating in wor-thinesse, as we have of vanity in deriving our selves of such and such Parents, we should rather know such Nobility (without Vertue) to be shame and dishonour, than Nobleness and glory to vaunt thereof. What calamity is wanting (saith Bernard) to him that is born in sin, of a Posthure body and barren minde? for (according to the same Father) Dele suum fugacis honoris huius, & male coronate nitorem glorie, &c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting honour, and the glittering of the ill-crowned glory, that then thou mayest consider thy self nakedly: for thou comest naked out of thy Mothers wombe. Camest thou thence with thy Myrr, or glistering with Jewels, or garnished with Silks, or adorned with Feathers, or bussed with Gold? If thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration as certain morning clouds, which do or will soon pass over, thou shalt meet with a naked, and poor, and wretched, and miserable man, and blushing, because he is naked, and weeping, because he is born, and repining, because he is born to labour, and not to honour.

For, as touching the matter of all men, there is no difference between it and dust: ³⁰ which if thou dost not believe (saith S. Chrysostome) looke into the Sepulchres and Monuments of thy Ancestors, and they shall easily persuade thee by their own example, that thou art dust and dirt: so that if man seem more noble and beautiful than dust, this proceedeth not from the diversitie of his Nature, but from the cunning of his Creator.

For true Nobility standeth in the Trade
Of virtuous life ; not in the fleshly Line :
For blood is brute, but Gentry is Divine.

40 And howsoever the custome of the World have made it good, that Honours be cast by birth upon unworthy Issues: yet Solomon (as wise as any King) reprehendeth the same in his fellow-Princes: There is an evil (saith he) that I have seen under the Sun, as an error that proceedeth from the face of him that ruleth: Folly is set in great excellency. Eccleij. 10.

CHAP. X.

of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus : and of memorable things about those times.

50

§. I.

That Nimrod was the first after the Flood that reigned like a Sovereigne Lord: and that his beginning seemeth to have been of just authority.

THe first of all that reigned as Sovereigne Lord after the Flood was Nimrod, the Sonne of Chush, distinguished by Moses from the rest (according to Saint Augustine) in one of these two respects: either for his eminency, and because he was the first of fame, and that took on him to command others; or else in that he was begotten by Chubh, after his other children were also become Fathers; and of a later time than some of his Grand-children and Nephews. Howsoever, seeing Moses in expresse words calleth Nimrod the son of Chubh, other mens conjectures to the contrary ought to have no respect.

This Empery of Nimrod, both the Fathers and many later Writers call tyrannicall: the same beginning in Babel, (which is) confusion. But it seemeth to mee that Malacthon conceived not amiss hereof: the same exposition being also made by the Author of that work called Onomasticum Theologicum, who affirms that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, A bitter or severe Governour, because his forme of rule seemed at first far more terrible than Paternal authority. And therefore is he in this respect also called a mighty Hunter: because he took and destroyed both beasts and Theeves. But Saint Augustine understands it otherwise, and converts the word (ante) by (contra) affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mighty Hunter against God: Sic ergo intelligendus est Gigas ille, Venator contra Dominum; So is that Giant to be understood, a Hunter against the Lord.

But howsoever this word (a mighty Hunter) be understood; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all those which went with him from the East into Shinaar: so, this charge was rather given him, than by him usurped. For it no where is found, that Noah himself, or any of the Sonnes of his own body came with this troop into Babylon: no mention at all being made of Noah (the years of his life excepted) in the succeeding story of the Hebrews; nor that Sem was in this disobedient troop, or among the builders of Babel.

The same is also confirmed by divers ancient Historians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Jathan, were the Captains and Leaders of all those which came from the East. And though Sem came not himself so farre West as Shinaar (his lot being cast on the East parts) yet from his Sons Nephew Heber, the name and Nation of the Hebrews: (according to the general opinion) took beginning, who inhabited the Southernmost parts of Chaldea, about the City of Uz; from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And because those of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldea, were no partners in the unbelieving work of the Tower: therefore (as many of the Fathers conjecture) did they retain the first and most ancient language, which the Fathers of the first Age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his issues: In familia Heber remansit hec lingua; In the family of Heber this language remained (saith Saint Augustine out of Epiphanius;) and this Language Abraham used; yea, it was anciently, and before the Flood the generall speech: and therefore first called (saith Celestinus) lingua humana: the human tongue.

We know that Coropius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moser, Egyptine, Vergara, and others, is of another opinion; but howsoever we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolve, that none of the godly seed of Sem were the chiefe Leaders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely, but that some one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by just authority, than violence of usurpation.

§ II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus were three distinct persons.

Benzo, and out of him Naucerus, with others, make many Nimrods, Eusebius confounds him with Belus, and so doeth Saint Hierome upon Ose; and these words of S. Augustine seem to make him of the same opinion: Ibi autem Ninus regnabat post mortem patris sui Beli, qui primus illic regnaverat 65. annor; There did Ninus reigne after the death of his father Belus, who first governed in Babylon sixty five years. But it could not be unknown to Saint Augustine, that Nimrod was the establisher of that Empire: Mose, being plain and direct therein. For the beginning of Nimrods Kingdome (saith he) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar; wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) supposed: for in Ninus time the World was marvellously replenished. And if S. Augustine had undoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would have given him the name which the Scriptures give him, rather than have borrowed any thing out of prophane Authors. And for those words of S. Augustine (qui primus illic regnaverat; Who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words do not disprove that Nimrod was the founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Julius Caesar overthrew the liberty of the Romane commonwealth, making himselfe perpetuall Dictator, yet Augustus was the first established Emperour: and the first that reigned absolutely by soveraign authority over the Romans, as an Emperour.

The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternity, laying the foundation of soveraign rule, as Caesar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with a generall allowance exercised such a power. Pererius is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. yeares after the flood (as they account) that Belus reigned; but such agreement of times proves it not. For so Edward the third, and his grand-child Richard the second, were Kings both in one year: the one died; the other in the same year was crowned King. And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is far more probable than that of Mercator; who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For it is plaine that the beginning of Nimrod's Kingdome was Babel, and the Towns adjoining: but the first and most famous work of Ninus was the City of Ninive.

Now whereas D. Siculus affirmeth, that Ninus overcame and suppressed the Babylonians, the same rather proveth the contrary, than that Ninus and Nimrod were one person. For Ninus established the seat of his Empire at Ninive in Assyria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdain thereof fall from his obedience, whom hee recovered again by strong hand; which was easie: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis time.

—Dicitur altam
Collebus muris cinxisse Semiramis Urbem.

Semiramis with wals of brick the City did inclose.

Further, where it is alledged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mighty; so Iustine hath the same of Ninus, which is one of Mercator's arguments; It may be answered, that such an addition might have been given to many other Kings as well. For if we may beleeve Iustine; then were Vexoris King of Egypt, and Anais of Scythia, mighty Kings before Ninus was borne. And if we may compare the words of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the undertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference betweene them.

For whereas Mercator conceiveth, that it was too early for any that lived about the time of the confusion of languages, to have invaded & maltreated those Cities so far removed from Babel, namely, Erec, Accad, and Chalne: which work he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest undertaking; and consequently would have Nimrod to have been long after the time; in which we suppose he flourished; and both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I doe not finde that supposition true, That ever Nimrod invaded any of these Cities; but that he founded them, and built them from the ground, being the first after the flood, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hands.

Besides, whereas these Cities in many mens opinions are found to stand far away from Babylon, I find no reason to bring me to that belief. The City of Accad, which the Septuagint calls Archads; & Epiphanius, Arphal; Iustin takes it to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for the Region thereabout, the Cosmographers (saith he) call Accabene for Accadene. Others understand Nisibis and Ninive to be one City: so doe Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charran, but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, and Charran are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accedene to be a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arias Montanus out of S. Hierome calls Acad; and so doe the Hebrews also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the City of Erec, which the Septuagint call Orechs; S. Augustine, Oreg, and Pagninus, Erec; this place Junius understands for Aracca in Sustana: but there is also a City in Camagena, called Arace: and indeed likelihood of name is no certain proof, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third City (called Chalneb) some take it for Calinistis: of which Am. Marcellinus. S. Hierome takes it for Selucia; Hierosolymitanus for Cresiphon: others doe think it to be the Agram upon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Judge of this dispute, who teacheth us directly, that these Cities are not feated in so divers and distant Regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his Kingdome (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalneb in the Land of Shinaar: so as in the Valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldea (being all one) we must finde them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) think with Viterbiensis, that these four made but one Babylon, than that they were Cities farre removed, and in severall Provinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguishing Chalneb from Babylon. Go you (saith Amos) to Chalneb, and from thence go you to Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philistims. The Geneva translation favouring the former opinion, to set these Cities out of Shinaar, hath a marginal note expressing that Shinaar was here named, not that all these Cities were therein feated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chaldea, from Babylon in Egypt; but I finde little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrod's Empire, there was no such Babylon, nor any City at all to be found in Egypt; Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great City of Cairo, which was built long after, not far from the place where stood Mempbis the ancient City, but not so ancient as Babylon upon Euphrates. Now that Chalneb is situate in the valley of Shinaar; it hath been formerly proved in the Chapter of Paradise. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three Cities from Babylon, we may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and successive Kings.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive: and that it is probable out of Esay 23. 13. that Assur built Ur of the Chaldees.

Now as of Nimrod; so are the opinions of Writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great state of Babylon and Assyria: a controverſie wearisomely disputed without any direct prooffe, conclusion, or certainty. But to me (of whom, where the Scriptures are silent, the voice of reason hath the best hearing) the interpretation of Junius is most agreeable; who, besides all necessary consequence, doth not dis-joyne the sense of the Scriptures therein, nor confute the understanding thereof. For in this sort he converteth the Hebrew Text: Erat enim principum Regni ejus Babel, & Erech, & Accad, & Chalneb, in terra Shinaaris: et terra hac precessit in Assyriam, ubi edificavit Niniven; (which is) For the beginning of his Kingdome was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalneb, in the land of Shinaar: and he went forth of this land into Assyria, and built Ninive. So as Junius takes Assur in this place, not for any person, but for the Region of Assyria: the Land being to called in Moses time, and before it. For certainly, the other construction, (where the word Assur is taken for Assur the sonne of Sem) doth not answer the order which Moses observeth through all the Books of Genesis, but is quite contrary unto it. For in the beginning of the tenth Chapter he setteth down the sonnes of Noah, in these words: Now these are the Generations of the sonnes of Noah: Sem, Ham, and Japheth, unto whom, sonnes were born after the Flood: then it followeth immediately: The sonnes of Japheth were Gomer, &c. so as Japheth is last named among Noah's sonnes, be hee eldest or youngest: because he was first to bee spoken of: with whom (having last named him) he proceeds and sets downe his issue, and then the issue of his sonnes: first, the issue of Gomer, Japheth's eldest sonne; and then speaks of Javan and his sonnes: for of the rest of that Familie he is silent. Anon after he numbrell the sons of Ham, of which Chush was the eldest: and then the sons of Chush and Mizraim; and afterward of Canaan, leaving Shem for the last, because he would not dis-join the Story of the Hebrews. But after he beginneth with Shem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, & Heber, unto Abraham, and so to Jacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to have brought in one of the sons of Shem in the middle of the Generations of Ham, had been against order; neither would Moses have past over so slightly the erection of the Assyrian Empire in one of the sons of Shem, if he had had any such meaning: it being the storie of Shem's sons which he most attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the rest of the sons of Chush, because he founded the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire: and in the eleventh Chapter he returns to speake of the building of Babel in particular, having formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with those other Cities which Nimrod founded in Shinaar. And as he did in the tenth Chapter, so also in the eleventh he maketh no report of Shem, till such time as he had finished so much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then he beginneth with the issue of Shem, which he continueth to Abraham and Israel. And of Junius opinion touching Assur, was Calvin: to which I conceive that P. Comestor, in historia Scholastica, gave an entrance, who after he had delivered this place in some other sense, he useth these words: Vel intelligendum non est de Assur, filio Sem, &c. sed Assur (id est) Regnum Assyriorum inde egressum est, quod tempore Sarug proavi Abrahami factum est (which is) Or else it is not to be understood of Assur the son of Sem, &c. but Assur (that is, the Kingdome of the Assyrians) came from thence (videlicet, from Babylon) or was made out of it: which happened in the time of Sarug the great Grand-father of Abraham. After which he reconcileth the difference in this sort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the first Erector of the Assyrian Empire, or the first Founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium; Respecting the beginning; but others conceive that it had beginning from Ninus, which is also true, Quantum ad Regni ampliationem; Regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may add the opinion of Epiphanius, confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Assur to be the son of Nimrod: and so doth Methodius, and Viterbiensis, Saint Hierome, and Cyrillus, and now lastly Tornicellus: who (saith he) took upon him that name of Assur after he had beaten the Assyrians, as Scipio did of Africanus, after his Conquest in Africa: and that Assur was a common name to the Kings of Assyria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Psalm 81. Esay 10. Of 5. &c. But to help the matter, he makes Nimrod of the race of Shem, and the sonne of Irati. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Archbishop of Metz in the year of Christ 854. an ancient and learned Writer, understands this place with Comestor, or Comestor with him, agreeing in substance with that translation of Junius: to which words of Moses he giveth this sense: De hac terra Assyriorum pullulavit imperium, qui ex nomine Nini, Belis filii, Ninnum condiderunt urbem magnam, &c. Out of this Land grew the Empire of the Assyrians, who built Ninus the great Citie, so named of Ninus the sonne of Belus. On the contrary Calvin objecteth this place of Esay: Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, this was no people, Assur founded it by the inhabitants of the Wildernesses; than which there is no one place in the Scriptures, that hath a greater diversitie in the translation and understandings; inasmuch as Michael de Palatio upon Esay (though in all else very diligent) passeth it over. But Calvin seemeth hereby to infer, that because Assur founded the state of the Chaldeans, therefore also Assur rather than Nimrod established the Assyrian Empire, and built Ninive: contrary to the former translation of Junius, & to his own opinion. Now out of the Vulgar (called Hieromes translation) it may be gathered, that Assur both founded and ruined this Estate or City of the Chaldeans, by Esay remembered unto which City, People, or State, he plainly telleth the Tyrans that they cannot trust, or hope for relief thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this City of Chaldea, and that Estate, an example unto those Phenicians, whom in this place he fore-telleth of their ruine: which City of Chaldea being of strength, & carefully defended, was (notwithstanding) by the Assyrians utterly wasted and destroyed: whereby he giveth them knowledge, and fore-telleth them, that their own City of Tyre (invincible as themselves thought) should also soon after be over-turned by the same Assyrians: as (indeed) it was by Nabuchodonosor. And these be the words after Hierome: Eccce terra Chaldeorum, talis populus non fuit, Assur fundavit eam, in captivitatem adduxerunt robustos ejus, suffoderunt domos ejus, posuerunt eam in ruinam; (which is)

Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, such a people there were not (or, this was no people, after the Geneva) Assur (or the Assyrians) founded it, they carried away their strong men captive, they undermined their houses, and ruined their Cities. The Septuagint expresse it but in a part of another Verse, in these words: Et in terra Chaldeorum. & hac desolata est ab Assyriis, quoniam murus ejus corruit, making the sense perfect by the preceding Verse, which all together may be thus understood: If thou go over to Chittim (which is Macedon or Greece) yet thou shalt not rest (speaking to the Tyrians) neither in the Land of the Chaldeans, for this is made desolate by the Assyrians, because their walls fell together to the ground. Paginus and Vatablus convert it thus: Eccce terra Chaldæum, iste populus non erat illic olim; nam Assur fundavit eam muribus, erexerunt arces illius; contriverunt ades ejus, posuit eam in ruinam: which may be thus Englished: Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, this people was not once therein inhabiting: for Assur built it a harbour for ships, they erected the Towers thereof; and again brake down the houses thereof, and ruined it. Junius in the place of ships sets the word (pro Barbaris) that is, for the Barbarians; and the Geneva, by the Barbarians. But this is undoubted that the Prophet Esay (as may be gathered by all the sense of the Chapter) did therein assure the Tyrians of their future destruction, which (accordingly) fell on them: wherein (for the more terror) he maketh choise to note the calamities of those places, Cities, and Regions, by whose trade the state and greatness of the Tyrians was maintained, as by the Cilicians from Tarsus; from the Macedonians, and other Grecians under the name of Cittim; also by the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, and the rest. For Tyre was then the Mart Town of the World most renowned. And (as it appears in our discourse of Paradise) not the least part of her chief merchandize came in by the City Or, or Orchoa in Chaldea, where the body or chiefe stream of Euphrates (even that stream which runneth through Babylon & Oiris, which now falleth into Tygris) had his passage into the Persian Gulf: though now it be stopped up. For (as we have heretofore noted) the Arabians (that descended from Sheba and Raamah) dwelling on the East banks of the Persian Gulf, trading with the Tyrians (as those of Eden, Charan, and Chalde did) transported their merchandize by the mouth of Tygris, that is, from Teredon; & of Euphrates, that is, from Or, or Orchoa; and then by Babylon, and thence by River and over land they conveyed it into Syria, and so to Tyre: as they do this day to Aleppo. So then Or of the Chaldees was a Port Town, and one of those Cities which had Intelligence, Trade, and Exchange with the Tyrians: for it stood by the great Lakes of Chaldea, through which, that part of Euphrates ran, which passage is now stoppt up. Ejus cursum vetustas alevit (saith Niger.) And Pliny: Locus ubi Euphratis ostium fuit, flumen salum; Time hath worn away the channell of Euphrates: the place where the mouth thereof was, is a Bay of salt water. These things being thus, certainly (not without good probability) we may expound the City of the Chaldees, whose calamities Esay here noteth for terror of the Tyrians, to be the City anciently called Or; and by (Hecateus) Camerina; by Ptolomy, Orchoa; and by the Greeks, Chaldeopolis, The City of Chaldea: which the sons of Shem, untill Abrahams time inhabited. And whereas in all the Translations it is said, that Assur both founded it and ruined it: it may be understood, that Assur the Founder was the son of Shem; and Assur the destroyers were the Assyrians, by whom those that inhabited Or of Chaldea, were at length oppressed and brought to ruine: which thing God fore-seeing, commanded Abraham thence to Carran, and so into Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Vatablus and Paginus converted (by ships) doe bear that sense, the same may be the better approved, because it was a Port Town: and the River so farre up as this City of Or was in ancient time navigable, as both by Pliny and Niger appeareth. And if the word (for the Barbarians) or (by the Barbarians) be also in the Hebrew Text, it is no lesse manifest, that the most barbarous Arabians of the Desert were and are the confronting, and next people of all other unto it. For Chaldea is now called Arachdalar, which signifieth desert Lands, because it joyneth to that part of Arabia so called: and Cicero (calling those Arabians by the name of Ituraens) addeth, that they are of all other people the most salvage; calling them, Homines omnium maximè barbaros.

So as this place of Esay, which breedeth some doubt in Calvin, proveth in nothing the contrary opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former translation of Junius, nor the interpretation of Comestor and Rabanus. For though other men have not conceived (for any thing that I have read) that Assur is in this place diversly taken (as for the son of Shem, when he is spoken of as a Builder of Or; and when as a Destroyer thereof, then for the Assyrian Nation) yet certainly the evidence of the truth, and agreement of circumstances seeme to enforce it. And so this Founding of the City of the Chaldees by Assur (into which the most of the posterity of Shem that came into Shinaar, and were separate for the Idolatrie of the Chusites and Nimrodians, revired themselves) hath nothing in it to prove that the same Assur built Ninive, or that the same Assur was all one with Nimur; except we will make Assur, who was the son of Shem, both an Idolater, and the son of Belus. For (out of doubt) Nimur was the first notorious sacrificer to Idols; and the first that set up a Statue or Image to be honoured as God. Now if Assur must be of that Race, and not of the Family of Shem, as he must be if he founded Ninive, then all those which seeke to give him the honour thereof, do him by a thousand parts more injurie, by taking from him his true Parent and Religion.

Besides, if this supposed Assur whom they make the Founder of Ninive (and so the son of Belus) were any other, and not the same with Nimur; then what became of him? Certainly he was very unworthy and obscure, and not like to be the Founder of such an Empire and such a City, if no man have vouchsafed to leave to posterity his expulsion thence, and how he lost that Empire againe, or quitted it to Nimur: whose acts and conquests are so largely written, and (according to my apprehension) far differing from truth. It will therefore be found best agreeing to Scripture and to Reason, and best agreeing with the story of that age written by prophane Authors, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, the first works and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moses; and that these workes being finished within the Valley of Shinaar, he looked farther abroad, and set in hand the worke of Nimur, lying neere unto the same streame that Babel and Chalne did: which work his grand-child Nimur afterward amplified and finished, as Semiramis (this Nimur his wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to passe, that as Semiramis was counted the Foundresse of the City which the only finished: so also Nimur of Ninive: Quam quidem Babylonem potuit insauare; She might repaire or renew Babylon, saith S. Augustine. For so did Nabuchodonosor vaunt himselfe to be the Founder of Babylon also, because he built up againe some part of the wall, over-borne by the furie of the River: which work of his stood till Alexanders time, whereupon he vaunted thus: Is not this great Babel which I have built?

§ IV.

of the Acts of Nimrod and Belus, as far as now they are known.

BUT to returne to the Storie, it is plaine in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transfigium; and Julius Africanus surnamed Sathorne) was the establisher of the Babylonian Monarchie, of whom there is no other thing written, than that his Empire in the beginning consisted of those 4. Cities before remembered; Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne; and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Assyria, and in Assyria built foure more Cities (to wit) Ninive, Reborth, Celab, and Resen. And seeing that he spent much time in building Babel it selfe and those adjoining, and that his travailes were many ere he came into Shinaar: that worke of Babel (such as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large foundation of Ninive, and the other Cities of Assyria which he builded (considered with the want of materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficulty than any thing performed by his Successors in many years after: to whose undertakings time had given so great an increase of people; and the examples and patternes of his beginning so great advancement and encouragement: in whose time (saith Glycas) all these Nations were called Merores, a sermone linguarum terræq; diversifone; by reason that the earth and the speech were then divided.

Belus, or Bel, or Jupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after he had reigned 114. yeares; of whose acts and undertakings there is little written. For it is thought that he spent much of his time in dis-burdening the low Lands of Babylon, and drying and making firme ground of all those great Fens and over-flowne Marishes which adjoynd unto it. For any of his Warres or conquests there is no report, other than of his begun enterprise against Sabatus King of Armenia, and those parts of Scythia which Berosus calls Scythia Saga, whose son and successor Barzanes became subiect and Tributarie to Nimur, that followed the warre to effect, which was by his Father Belus begun.

living: for so he writes of him (calling him Arbelus.) Arbelus, vir superbus & arrogant, primus hominum dicitur a subditis Deitatis nomen accepisse: Perseveravit igitur Assyrii, & finitime ille gentes sacrificantes ei. Arbelus, a man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the first of all men that was ever honored by their subjects with title of Deitie; (or with the name of God.) The Assyrians therefore, and the bordering nations have persevered, sacrificing to him. Even Arim also, whom Suidas calls Thumax, who succeeded next after Ninus, was made an Idol-god among them, if we credit Suidas.

After Ninus (that is, after Ninus) Thumax reigned (saith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the Planet Mars: a man of sharpe and fierce disposition, who bidding battaile to Caucasus of the stocke of Japheth, slue him. The Assyrians worshipped him 10 for their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars; thus far Suidas. Neither is it unlikely but that many among Idolatrous nations were Deified in their life-times, or soone after: though I denie not but that the most of their Images and Statues were first erected without divine worship, onely in memorie of the glorious acts of Benefactors, as Glycas rightly conceiveth; and so afterward the Devil crept into those wooden and brazen carcasses, when Posteritie had lost the memorie of their first invention. Hereof Isidore speaketh in this manner: Quos autem Pagani Deos asserunt, homines fuerunt, & pro uniuersisq; vite meritis vel magnificentia, colunt apud suos post mortem ceperunt: sed (Demonibus persuadentibus) quos illi pro sua memoria honoraverunt, minores Deos existimant: ad ipsos vero magis excolenda accesserunt Poetarum signimenta; They were men (saith he) whom the Pagans affirmed to be gods: and every one for his merits or magnificence began after his death to be honoured of his own: But at length (the Devils persuading) they accounted them lesser gods, whose memories they honoured: and the Fictions of the Poets made the opinions (concerning the honour of the dead) much more superstitious.

And that the worshipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans, and Heathen Nations, it is not Isidore alone that witnesseth; but Gregory: Gentilitas (saith he) inventrix & Greg. Necessar. Ambros. in Psal. 108. Ensb. l. 7. c. 18. Aug. c. 13. Lañ. lib. 2. c. 2. Gentilitas est Imaginum; Gentilisme is the inventresse and ground of Images: and Ambrosius, Gentium lignum adorant, tanquam imaginem Dei; The Gentiles adore wood, as it were the Image of God. Ensb. also affirmeth as much, and calleth the worshipping of Images a custome borrowed of the Heathen. The like hath Saint Augustine against Adimantus. Et venient 30 (saith Lañtinius) ne religio vana sit, si nihil videant quod adoret; They feare their Religion would be vaine, should they not see that which they worship.

And (out of doubt) the Schoolemen shift this fearefull custome very strangely. For seeing the very workmanship is forbidden, how can the heart of a wise Christianistie see selfe with the distinction of Doula and Hyperdoula, which can imply nothing but some difference of worshipping of those Images after they are made? And it is of all things the most strange, why religious & learned men should strain their wits to defend the use of those things, which the Scriptures have not onely no where warranted, but expressly in many places forbidden, and cursed the practisers thereof. Yet this doctrine of the Devil was so strongly and subtilly rooted, as neither the expresse Commandement of God himselfe, Thou shalt not make any graven Image, nor all the threatnings of Moses and the Prophets after him, could remove, weed it, or by fear, or by any persuasions lead the hearts of men from it. For where shall we find words of greater weight, or of plainer instruction than these? Take therefore good heed to your selves (for ye saw no Image in the day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb out of the midst of the fire) that ye corrupt not your selves, and make you a graven Image or representation of any Figure, whether it be the likenesse of Male or Female.

And besides the expresse Commandement, Thou shalt make thee no graven Image, and the prohibition in many Scriptures, so it is written in the Booke of Wisefodone, That, the invention of Idols was the beginning of Whoredome: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neither shall they continue for ever.

And whereas the Schoolemen affirme, that the Prophets spake against the Worshipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest that Moses spake of Images of the living God, and not of Baal and the rest of that nature, For you saw no Image (saith Moses) that day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently said of Basil; Noli aliquam in illo formam imaginari, ne circumscribas eum mente tua: Do not imagine any forme to be in God, least thou limit or circumscribe him in thy minde too. Now, if the great Basil thought it a presumption unlawful to represent a pattern of the infinite God to our own thoughts thoughts and minds, how far do those men presume that put him under the greazie Penill of a Painter, or the rusty Axe or other Instrument of a Carpenter or Carver? For as this dishonour to the infinite and incomprehensible God, began in Babel: so did the Devil transport and spread this invention into all the Regions adjoining, and into Egypt and Greece.

The Romans for a while resisted the erection of these Idols and Images, refusing to set them in their Temples for 170 years; observing the Law of Numa, who thought it impiety to resemble things most beautiful, by things most base. But Tarquinius Priscus afterwards prevailing, and following the vanity of the Grecians (a Nation of all others 10 under the Sun most deluded by Satan) set up the Images of their gods; which (as S. Aug. de Civit. Augustini witnesseth) that learned Varro both bewailed, and utterly condemned: and which Seneca thus derideth; *Simulachra deorum venerantur, illis supplicat, gem postea illa adorant; & cum hec sufficiant, fabros qui illa fecere, contemnunt; The Images of the gods are worshipped, those they pray unto, with bended knees those they adore; & while they so greatly admire them, they contemn the Hندی-craftsmen that made them: which also Sedulius the Poet in this sort scoffed at:*

Hec miseri qui vana colunt, qui corde sinistro Religiosa sibi sculptunt simulachra, summq; Factorem fugiunt, & que fecere, venerunt. Quis furor est? quæ tanta animos dementia ludit? Ut volucrum, turpemq; bovem, torumq; Draconem, Semi-hominemq; canem supplex homo pronus adoret.

Ah wretched they that worship vanities,
And consecrate dumb Idols in their heart,
Who their own Maker (God on high) despise,
And feare the work of their own hands and art.
What furie? what great madnes doth beguile
Mens minds? that man should ugly shapies adore
Of Birds, or Bulls, or Dragons, or the vile Half-dog-half-man on knees for aid implore.

And though this device was barbarous, and first, and many yeers practised by Heathen Nations onely, till the Jews were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to scorn the ignorant stupiditie of his Nation: but Justin Martyr remembreth how the Syblis inveighed against Images: and Hosianus, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the souls of men to erect and adore those bables. Strabo and Herodotus witness, that the Persians did not erect or set up any Statue of their Gods. Lycurgus never taught it the Lacedæmonians, but thought it impiety to represent immortal natures by mortal Figures. Ensebius also witnesseth in his sixt Book de preparatione Evangelica, that it was forbidden by a Law in Serica, or among the Brackmans in India, that Images should be worshipped. The fame do Tacitus and Grinius report of the ancient Germans. Many other Authours might be remembered, that witness the disdain which the Heathen themselves had of this childish Idolatry: of which Hosianus hath written at large in his Tract, de origine imaginum. And it was truly said, Omnia mala exempla bonis initis orta sunt. All ill examples have sprung from good beginnings. The Heathen at first made these Statues and Images, but in memory of such remarkable men, as had deserved best of their Countries and common-wealths: Effigies hominum (saith Pliny) non solebant exprimi, nisi aliqua illustri causa perpetuaretur merentium: Men were not wont to make Pictures, but of men which merited for some notable cause to be perpetually remembred. And though of the more ancient Papists, some have borrowed of the Gentiles (as appears in Lañtinius) that defence for Images: That Simulachra are pro elementis literarum, ut per ea discernent homines Deum invisibilem cognoscere: Images say they, (and so before them the Heathen said) are in stead of Letters, whereby men might learn to know the invisible God: in which understanding perhaps they no otherwise esteemed them than pictures indeed; yet as that of Baal or Bel set up in memory of Belus the Babylonian, became afterward the most revered Idol of the World, by which for many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himself) were misled and cast away: so those very stocks & stopes, and the title of Prophetia Cham. Cassianus out of Serenus hath somewhat like to this of Comestor. These be Cassianus words: Cham (filius Noah) qui superstitionibus istis & sacrilegiis suis artibus infectus, sciens nullum se posse super his memorialem librum in Arcam profectum inferre, in qua erat cum patre iusto, &c. Cham (the son of Noah) who was infected with these superstitions and sacrilegious Arts, knowing that he could not bring any book or memoriall of that nature into the Arke, wherein he was to remain with his godly Father, caused the Precepts and Rules thereof to be graven in metall and hard stone.

S. Augustine noteth that Zoroaster was said to have laught at his birth, when all other children weep; which prefiged the great knowledge which afterward he attained unto: being taken for the Inventor of naturall Magick and other Arts; for the Corrupter, so saith Plinie and Iustine. But I do not think that Zoroaster invented the doctrine of the Horoscopes or Nativities: or first found out the nature of herbs, stones, and minerals, or their Sympatheticall or Antipatheticall workings; of which, I know not what King of Chaldea is also made the Inventor. I rather think that these knowledges were far more ancient, and left by Noah to his sons. For Abraham who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaster, (as Iosephus reporteth) was no lesse learned herein than any other in that age, if he exceeded not all men then living: differing from the wisdom of aftertimes in this, that he knew and acknowledged the true cause, and giver of life and vertue to Nature and all Naturall things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, dispersed, and universall power) admired the instruments, and did attribute proper strength to the things themselves, (from which the effects were sensible) which belonged to that wisdom, Which being one, and remaining in it selfe, can doe all things, and remembreth all.

Now whether this Zoroaster (overthrown by Ninus) were the same which was so excellent a Naturalist, it is doubted. For Zoroaster the Magician, Ctesias calls Oxyartes, whom Plinie findes of a later time. And if Zoroaster were taken away by a spirit (being, in the midst of his Disciples) as some Authors report, then Zoroaster, slain by Ninus, was not the Magician: which is also the opinion of Scaliger.

Again, Iosephus and Cedrenus affirm, that Seth first found out the Planets, or wandering Stars, and other motions of the Heavens: for if this Art had been invented by Zoroaster, he could not have attained to any such excellency therein, in his own life time; but being a man (as it seemeth) of singular judgement, he might adde somewhat to this kind of knowledge, and leave it by writing to posterity.

But of this Zoroaster there is much dispute: and no lesse jangling about the word and art of Magick. Arnobius remembreth foure, to whom the name of Zoroaster, or Zorastres was given: which by Hermodorus and Dion seemeth to be but a cognomen, or named art, and was as much to say, as astrorum cultor. The first, Arnobius calleth the Bactrian, which may be the same that Ninus overthrew: the second, a Chaldean, and the Astronomer of Ninus: the third, was Zoroaster Pamphilius, who lived in the time of Cyrus and his familiar: the fourth, Zoroaster Armenius, the Nephew of Hofianes, which followed Xerxes into Greece: between whom and Cyrus there past threecore and eighteen years. Suidas remembreth a fifth, called Persemedus sapiens: and Plato speaketh of Zoroaster the son of Oromasdes; which Picus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now of what Nation the first and chiefe Zoroaster was, it is doubted. Plinie and Lactius make him a Persian. Gemisthins or Plerho, Ficinus and Stenuchius, make him a Chaldean. But by those booke of one Zoroaster, found by Picus Mirandula, it appeareth plainly, that the Author of them was a Chaldean by Nation, though the word (Chaldean) was as often given to the learned Priests peculiarly, as for any distinguishing of Nations. Porphyrius makes the Chaldea and Magi divers; Picus the same. But that this Zoroaster was a Chaldean both by Nation and Profession, it appeareth by his Bookes, which (saith Picus) were written in the Chaldean tongue; and the Comment in the same language. Now that the Magi and they were not differing, it may be judged by the name of those booke of Zoroaster, which in an Epistle of Mirandula to Ficinus, he saith, to be intituled, Patris Ezre Zoroastri, & Melchior magorum oracula.

§ II.

Of the name of Magia: and that it was anciently far divers from Conjuring and Witchcraft.

Now for Magick it selfe; which Art (saith Mirandula) pauci intelligunt, multi reprehendunt; Few understand, and many reprehend; Et scitis Camer ignotos semper allatrare; As Dogs bark at those they know not: so they condemn and hate the things they understand not: I think it not amisse (leaving Ninus for a while) to speak somewhat thereof. It is true that many men abhorre the very name and word (Magos) because of Simon Magus, who being indeed, not Magus, but Gos, (that is) familiar with evil spirits, usurped that title. For Magick, Conjuring, and Witchery, are far differing Arts, whereof Plinie being ignorant iscoffeth thereat. For Nero (saith Plinie) who had the most excellent Magicians of the East sent him by Tyridates King of Armenia, who held that Kingdom by his grace, found the art after long study and labour altogether ridiculous.

Magus is a Persian word primitively, whereby is exprest such a one as is altogether conversant in things divine. And (as Plato affirmeth) the Art of Magick is the Art of whipping God. To which effect Apollonius in his Epistles expounding the word (saith) that the Persians called their gods Magus: whence he addeth, that Magus is either ignis vim dei or deorum vis, (that is) that Magus is a name sometime of him that is a God by nature; sometimes of him that is in the service of God: in which latter sense it is taken, Mat. 2. v. 1. And this is the first and highest kind: which Piccolominie calleth divine Magick: and these did the Latines newly intitle Sapientes, or Wisemen: For, the fear and worship of God is the beginning of knowledge. These Wisemen the Greeks call Philosophers: the Indians, Branchmans: which name they somewhat neerly retain to this day, calling their Priests Bramines; among the Egyptians they were termed Priests; with the Hebrews they were called Cabalists, Prophets, Scribes, and Pharisees: amongst the Babylonians they were differenced by the name of Chaldeans: and among the Persians, Magicians: of whom Arnobius (speaking of Hofianes, one of the ancient Magicians) useth these words: Et verum Deum merita maiestate prosequitur, & Angelos ministros Dei, sed veri, ejus venerationi novit assistere. Idem demonas prodit terrenus, vagos, humanitatis inimicos; Sosibenes (for so M. Felix called him, not Hofianes) ascribeth the due majesty to the true God, and acknowledgeth that his Angels are ministers and messengers which attend the worship of the true God. He also hath delivered that there are Devils earthly and wandering, and enemies to mankind.

His Majestic also in his first Book of Demonologie, c. 3. acknowledgeth, that in the Persian tongue the word (Magus) imports as much a contemplator of divine and heavenly sciences; And unjustly so called, because the Chaldeans were ignorant of the true divinity. And it is also right which His Majestic avoweth, that under the name of Magick all other unlawfull Arts are comprehended, and yet doth His Majestic distinguish it from Necromancie, Witchcraft, and the rest: of all which he hath written largely and most learnedly. For the Magick which His Majestic condemneth, is of that kind whereof the Devil is a party. Daniel in his second chapter nameth foure kinds of those Wise-men: Arioli, Magi, Malefici, and Chaldei. Arioli the old Latine translation calleth Sophists; Vatibus and Paginis Genethliacos, or Physicos, or Philosophers; or (according to the note of Vatibus) Naturalists: Nempe sunt Magi apud Barbaros, quod Philosophi apud Græcos (scilicet) divinorum humanarumque rerum scientiam proficentes; For the Magi are the same with the Barbarians, as the Philosophers are with the Gracians (that is) men that profess the knowledge of things both divine and humane. The Greek and the English call them Inchanters; Junius, Magicians; Cassalon, Conjetturers: in the Syrian they are all foure by one name called Sapientes Babylonis; The Wisemen of Babel.

The second sort Vatibus, Paginis, Junius, and our English, call Astrologers; Hierome and the septuagint, Magicians.

The third kind are Malefici, or Venefici; in Hierom, Paginis, and the septuagint, Witches or Poysoners: in Junius, Prestigiatores of Sorcerers, as in English.

That Witches are also rightly so called Venefici, or Poysoners; and that indeed there is a kinde of Malefici, which without any Art of Magick or Necromancie use the help of the Devil to do mischief, His Majesty confirmeth in the first Chapter of his second Book: speaking also in the fifth Chapter of their practice, to mixe the powder of dead bodies with other things by the Diuell prepared; and at other times to make pictures of wax, or clay, or otherwise (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things, which the Devil by other means bringeth to passe.

The fourth, all Translators call Chaldeans: who took upon them to foretell all things to come, as well natural as humane, and their events: and this they vaunted to perform by the influences of the Stars by them observed, and understood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are the corruptions, which have made odious the very name of Magick, having chiefly fought (as is the manner of all impostures) to counterfeit the highest and most noble part of it, yet so as they have also crept into the inferior degrees.

A second kinde of Magick was that part of Astrologie, which had respect to sowing and planting, and all kindes of agriculture and husbandry: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Stars into those lower Elements.

De vit. sanct.
fol. 180.

Philo Judeus goeth farther, affirming, that by this part of Magick or Astrologie, together with the motions of the Stars and other heavenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he lived in Chaldea: Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognovit Creatorem, (saith Jo. Damascen) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. Josephus reporteth of Abraham, that he instructed the Egyptians in Arithmetick and Astronomie, who before Abraham's coming unto them knew none of these sciences.

And so doth Archangelus de Burgo, in defence of Mirandula against Garfas: Alexander & Eupolemon dicunt, quod Abraham sanctitate & sapientia omnium prestantissimus, Chaldeos primum, deinde Phoenices, demum Egyptios sacerdotes Astrologiam & divina docerit; Alexander (saith he, meaning Alexander Polyhistor) and Eupolemon asseverant, that Abraham the holiest and wisest of men, did first teach the Chaldeans, then the Phoenicians; lastly, the Egyptian priests, Astrologie and divine knowledge.

The third kinde of Magick containeth the whole Philosophie of nature; not the brabbings of the Aristotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inmost virtues, and draweth them out of Nature hidden before to humane use: Virutes in centro centralitates; Vertues hidden in the center of the center, according to the Chymists. Of this sort were Albertus Arnouldus de villa nova, Raymond Bacon, and many others: and before these in elder times, and who better understood the power of Nature, & how to apply things that work to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Tyaneus remembered by S. Hierome to Paulinus; in some mens opinion Numa Pompilius among the Romans: among the Indians, Ishpania: among the Egyptians, Hermes: among the Babylonians, Budda: the Ibracians had Zamolxis: the Hyperboreans (as is supposed) Abbaris; and the Italians, Petrus Apocensis. The Magick which these men profess, is thus defined: Magia est connexio a viro sapiente agentium per naturam cum patientibus, sibi congruenter respondentibus, ut inde opera prodeant, non sine eorum admiratione qui causam ignorant: Magick is the connexion of naturall agents and patients, answerable each to other, wrought by a wise man, to the bringing forth of such effects, as are wonderful to those that know not their causes. In all these three kinds, which other men divide into foure, it seemeth that Zoroaster was exceedingly learned; especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles he confessed God to be the creator of the Universal: he beleeveth of the Trinity, which he could not investigate by any naturall knowledge; he speaketh of Angels, and of Paradise: approveth the immortality of the soule: teacheth Truth, Faith, Hope, and Love, discouraging of the Abstinence and Charity of the Magi: Which Oracles of his, Pellus, Ficini, Patritius, and others have gathered and translated.

Of this Zoroaster, Eusebius in the Theologie of the Phenicians, using Zoroaster's owne words: Hec ad verbum scribit (saith Eusebius) Deus primus incorruptibilis, sempiternus, ingentis, expertus partium, sibiipsum similis, bonorum omnium auctor, numerus non expectans, optimus, prudentissimus, pater juris, sine doctrina iustitiam perdoctus, naturam perfectus, sapiens, sacra nature unicuius inventor, &c. Thus writeth Zoroaster word for word. God the first incorruptible, everlasting, unbegotten, without parts, most like himselfe, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the best, the wisest, the father of right, having learned justice without teaching, perfect, wise by nature, the only inventor thereof.

Lib. 2. fol. 26.

Sixtus Senensis speaking of the wisdom of the Chaldeans, doth distinguish those wise men men into five orders, (to wit) Chascedim, or Chaldeans: Asaphim, or Magicians: Chartumim, (which he translates Ariote, or Sophists) Mechaphim, or Malefici, or Venefici, Witches, or Poisoners; and Gazarim, Augures, or Aruspices, or Diviners.

Chascedim were those which had the name of Chaldeans, which were Astronomers: Hi calorum motus diligentissime spectarunt; These did most diligently contemplate the motions of the heavens: whom Philo in the life of Abraham describeth.

Asaphim were in the old Latine translation called Philosophers: of the Septuagint and of Hierome, Magicians: Qui de omnium tam divinarum quam humanarum rerum causis Philosophati sunt; Who discoursed of the causes of all things, as well divine as humane: of whom 10 Origen makes Balaam (the son of Beor) to be the first: but Laertius ascribeth the invention of this art to Zoroaster the Persian.

Chartumim, or Inchanters, the Disciples (saith Saint Augustine, Plinie, and Iustine) of another Zoroaster: who corrupted the admirable wisdom of the Magi, which he received from his Ancesters.

Mechaphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are those which we have spoken already out of His Majesty's book of Demonologia.

Gazarim, or Aruspices (after Saint Hierome) which divine from the entrails of beasts slain for sacrifices: or by Gazarim others understand Augures, who divine by the flying, singing, or feeding of birds.

By this distinction we may perceive the difference between those wise men which the kings of Babylon entertained; and that the name and profession of the Magi among the ancient Persians was most honest. For as Pencer truly observeth, Tracerant religionem Persice, ut in populo Dei Levites, studisque vera Philosophia dediti erant: nec quisquam Rex Persarum poterat esse, qui non antea Magorum disciplinam scientiamque percepisset; The Magi (saith he) were the chief Ministers of the Persian Religion, as the Levites among Gods people, and they were given to the studies of true Philosophie: neither could any be King of the Persians, who had not first been exercised in the mysteries and knowledge of the Magi. Sixtus Senensis, in the defence of Origen against Polychronius and Theophilus, hath two kindes of Magick, his own words are these: *Et ne quem moveant premissa Polychronii & Theophili testimonia, sciendum est duplicem esse Magiam; alteram ubique ab Origine damnatam, que per sedera cum demonibus inita aut verè aut apparenter operatur; alteram ab Origine laudatam, que ad practicam naturalis philosophie pertinet, docens admirabiles operari et applicatione multa naturalium virtutum ad invicem agentium ac patientium; That the testimonies of Theophilus and Polychronius (saith he) may not move any man, it is to be understood that Magick is of two sorts: the one every where condemned by Origen; which worketh (whether truly or seemingly) by covenants made with Devils; the other commended by Origen; which appertaineth to the practick part of naturall Philosophie, teaching to work admirable things by the mutual application of naturall virtues, agent and suffering reciprocally.*

This partition Hierome doth embrace in the first of his Commentaries upon Daniel: where considering of the difference which Daniel makes between these four kindes of wise Men formerly remembered, he useth this distinction: Quor nor hariolos; ceteri vero (id est) incantatores interpretati sunt, videntur mihi esse qui verbis rem peragunt; Magi, qui de singulis philosophantur; malefici, qui sanguine vivunt & victimis & sepe contingunt corpora mortuorum: porro in Chaldaeis Genethliacos significari puto, quos vulgo Mathematicos vocant. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro malefici accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem suam, eo quod sint Philosophi Chaldaeorum: & ad artis huius scientiam Reges quoque & Principes ejusdem gentis omnia faciunt; unde, & in nativitate Domini Salvatoris, ipse primum ortum ejus intellexerunt, & venientes sanctam Bethleem, adoraverunt puerum, stella desuper ostendente; They whom we call Sorcerers, and others interpret Incanters, seem to me such as performe things by words; Magicians, such as handle every thing philosophically; Witches, that use blood and sacrifices, and often lay hands on the body of the dead: further, among the Chaldeans I take them to be signified by the name of Conjurers upon nativities, whom the vulgar call Mathematicians. But common custom takes Magicians for Witches, who are otherwise reputed in their owne Nation: for they are the Philosophers of the Chaldeans: yea, King and Princes of that Nation doo all that they doe according to the knowledge of this Art: whence, at the nativity of the Lord our Saviour, they first of all understood his birth, and coming unto holy Bethleem, did worship the Child: the Starre from above shewing him unto them. By this therefore it appeareth that there is great difference between the doctrine of a Magician, and the abuse of the word. For though some Writers affirme, that Magus hodie dicitur, qui ex fœdere factio nitor diaboli opera adrem quancumq; That he is called a Magician now-a-days, who having entred league with the Diuel, useth his help to any matter: yet (as our Saviour said of Divorce) it was not so from the beginning. For the Art of Magick is of the wisdom of Nature; other Arts which undergoe that title, were invented by the falshood, subtilty, and envie of the Devil. In the latter there is no other doctrine, than the use of certain ceremonies, Per malū fidem; By an evill faith: in the former no other ill, than the investigation of those vertues and hidden properties which God hath given to his creatures, and how fitly to apply things that work, to things that suffer. And though by the Jewes those excellent Magicians, Philosophers, and Divines, which came to worship our Saviour Christ, were termed Mechaschephim, or Mecaſchims; yet had they no other reason than common custome therein. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit; Common custome (saith S. Hierome) understandeth Witches under the name of Magicians: And antiquity (saith Peter Martyr) by the word (Magi) understood good and wise men. Quid igitur expauescit Magi nomen formidolose, nomen Evangelio gratiosum, quod non maleficum & veneficum, sed sapientem, bonum & Sacerdotem? O thou fearful one (saith Ficinus) why doubtest thou to use the name of Magus, a name gracious in the Gospel, which doth not signifie a Witch, or Conjuror, but a wise man and a Priest? For what brought this slander to that study and profession, but only idle ignorance, the Parent of caulelesse admiration? Causa fuit nihil-38 rificentia quorundam operum, quæ (re vera) opera naturalia sunt: verumtamen quia procurati- one demonum, naturas ipsas vel conjungentium, vel commiscientium, vel aliter ad operandum expeditum facta sunt, opera demonum credebantur ab ignorantibus hæc. De operibus lu- jussimodis est Magia naturalis, quam Necromantiam multi impropiè vocant: The marvellous- nesse of some works, which (indeed) are naturall, hath been the cause of this slander: but be- cause these works have been done by procurement of Divels, joyning the naturæ together, or mingling them, or howsoever fitting the naturæ to their working, they were thought the works of the Divels by the ignorant. Among these works is naturall Magick, which men call very im- properly Necromantie.

Mirandula in his Apologie goeth further: For by understanding (saith he) the uttermost activity of natural agents we are assayed to know the Divinity of Christ: for otherwise (to use his own words) *ignorantibus terminis potentie & virtutis rerum naturalium, stat nos dubitare illa eadem opera, quæ fecit Christus, posse fieri per media naturalia; The termes or limits of naturall power and vertue not understood, wee must needs doubt whether those very works which Christ did, may not be done by naturall meanes: after which he goeth on in this sort: Ideo non hereticè, non superstitiosè dixi, sed verissimè & Catholicè per talem Magiam adjuvare nos in cognoscenda divinitate Christi: Therefore I said not heretically, nor superstitiously, but most truly and Catholically, that by such Magick we are furthered in knowing the Divinity of Christ. And seeing the Jewes and others, the enemies of Christian Religion, do impudently and impiously object, that those Miracles which Christ wrought were not above nature, but by the exquisite knowledge thereof performed: Mirandula, a man for his years fuller of knowledge than any that this latter Age hath brought forth, might with good reason avow, that the uttermost of Natures workes being knowne, the workes which Christ did, and which (as himself witnesseth) no man could doe, doe manifestly testifie of themselves, that they were performed by that hand which held Nature herein but as a Pencil, and by a power infinitely supream and divine; and thereby those that were faithles, were either converted or put to silence.*

§. III

That the good knowledge in the ancient Magick is not to be condemned: though the Diuel here, as in other kinds, hath sought to obtrude evill things, under the name and colour of good things.

Being therefore it is confessed by all of understanding, that a Magician (according to the Persin word) is no other than, Divinorum cultus & interpretes: A studious observer and exy under of divine things: and the Art of it selfe (I mean the Art of Naturall Magick) no other, quæ in naturalis Philosphie absoluta consummatio; That the absolute perfection of naturall Philosphie: Certainly then it proceeds from ignorance, and

no way sorteth with wife and learned men, promissum, and without difference and distinction, to confound lawful and praise-worthy knowledge with that impious, and (to use S. Pauls words) with those beggerly rudiments, which the Divell hath shuffled, and by them bewitcheth and befooleth gracelesse men. For if we condemn naturall Magick, or the wisdom of Nature, because the Divell (who knows more than any man) doth also teach witches and Poysoners the harmful parts of Herbes, Drugges, Minerals, and Excrements: then may we by the same rule condemn the Physician, and the Art of healing. For the Divell also in the Oracles of Amphiarus, Amphilocheus, Trophonius, and the like, taught men in Dreames what Herbes and Drugges were proper for such and such diseases. Now no man of judgement is ignorant, that the Divell from the beginning hath sought to thrust himselfe into the same employment among the Ministers and Servants of God, changing himselfe for that purpose into an Angel of Light. He hath led men to Idolatry as a Doctrine of Religion; he hath thrust in his Prophets among those of the true God; he hath corrupted the Art of Astrologie, by giving a divine power to the Starres, teaching men to esteeme them as gods, and not as instruments. And (as Bunting observeth) it is true, that judicall Astrologie is corrupted with many superstitions: but the abuse of the thing takes not away the Art, considering that heavenly bodies (as even generall experience sheweth) have, and exercise their operation upon the inferior. For the Sun, and the Star of Mari doe drie; the Moone doth moisten, and govern the Tides of the Sea. Again, the Planets, as they have severall and proper names, so have they severall and proper vertues: the Starres doe also differ in beaurtie and in magnitude; and to all the Starres hath God given also their proper names, which (had they not influences and vertues different) needed not: He counteth the number of the Starres, Psal. 147. and calleth them by their names. But into the good and profitable knowledge of the celestial influences, the Divel ceaseth not to shuffle in his Superstitions: and so to the knowledge of the secret vertues of Nature hath he fastened his doctrine of Characters, Numbers and Incantations; and taught men to beleve in the strength of words and Letters: (which without Faith in God are but Inke or common breath) thereby either to equal his owne with the All-powerful Word of God, or to diminish the glory of Gods creating Word, by whom are all things.

Moreover, he was never ignorant, that both the wife and the simple observe when the Sea-birds forsake the shores and fly into the Land, that commonly some great storme followeth; that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow, betoken faire weather; that the crying of Crows and bating of Ducks, foreshew raime: for they feele the Ayre moistened in their Quils. And it is written in Hieremie the Prophet, *Even the Stork in the ayre knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow. Hereupon, this enemy of Mankind, working upon these as upon the rest of Gods creatures, long time abused the Heathen by teaching them to observe the flying of Fowles, and thereby to judge of good or ill successe in the War: and (withall) to look into their entrails for the same, as if God had written the secrets of unsearchable providence in the livers & bowels of birds and beasts. Again, because it pleased God sometimes by Dreames not only to warne and teach his Prophets and Apostles, but Heathen Princes also; as Gen. 12. v. 17. Abimelech to restore Sara to Abraham; because he admonished Joseph, and by a Dream informed Jacob, Laban, Pharaon, Solomon, Paul, Amias, the Magi of the East, and others. Job 33. 17. For as it is remembered in Job: In Dreames and Visions of the night, when sleepe falleth upon men, &c. then God openeth the eares, that he might cause man to returne from his enterprises: therefore, I say, doth the Divell also practise his Divinations by Dreames, or (after Parisien) divinitate imitationes, his mock-divinitie. This in the end grew so common, as G. Parisien. de leg. 24. cap. Arifides compiled an Ephemerides of his owne Dreames: Mithridates of those of his Con- cubines. Yea the Romans finding the inconvenience hereof, because all dreams (without distinction of cases) were drawne to Divination, forbid the same by a Law, as by the words of prohibition (aut narrandis omnium occultum aliquam artem divinandis) it may appeare. Likewise by the Law of God in Deuteronomie, cap. 13. seducing Dreamers were ordered to be slaine. Yet it is to be contemned, not that Marcus Antonius was told a remedie in his Dreame for two grievous diseases that opprest him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Protopius poisoned wound; nor that which S. Augustine reporteth of a Millanoise; whose son (the Father dead) being demanded a debt already paid, was told by his Father in a dream where the Acquittance lay to discharge it: not*

§. IV.

That Daniels misliking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians, doth not justifie all their practices.

Deut. 13. 6. 7. 8.
Levit. 20.

BUT it may be objected, that if such Divinations as the Heathens commonly used were to be condemned in them, who tooke on them very many and strange Revelations; how came it to passe that Daniel both condemned the haſtie ſentence of Nabuchodonosor againſt the Magicians of Chaldea, and in a ſort forbad it? eſpecially conſidering that ſuch kind of people God himſelfe commanded to be ſlaine. To this, divers answers may be given. Firſt, it ſeemeth that Daniel had reſpect to thoſe Chaldeans, becauſe they acknowledged that the Dreame of the king, which himſelfe had forgotten, could not be knowne to any man by any Art either Natural or Diabolical: For there is none other (ſaid the Chaldeans) that can declare it before the king, except the Gods, whoſe dwelling is not with fleſh: and herein they confeſſed the power of the Ever-living God.

Secondly, it may be conjectured (and that with good reaſon) that among ſo many learned men, ſome of them did not exerciſe themſelves in any evill or unlawfull Arts, but were merely Magicians and Naturaliſts: and therefore when the king commanded to kill all, Daniel perwaded the contrary, and called it a haſty judgement, which proceeded with furie without examination. And that ſome of thoſe mens ſtudies and profeſſions were lawfull, it may be gathered by Daniels inſtruction: for himſelfe had bin taught by them, and was called chiefe of the Inchanters: of which ſome were termed Soothſayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldeans, others Magi or Wiſe-men: and therefore of diſtinct profeſſions.

Thirdly, Daniel miſliked and forbad the execution of that judgement, becauſe it was unjuſt. For howſoever thoſe men might deſerve puniſhment for the practice of unlawfull arts (though not unlawfull according to the law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltleſſe. For he exceeded humane power to pierce the Kings thoughts, which the Divell himſelfe could not know. So then in Daniels diſlike, and hindering of the execution of ſentence of death pronounced againſt the Magicians, there is no abſolute juſtifying of their practice and profeſſion.

§. V.

The abuſe of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemne the right uſe of them.

NOTWITHSTANDING this mixture every where, of good with evill, of falſhood with truth, of corruption with cleannesse and purity: The good, The truth, The purity in every kind may well be embraced: As in the ancient worſhipping of God by Sacrifice, there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forebare to offer Sacrifice to the God of all power, becauſe the Divell in the Image of Baal, Aſtaroth, Chemoth, Jupiter, Apollo, and the like was ſo adored.

Eſay. 45. 16.
Gen. 22. 17.

Neither did the abuſe of Astrologie terrifie Abraham (if we may beleeve the moſt ancient and religious Hiſtorians) from obſerving the motions and natures of heavenly bodies: neither can it dehorte wiſe and learned men in theſe dayes from attributing thoſe vertues, influences, and inclinations to the Starres and other lights of Heaven, which God hath given to thoſe his glorious creatures.

The Sympatheticall and Antipatheticall working of Herbes, Plants, Stones, Minerals, with their other utmoſt vertues ſometimes taught by the Divell, and applied by his Miniſters to harmefull and uncharitable ends, can never terrifie the honeſt and learned Phyſician or Magician from the uſing of them to the helpe and comfort of Mankind: neither can the illuſions, whereby the Divell betrayeth ſuch men as are fallen from God, make other men reject the obſervations of Dreames; ſo far as with a good Faith and a Religious caution they may make uſe of them.

Laſtly, the prohibition to marke flying of Fowles (as ſignes of good or evill ſucces) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crows againſt Raine, or to any obſervation not ſuperſtitious, and whereof a reaſon or cauſe may be given. For if we confound Arts with with the abuſe of them, we ſhall not onely condemne all honeſt Trades and exchange among men (for there are that deceive in all profeſſions) but we ſhall in a ſhort time bury in forgetfulneſſe all excellent knowledg and all learning, or obſcure and cover it over with a moſt ſcornfull and beggarly ignorance: and (as Plinie teacheth) we ſhould ſhew our ſelves towards thoſe, who with paines and care have diſcovered unto us light in this light.

Indeed not onely theſe natural knowledges are condemned by thoſe that are ignorant; but the Mathematicks alſo and Profeſſers thereof: though thoſe, that are excellently learned, judge of it in this ſort: In ſpeculo Mathematico verum illud, quod in omni ſcientia queritur, elucet; non modo remota ſimilitudine, ſed ſulgida quadam propinquitate; In the Glaſſe of the Mathematicks that Truth doth ſhine, which is ſought in every kind of knowledge; not in an obſcuring, but in a neere and manifeſt representation.

§. VI.

Of the divers kinds of unlawfull Magicke.

IT is true that there are many Arts, if we may ſo call them, which are covered with the name of Magicke: and eſteemed abuſively to be as branches of that Tree, on whoſe rooy they never grew. The firſt of theſe hath the name of Necromancy or Goria: and of this againe there are divers kinds. The one is an Invocation at the graves of the dead, to whom the Divell himſelfe gives answer in ſtead of thoſe that ſeeme to appeare. For certaine it is, that the immortal ſoules of men doe not inhabit the duſt and dead bodies, but they give motion and underſtanding to the living: death being nothing elle but a ſeparation of the body and ſoule: and therefore the ſoule is not to be found in the Graves.

A ſecond practice of thoſe men, who pay Tribute or are in league with Satan, is that of conjuring or of rayſing up Divels, of whom they hope to learne what they liſt. Theſe men are ſo diſtracted, as they believe that by terrible words they make the Divell to tremble; that being once impaled in a Circle (a Circle which cannot keepe out a Mouſe) they therein (as they ſuppoſe) inſconce themſelves againſt that great Monſter. Doubtleſſe, they forget that the Divell is not terrified from doing ill and all that is contrary to God and goodneſſe, no, not by the fearefull word of the Almighty: and that he feared not to offer to ſit in Gods ſeat, that he made no ſcruple to tempt our Saviour Chriſt, whom himſelfe called the Son of God. So, forgetting theſe proud parts of his, an unworthy wretch will yet reſolve himſelfe, that he can draw the Divell out of Hell, and terrifie him with a Phraſe: whereas in very truth, the obedience which the Divels ſeemeto uſe, is but thereby to poſſeſſe themſelves of the bodies & ſoules of thoſe which they raiſe them upas His Majeltie in his Book aforementioned hath excellently taught: That the Divels obedience is only, ſecundum quid, ſcilicet ex paſſo; reſpectu, that is, upon bargaine.

I cannot tell what they can doe upon thoſe ſimple and ignorant Divels, which inhabit Lamblins imaginations; but ſure I am the reſt are apt enough to come uncalled: and alwaies attending the cogitations of their ſervants and vaffals, doe no way need any ſuch inforcement.

Or it may be that theſe Conjurers dealt altogether with Cardans mortall Divels, following the opinion of Rabbi Avornathan and of Porphyrius, who taught that theſe kind of Divels lived not above a thouſand yeares: which Plotarch in his Treatiſe of Oraculorum deſectu confirmeth, making example of the great god Pan. For were it true that the Divels were in awe of wicked men, or could be compelled by them, then would they alwaies fear thoſe words and threats, by which at other times they are willingly mastered. But the Familiar of Simon Magnus when he had liſted him up in the Ayre, caſt him headlong out of his clawes, when he was ſure he ſhould periſh with the fall. If this perhappes were done by S. Peters Prayers (of which S. every day, that the Divell leaves all Witches and Sorcerers at the Gallows, for whom at other times he maketh himselfa Pegasus, to convey them in haste to places far distant, or at least makes them so thinke: For to those th it received not the truth (saith Saint Paul) God shall send them strong illusions: Of these their supposed transporations (yet agreeing with their confessions) His Majesty in the second Book and the fourth Chapter of the Demonologie, hath confirmed by unanswerable reasons, that they are meerly illusive. Another sort there are who take on them to include Spirits in Glasses and Crystals; of whom Cusanus: Falsi sunt incantatores, qui in ungue & vitro volunt spiritum includere, quia Spiritus non clauduntur corpore: They are foolish Inchanters, which will shut up their spirits within their nails or in Glasse: for a Spirit cannot be inclosed by a body.

There is also another Art besides the afore-mentioned, which they call Theurgia, or White Magick; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by Sacrifice and Invocation they draw out of Heaven and communicate withall. But the administering Spirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due unto their Creator; so seeing they are most free Spirits, there is no man so absurd to thinke (except the devil have corrupted his understanding) that they can be constrained or commanded out of Heaven by threats. Wherefore let the professors thereof cover themselves how they please by a professed purity of life, by the ministry of infants, by fasting and abstinence in general; yet all those that tamper with immateriall substances, and abstract natures, either by Sacrifice, Vow, or Enforcement, are men of evil faith, and in the power of Satan. For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are Devils, which willingly obey.

Other sorts there are of wicked Divinations; as by fire, called Pyromantia: by water, called Hydromantia: by the ayre, called Matazotechnia, and the like.

The last, and (indeed) the worst of all other is Falcination or Witchcraft: the Practisers whereof are no less envious and cruell, revengefull and bloudy, than the Devil himself. And these accursed creatures having fold their souls to the Devil, work two waies; either by the Devil immediately, or by the Art of poisoning. The difference between Necromancers and Witches, His Majesty hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a sort) command; the other obey the Devil.

There is another kind of pettie witchery (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of Beasts and Birds, of which Pythagoras was accused, because an Eagle lighted on his shoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the same exceeded the Art of Falconrie, yet was it no more to be admired than Mahomet's Dove, which he had used to feed with Wheat out of his ear: which Dove, when it was hungry, lighted on Mahomet's shoulder, and thrust his Bill therein to find his break-fast: Mahomet perfwading the rude and simple Arabians, that it was the holy Ghost that gave him advice. And certainly if Banks had lived in elder times, he would have shamed all the Inchanters of the World: for whosoever was most famous among them, could never master or instruct any beast as he did his Horse.

For the drawing of Serpents out of their Dens, or killing of them in the holes by Inchantments (which the Marians, a people of Italie, practised: Colubros distrumpit Mariana cantu: incantant Marisa makes the snakes to burst.) That it hath bene used it appears, Psalme 58.6. though I doubt not, but that many Impostures may be in this kinde, and even by natural causes it may be done. For there are many fumes that will either draw them out or destroy them; as womens haire burnt, and the like. So many things may be layed in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I find no other Magicks or Inchantments than to draw out a Mouse with a piece of tosted Cheefe.

of divers waies by which the Divell seemeth to work his wonders.

But to the end that we may not dote with the Manichees, who make two powers of goods: that we doe not give to the Divell any other dominion than he hath (not to speake of his abilitie, when he is the Minister of Gods vengeance; as when Egypt, according to David, was destroyed by evil Angels) he otherwise worketh but three waies. The first is by moving the cogitation and affections of men: the second second by the exquisite knowledge of Nature: and the third by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And that they cannot work what they would, G. Parisiensis giveth three causes: the first, a natural impotency: the second, their own reason disswading them from daring overmuch, or indeed (and that which is the only certain cause) the great mercy of the Creator, Tenens eos ligatos (saith the same Author) velut inmanissimas belluas. S. Augustine was of opinion that the Froegges which Pharaohs Sorcerers produced, were not naturall, but that the Divel (by betraying of their senses that looked on) made them appear to be such. For as Varus observeth, those Froegs of the Inchanters were not found corrupted as those of Moses were, which might argue that they were not creatures indeed. Hereof saith S. Augustine: Nec sane Demones naturae creati, sed quae a Deo creatae sunt commutant, ut videantur esse quod non sunt: The Devils create not, but change those that are created by God, as they seem to be that which they be not: of which in the 83. question he giveth the reason. Demon quibusdam nebulis implet omnes meatus intelligentiae, per quos aperire lumen rationis radius mentis solet, (that is) The Devils fill with certain clouds all passages of the understanding, by which the beam of the minde is wont to open the light of reason.

Sial. parif. de universis. p. 2. c. 70.

Maxima vis est phantasie ad errores.

And as Levillian in his Book de anima rightly conceiveth, if the Devil can possess himself of the eyes of our minds and blinde them, it is not hard for him to dazel those of the body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God passeth out, the Devil enreth in, beginning with the fantasie, by which he doth more easily betray the other faculties of the soule: for the fantasie is most apt to be abused by vain apprehensions.

Aquinas on the contrary held that those Froegs were not imaginary, but such indeed as they seemed: not made Magica artis ludibria, which indeed agreeth not with the Art, but (according to Thomas) Per aptam & idoneam agentium & patientium applicationem: By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moses could not be deceived by that sleight of false semblance; and Saint Augustine in another case like unto this (to wit) of the turning of Dionedes his companions into Birds, per actura cum passivis, inclineth rather to this opinion: though I am not perswaded that Saint Augustine believed that of Dionedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiensis, a man very learned also, confirmeth. For speaking of natural

De leg. c. 24. fol. c. 57.

Magick he useth these words: De his quodam autem operibus & subita generatio ranarum, & pedicularum, & vermium, aliorumque animalium quorundam: in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verum adhibitis adiutoris, qua ipsa semina naturae confortant & accunt, ita ut opus generationis tantum accelerent, ut eis qui hoc nesciunt non opus naturae videatur (quae tardius talia efficere consuevit) sed potentia Demonum, &c. to which he addeth: Qui autem in his docti sunt, talia non mirantur, sed solum Creatorem in his glorificant: In such works (saith he) the sodain generation of Froegs and Lice, and Worms, and some other creatures is: in all which Nature alone worketh; but by means strengthening the Seeds of Nature, and quickning them; in such wise that they so hasten the work of generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant not to be the work of Nature, which usually worketh more leisurely, but they think it is done by the powers of Devils. But they who are learned in these Arts, marvel not at such working, but glorifie the Creator. Now by these two waies the Devils do most frequently work, (to wit) by knowing the uttermost of nature; and by illusion: for there is no incomprehensible or unsearchable power, but of God only.

For shall we say, he causeth sometimes thunders, lightnings, and tempests; and can infect the ayre, as well as move it or compress it; who knows not that these things are also naturall? Or may it be objected that he fore-teller things before they happen, which exceedeth nature, and is no illusion. It is true, that he sometimes doth it; but how? In elder ages he stole his knowledge out of the predictions of the Prophets: and he foretold the death of Saul, at such time as he was in his own possession and power to dispose of. And he that hath lived from the infancy of the world to this day, and observed the success of every counsaile: he that by reason of his swift motions can inform himself of all places, and preparations: he that is of counsaile with all those that study and practise subversion & destruction: he that is Prince of the ayre, &c. can thence better judge, than those that inhabit the earth: if he should not sometimes, yea if he should not very oftentimes guess rightly of things to come (where God please) not to give impediment) it were very strange. For we see that wife and learned men do oftentimes oftentimes by comparing like causes, conceive rightly of like effects, before they happen: and yet where the Devil doubteth, and would willingly keep his credit, he ever more answereth by Riddles: as Cræsus Halym penetrans magnam sub vertit opum vim:

If Cræsus over Halys go,
Great Kingdoms he shall overthrow.

Which answer may be taken either way: either for the overthrow of his own Kingdom, or of his Enemies. And thus far we grant the Devil may proceed in predictions, to which (otherwise) belong to God only, as it is in Esay: Shew the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are Gods; shew us at all times and certainly what is to come. Solus enim divine intelligentie ac sapientie est, occulta nosse & revelare: It is only proper to Gods understanding and wisdom to know and reveal hidden things.

§. VIII

That none was ever raised from the dead by the power of the Devil: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

TO conclude, it may be objected that the Devil hath raised from the dead: and that others by his power have done the like, as in the example given of Samuel raised by the Witch of Endor: which were it true, then might it indeed be affirmed, that some of the Devils acts exceeded all the powers of nature, false semblance, and other illusions. Justine Martyr was sometime of the opinion, that it was Samuel indeed; and so was Ambrose, Lyra, and Burgenfis; from which authorities those men borrow strength which he believe. But Martyr changed his opinion; and so did S. Augustine, who at first seemed to be indifferent: For in his questions upon the Old and New Testament, he accounteth it detestable to think that it was Samuel which appeared: and these be his words elsewhere to the same effect: In requie sunt anime priorum: a corpore separate, impiorum autem penas lunt, donec istarum ad vitam eternam, illarum vero ad eternam mortem que secunda dicitur, corpora reviviscant: The souls of the godly separated from their bodies are at rest, but those of the wicked suffer punishment, till the bodies of the just rise to eternal life, and of the wicked to an eternal and second death.

And (besides S. Augustine) Justine Martyr, Helarius, Terullian, Athanasius, Chrysostome, and others, believed firmly, and taught it: that the souls of men being once separate from their bodies, did not wander on the earth at all: Credere debemus (saith Cyrril) quum a corporibus sanctorum anime abierint, tanquam in manus clarissimi patris Bonitati divine commendari: We must believe when the souls of holy men are departed from their bodies, that they be commended to the divine Goodnesse, as into the hands of a most dear Father. If then they be in Heaven, the power of the Devil cannot stretch so high: if in Hell, Ab inferno nulla est redemptio; From Hell there is no redemption. For there are but two habitations after death: Unum (saith Augustine) in igne eterno: alterum in regno eterno: The one in eternal fire; the other in Gods eternal Kingdom. And though it be written in Job livifying, that many there are who believe that the dead have again appeared to the living; yet the Glosse upon the same Text finds it ridiculous: Credunt, & male, quia sunt Phantasmata (saith the Glosse) They believe, and they believe amisse, because they be but Phantasmes or Apparitions. For whereas any such voyce hath been heard, saying, I am the Soule of such a one: Hæc oratio à fraude atq; deceptione diabolica est: That speech is framed by the fraud and deception of the Devil, saith Chrysostome. Likewise of the same, saith Terullian: Abstine animam cuiuslibet sancti, nedum Prophete, à demonio credamus extrahi: God forbid that we should think that the soul of any holy man, much lesse of a Prophet, should be drawn up again by a Devil.

It is true that the Scriptures call that apparition, Samuel; so do they the wooden images, Cherubims: and false brazen gods are gods, and the like. And whereas these of the contrary opinion build upon that place of the 26 of Ecclesiasticus a book not numbered among the Canonicall Scriptures, as S. Augustine himself in this Treatise, if it be his, De cura pro mortuis agenda, confesseth; yet Syracides, following the littell sense and phrase of the Scriptures, proveth nothing at all: For though the Devil would willingly per-swade, that the souls (yea even of just men) were in his power; yet so far is it from the promises of the Scriptures, and from Gods just and mercifull nature, and so contrary to all divine reason, as S. Augustine (or whosoever wrote that book before cited) might rightly term it a detestable opinion so to think. For if God had so absolutely forsaken Saul, that he refused to answer him either by Dreams, by Urim, or by his Prophets: it were foolish to conceive, that he would permit the Divell, or a wicked Witch, to raise a Prophet from the dead in Sauls respect: it being also contrary to his own divine Law to ask counsell of the dead; as in Deuteron. 18. and elsewhere. Therefore it was the Devil, and not the soul of a dead body, that gave answer and advice.

10 But because Helias and Helizur had raised some from the dead by the power of Gods; those Devils which S. Augustine calleth Ludificatores animantium sibi subiectorum; Mockers of their own vassals; casting before their eyes a semblance of humane bodies, and framing sounds to their ears like the voices of men, do also perwade their gracelesse and accursed attendants, that themselves both possesse, and have power over the souls of men. Eliud Diabolus aciem tuam spectantium, tum etiam cogitantium, saith L. Vives; The Devil beguileth the (sense both of the beholders, and of those that so imagine. These then are the bounds of the Devils power, whom if we will not fear, we must fear to sin. For when he is not the instrument of Gods vengeance, he can touch no man that makes not himselfe his voluntary vassall: Potest ad malum invitare, non potest trahere, saith S. Augustine;

20 He can allure, but he cannot enforce to evill. Such as think otherwise, may go into the number remembered by Lucretium:

*Nam veluti pueri trepidant, atque omnia cecis
In tenebris metunt: sic nos in luce timemus.*

We fear by light, as children in the dark.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus, and of his wife Semiramis, and of other her Acts.

§. I.

Of the magnificent building of Nineve by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

BUt to come back to Ninus the amplifier and finisher of Nineve: whether he performed it before or after the overthrow of Zoroaster, it is uncertain. As for the City it selfe, it is agreed by all prophane Writers, and confirmed by the Scriptures, that it exceeded all other in circuit, and answerable magnificence. For it had in compass 440 stadia, or furlongs; the walls whereof were an hundred foot upright, and had such a breadth as three Chariots might passe on the Rampire in front: these walls were garnished with 1500. Towers, which gave exceeding beauty to the rest, and strength, no lesse admirable for the nature of those times.

But this City (built in the Plaines of Assyria, and on the banks of Tygris, and in the region of Eden) was founded long before Ninus time; and (as ancient Historians report, and more lately Nauclerus) had the name of Campfor, at such time as Ninus amplified the 50 same, and gave it a wall, and called it after his own name.

For these works of Babylon and Nineve begun by Nimrod in Chaldea, and in Assyria, Ninus and Semiramis made perfect. Ninus finished Nineve, Semiramis Babylon: where- in the sought to exceed her husband by far. Indeed in the first Age when Princes were moderate, they neither thought how to invade others, nor feared to be invaded: labouring to build Towns and Villages for the use of themselves and their people, without either Walls or Towers; and how they might discharge the earth of Woods, Briars, Bulshments, and Waters, to make it more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis living in that Age, when Ambition was strong in youth: and purposing to follow the conquest which her husband had undertaken, gave that beauty and strength to Babylon which it had.

§ II.

Of the end of Ninus: and beginning of Semiramis reigns.

THIS she did after the death of her husband Ninus: who after he had mastered Babylonia, and subjected unto his Empire all those Regions between it and the Mediterranean Sea, and Helleſpont (Asia the less excepted) and finished the work of Ninus, he left the World in the year thereof 2019. after he had reigned 52 years. Plutarch reporteth that Semiramis desired her husband Ninus, that he would grant unto her the absolute sovereign power for one day. Diodorus Siculus out of Athenæus, and others, speaks of five dayes. In which time (moved either with desire of rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her husband Menon, who perished for her) she caused Ninus her husband to be slain. But this seemeth rather a scandall cast on her by the Greeks, than that it had any truth.

Dine.*

Howsoever Ninus came to his end, Semiramis took on her after his death the sole rule of the Assyrian Empire: of which, Ninus was said to be the first Monarch, because he changed his seat from Babylonia in Chaldea, to Nineve in Assyria. Justin reports, that Semiramis (the better to invest her selfe, and in her beginning without murmure or offence to take on her so great a charge) presented her selfe to the people in the person of her son Ninias or Zameis, who bare her externall form and proportion without any sensible difference.

This report I take also to be feigned, for which many arguments might be made. But as she ruled long, so she performed all those memorable acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and subscribed that letter which she sent to the King of India (her last challenge and undertaken conquest) by her owne name. And were it true that her son Ninias had such a stature as his fathers death, as that Semiramis (who was very personable) could be taken for him; yet it is very unlikely that shee could have held the Empire from him 2 years after by any such subtilty: (for so long shee reigned after the death of her husband;) but it may be true that Ninias or Zameis (being wholly given to his pleasures, as it is written of him) was well pleased with his mothers prosperous government and undertakings.

§ III.

Of Semiramis parentage and education, and Metamorphosis of her mother.

SOME Writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to have been of base parentage, calling her after the name of her Country, a Syrian. Berosus calls her after the name of her City wherein she was born, Semiramis Ascalonitis, of Ascalon, the ancient City and Metropolis of the Philistines. Others report her to be the daughter of Derecta, a Curtisan of Ascalon, exceeding beautifull. Others say that this Derecta or Derectis, the mother of Semiramis, was sometimes a Recluse, and had profest a holy and a religious life; to whom there was a Temple dedicated, seated on the bank of a Lake adjoining to Ascalon; and afterward falling in love with a godly young man, she was by him made with childe, which (for fear of extreme punishment) shee conveyed away, and caused the same to be hidden among the high reeds which grew on the banks of the Lake: in which (while the childe was left to the mercy of wilde beasts) the same was fed by certain birds, which used to feed upon or neer those waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the Harlot that fostered Romulus. For some one or other adjoining to this Lake, had the charge and fosteridge of this childe, who being per chance but some base and obscure creature, the mother might thereby hope the better to cover her dishonour and breach of vow; notwithstanding which the was cast from the top of her Temple into the Lake adjoining, &c. (as the Poets have feigned) changed by Venus into a Fish, all but her face, which still held the same beauty and humane shape. It is thought that from this Derecta the invention of that Idoll of the Philistines (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a mans face, and a fishes body: into whose Temple when the Arke of God was brought, the Idoll fell fell twice to the ground: and at the second fall there remained onely the trunk of Dagon, the head being broken off: For so S. Hierome hath converted that place. Valabius, Paginnus, and Junius, write it by Dagon onely, which signifieth a fish, and so it onely appeared: the head thereof by the second fall being sundred from the body.

For my self I rather think, that this Dagon of the Philistines was an Idoll representing Triton, one of those imaginary Sea-gods under Neptune. For this City being maritime (as all those of the Philistines were, and so were the best of Phœnicia) used all their devotions to Neptune, and the rest of the petty gods which attended him.

§ IV.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbability of her vices.

BUT for her Pedigree, I leave it to the Assyrian Herald: and for her vicious life, I ascribe the report thereof to the envious and lying Crecians. For delicacy and ease doe more often accompany licentiousness in men and women, than labour and hazard doe. And if the one halfe be true which is reported of this Lady, then there never lived any Prince or Princesse more worthy of fame than Semiramis was, both for the works she did at Babylon and elsewhere, and for the wars she made with glorious success: all but her last enterprize of India, from whence both Strabo and Arianus report that she never returned: and that of all her most powerfull Army there survived but onely twenty persons: the rest being either drowned in the river of Indus, dead of the famine, or slain by the sword of Stamrobates. But as the multitude which went out are more than reason hath numbered; so were those that returned lesse than could have escaped of such an Army, as consisted of four millions and upwards. For these numbers which she levied by her Lieutenant Derectenus, (saith Suidas) did consist of Foot-men three millions; of Horse-men one million; of Chariots armed with hooks on each side one hundred thousand; of those which fought upon Camels as many of Camels for burden two hundred thousand; of raw Hides for all uses three hundred thousand; of Gallies with brazen heads three thousand, by which the might transport over Indus at once three hundred thousand souldiers: which Gallies were furnished with Syrians, Phœnicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. These incredible and impossible numbers, which no one place of the earth was able to nourish (had every man and beast but fed upon grass) are taken from the authority of Ctesias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many frivolous reports: so Diodorus himselfe hath nothing of certainty, but from Xerxes expedition into Greece and afterwards: whose Army (though the same was far inferiour to that of Semiramis) yet it had weight enough to overload the beliefs of any reasonable man. For all Authors consent, that Xerxes transported into Greece an Army of 1700000. and gathered together (therein to passe the Helleſpont) three thousand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the severall Provinces whence those Gallies were taken hath collected the number.

But of what multitude soever the Army of Semiramis consisted, the same being broken and overthrowen by Stamrobates upon the banks of Indus, canticum cantavit extremum; she sang her last song; and (as Antiquity hath feigned) was changed by the gods into a Dove (the bird of Venus) whence it came that the Babylonians gave a Dove in their ensignes.

§ V.

Of the Temple of Belus built by Semiramis: and of the Pyramides of Egypt.

AMONG all her other memorable and more than magnificent works (besides the wall of the City of Babylon) was the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this City, environed with a wall carried four square of great height and beauty, having on each square certain brazen Gates curiously engraven. In the Core of the square the raised a Tower of a furlong high, which is halfe a quarter of a mile; and upon it again (taking a Base of a lesse circuit) she set a second Tower; and so eight in all one above another, upon the top whereof the Chaldean Priests made the observation of the Stars; because this Tower over-topped the ordinary clouds.

Presl. in Titian
lib. 1.

Bell. a. 12.

By beholding the ruines of this Tower have many Travellers been deceived; who suppose that they have seen a part of Nimrod's Tower, when it was but the foundation of this Temple of Bel: (except this of Bel were founded on that of Nimrod.) There were burnt in this Temple one hundred thousand talents of frankincense every year (saith Herodotus.) This Temple did Nabuchodonosor adorn with the spoils of Hierusalem, and of the Temple of Solomon: all which vessels and ornaments Cyrus re-delivered. This Temple Xerxes evened with the soile; which Alexander is said to have repaired, by the perswasions of the Chaldeans. I deny not that it might have been in his desire to do so; but he enjoyed but a few years after Babylon taken, and therefore could not perform any such work. The Egyptians (saith Frochus) inhabiting a low and level ground, and given to the same superstition of the Stars that the Chaldeans were, erected in imitation, and for the same service and use, the Pyramides by Memphis, which were consecrated to the sun, and were of the same figure, as the Pyramides of the Chaldeans. Of these Pyramides, Bellonius a carefull observer of rarities (who being in Egypt, mounted by steps to the top of the highest) maketh this report: Le meilleur archer qui seroit a sa sommite, & tirant une fleche en l'air, a peine pourroit l'envoyer hors de sa base q' elle ne se tombast sur les degrez; The best Archer standing on the top of one of these Pyramides, and shooting an arrow from thence into the ayre as far as he can, with great difficulty shall be able so to force the same, but that it will fall upon some of the degrees or steps.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD:

INTREATING OF THE TIMES from the birth of ABRAHAM to the destruction of the Temple of SOLOMON.

THE SECOND BOOK.

CHAP. I.

of the time of the birth of Abraham: and of the use of this question for the ordering of the storie of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

of some of the successors of Semiramis: with a briefe transition to the question about the time of the birth of Abraham.

After the death of Semiramis, Ninias or Zameis succeeded her in the Empire, on whom Berosus Annianus bestowes the conquest of Bactria, and the overthrow of Zoroaster; contrary to Diodorus, Justin, Orosius, and all other approved Writers. For Ninias being esteemed no man of war at all, but altogether feminine, and subjected to ease and delicacy, there is no probability in that opinion. Now because there was nothing performed by this Ninias of any moment, other than that out of jealousie he every year changed his Provinciaall Governours, and built Colledges for the Chaldean Priests, his Astronomers: nor by Arius his successour, whom Suidas calleth Thyras; but that he reduced againe the Bactrians and Caspians, revolted (as it seemeth) in Ninias his time: nor of Aralins, the successour of Arius; but that he added sumptuosity, invented jewels of gold and stone, and some engines for the war: I will for this present passe them over, and a while follow Abraham, whose wayes are warrantable, (till we meet these Assyrians again in this story) by whom and by whose issues we shall best give date to the Kings of Babylon: Abraham living at once with Ninus, Ninias, Semiramis, Arius, Aralins, and Xerxes, or Balamius. For otherwise if we seek to prove things certain by the uncertain, and judge of those times, which the Scriptures set us downe without error, by the reignes of the Assyrian Princes: we shall but patch up the story at adventure, and leave it in the same confusion, in which to this day it hath remained. For where the Scriptures doe not help us, Mirum non est in rebus antiquis Historiam non constare; No marvell if then in things very ancient, History want assurance.

The better therefore to find out, in what age of the World, and how long these Assyrian kings reigned, as also for other good causes, we must first assure the time of Abrahams birth, and in what yeer the same hapned after the flood. Now since all agree, that the fortieth fortieth three year of Ninus was the birth-year of Abraham; by proving directly out of the Scriptures, in what year after the flood the birth of Abraham hapned, we shall thereby set all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much jangling between those Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part making 292, or 293, years; others 352, years between Abrahams birth and the flood: a matter often disputed, but never concluded.

Archilochus de temporibus (as we find him in Annius) makes but 250. years from the flood to Ninus: then seeing that Abraham was born in the fortieth three year of Ninus, according to Eusebius and S. Augustine, it followeth by the addition of those two numbers, that the year of Abrahams birth was in the year after the flood 293. or, as the most part of all Chronologers gather, the year 292.

Now, since I do here enter into that never resolved question, and Labyrinth of times, it behoveth me to give reason for my own opinion: and with so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walk aside, and in a way a part from the multitude; yet not alone, and without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather choose to endure the wounds of those darts, which Envie casteth at Novelty, than to go on safely and sleepily in the easy wayes of ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many errors, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diversity.

§. II.

A proposal of all reasons or arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was born in the year 292. after the Flood, and not in the year 352.

Those which seek to prove this account of 292. years, between the generall flood and Abrahams birth, ground themselves, first on these words of the Scripture: So Terah lived 70. years, and begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: secondly, upon the opinion of Josephus, S. Augustine, Beda, Isidore, and many of the ancient Hebrews before them: authorities (while they are slightly look't over) seeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture last remembered, the later Chronologers gather these arguments. First out of the words as they lie; That Terah at 70. years begot Abraham, Nahor and Haran: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, Abraham being the son of the promise, ought in this respect to be accounted the eldest son of Terah, and so necessarily born in the seventieth year of his life. Secondly, it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heir of the blessing; and not of Nahor and Haran: for the scope of this Chapter was to set down the genealogie of Christ, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nahor and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, that if Abraham were not the eldest son, then there can be no certainty of his age, and so for all future times made doubtfull. For it cannot then be proved, that Abraham was born more assuredly in the 130. year of Terah his age, than in the 131, 132, &c. Moses having no where set down precisely that Abraham went into Canaan that very year, in which his father died.

Fourthly, it is thought improbable, that Terah begot Abraham at 130. years: seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to be made a father at 100. years.

§. III.

The answer to one of the objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan: and it, after his fathers death.

To answer all which objections, it is very easie, the way being prepared thereto by so divers learned Divines long since, and to which I will adde somewhat of mine owne, according to the small talent which God hath given me. Now forasmuch as the state of the question cannot well be scanned, unless the time of Abrahams journey into Canaan be first considered of; before I descend unto the particular examination of these arguments, I will make hold with order and method so far, as to search into a strange tradition concerning his travells, that serveth as a ground for this opinion, and a bulwark against all that can be said to the contrary.

But it is conceived that Abraham made two journeys into Canaan: the later after his fathers Fathers death, the former presently upon his calling; which he performed without delay, not staying for his fathers death at Haran: a conjecture, drawne from a place in the Epistle to the Hebrews, where it is written, By faith Abraham (when he was called) obeyed God to goe out into a place which he should afterward receive for inheritance: and he went out, not knowing whither he went. This supposition (if it be granted) serves very well to uphold the opinion, that can ill stand without it. Let us therefore see whether we may give credit to the supposition it selfe.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charran or Haran after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proved, without the admission of any distinction, by these words of St. Stephen: And after his Father was dead, God brought him into this Land, where ye now dwell, that was, out of Haran into Canaan. Against which place so direct and plaine, what force hath any mans fancy or supposition, perswading, that Abraham made two journeys into Canaan one before Terahs death, and another after: no such thing being found in Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability, or reason to induce it? For if any man out of this place before alledged can picke any argument, proving, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham past into Canaan, and then returned unto Haran, from whence he departed a second time: then I thinke it reason, that he be beleev'd in the rest. But that he performed the commendement of God after his Fathers death, leaving Ur and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselves are true. For after 30 his Father was dead, (saith Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double journey into Canaan, then must it be inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembered the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abrahams coming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offended the Jewes, his adversaries, too great an occasion both of scandalizing himselfe, and the Gospell of Christ. Indeed we shall finde small reason to make us thinke that Abraham passed and repassed those wayes, more often than he was enforced so to do, if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisome journey, than the strength of his faith in Gods promise: in which if any thing would have brought him to despaire, he had more cause than ever man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborn nations: a nation of valiant and resolved Idolaters. He was besieged with famine at his first arrival, and driven to sleight into Egypt for relief. His wife was old, and he had no son to inherit the promise. And when God had given him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him up to himself for sacrifice: all which discomforts he patiently and constantly underwent.

Secondly, let us consider the wayes themselves, which Abraham had to passe over; the length whereof was 300 English miles; and through Countries of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himself over the great river of Emphrates, to travell through the dangerous and barren Desarts of Palmyrena, and to climb over the great and high mountains of Libanus, Hermon, or Gilead: and whether these were easie walkes for Abraham to march twice over, containing, as aforesaid, 300. miles in length, let every reasonable man judge. For if he travailed it twice; then was his journey in all 1800. miles from Ur to Haran: and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disprove this fancy; the manner of Abrahams departing from Haran hath more prooffe (that he had not animum reverendi, not any thought of looking backward) than any mans bare conjecture, be he of what antiquity or authority soever. For thus it is written of him, Then Abraham took Sara his wife, and Lot his brothers son, and all their substance that they possess, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the land of Canaan, and to the land of Canaan they came. Now if Abraham brought all with him that was dear unto him; his wife, and kinsmen, and his, and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walk it back again for his pleasure, in so warm, dangerous, and barren a Country as that was: or if he could have been there-to moved, it is more likely that he would have then returned, when he was yet unsettled, and prest with extreme famine at his first arrivall. For had his Father been then alive, he might have hoped from him to receive more assured comfort and relief, than among the Egyptians, to whom he was a meer stranger both in Religion and Nation.

What the cause might be of Abrahams return to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures have sent him back thither, above the

the time of his fathers death : so they perhaps, if they were urged, could say little else, than that without such a second voyage their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should do well to make plain, if it be not over- troublesome. They say that Abraham was in Haran at his Father's death, or some time after, being then by their account 135 years old, or a little more. How then did it happen, that he left quite undone the business, which, as we read, was within four or five years after that time his greatest, or (as may seem) his onely care? Did not he binde with a very solemn oath his principal servant, in whom he reposed most confidence, to travell into those parts, and seek out a Wife for Isaac his son? and doth it not appear by all circumstances, that neither he nor his servant were so well acquainted in Mesopotamia, as that they could particularly design any one woman, as a fit match for Isaac? Surely if Abraham had been there in person so lately, as within four or five years before, he would not have forgotten a matter of such importance; but would have trusted his own judgement, in choosing a woman, fit for her piety, virtue, and other desirable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his onely son, who was then five and thirty years old, before which age most of the Patriarchs after the Flood had begotten children: rather than have left all at random to the consideration of a servant, that neither knew any, nor was known of any in that Country. But let it be supposed (if it may be believed) that either Abraham forgot his business when he was there, or that somewhat happened which no man can devise; What might be the reason, that Abraham man, in doing his Masters errand, was faine to lay open the whole story of his Masters prosperity, telling it as news, that Sarah had borne to him a son in her old age? If Abraham himself, a more certain Author, had so lately been among them, would not all this have bin an idle tale? It were needles to stand long upon a thing so evident. Whether it were lawful for Abraham to have returned back to Haran, would perhaps be a question hardly answerable: considering how averse he was from permitting his son to be carried thither, even though a wife of his own kinned could not have been obtained without his personal presence, Jacob indeed was sent thither by his Parents, to take a Wife of his own linage; not without Gods especial approbation, by whose blessing he prospered in that journey; yet he lived there as a servant; suffered many injuries; and finally was driven to convey himself away from thence by flight. For although it be not a sentence written, yet out of all written examples it may be observed, that God alloweth not in his servants any desire of returning to the place, from whence he hath taken, and transplanted them. That brief saying, Remember Lots wife, contains much matter. Let us consider Mesopotamia, from whence Abraham was taken, and Egypt, out of which the whole Nation of the Israelites were delivered: we shall find, that no blessing issued from either of them, to the posterity of the Hebrews. When Ezechias was visited with an honourable Embassie from Babel, it seems that he conceived great pleasure in his minde, and thought it a piece of his prosperity; but the prophesie which thereupon he heard by Esay, made him to know, that the counsell of God was not agreeable to such thoughts: which more plainly appeared in a following generation, when by the waters of Babylon they late down and wept. Concerning Egypt we read, that Sesac and Neco, Kings of Egypt, brought calamity upon Israel: also that their confidence in the Egyptian succours was the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to return into Egypt I do not remember, nor can readily finde; but it is found in Deuteronomy, that God had said, They should no more return that way; which is given as the reason, why their King might not cause the people to return to Egypt, for the multiplying of his Horses. Whether the Lord had laid any such injunction upon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things do argue it probably: That he never returned, all circumstances do (to my understanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

But because this double passage of Abraham is but an imagination; and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can persuade those of judgement or understanding: I take it sufficient, that S. Stephen hath directly taught us, that Abraham left Haran, his father being dead. And for the rest, when they shew any one Scripture to prove it, I will believe as they do. For all the travails of Abraham are precisely set down in the Scriptures: as first from Ur or Camerina in Chaldea to Haran or Charran; and then from Haran (after his Fathers death) to Sichem; from Sichem he he removed to a mountain between Bethel and Haie: thence into Egypt; from Egypt he returned thither againe, where Lot and he parted, because their flocks and herds of Cattell were more than could be fed in that part: from thence the second time he removed to Mamre, neere Hebron: and thence having pursued Amraphel, and rescued Lot, he after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumaea under Abimelec; and after neer unto it at Berfabe, at which time he was ready to offer up his son Isaac on the mountain Moriah. But this fiction of his retreat to Haran or Charran, appeareth not in any one story, either divine or humane. Now, if it may be supposed, that Abraham had made any former journey into Canaan, as Levika his Cabala hath fained, it should in reason be thereunto withall beleaved, that he would in those his first travailes have provided himselfe of some certain seate, or place of abiding; and not have come a second time with his wife, kinsmen, family, goods and Cattell, not knowing whereon to rest himself. But Abraham when he came from Charran, past through the North part of Canaan, thence to Sichem, and the Plaine of Moriah: where finding no place to inhabit, he departed thence to He and Haie; and so from Nation to Nation, to discover and find out some fit habitation: from whence againe, as it is written in Genesis the eleventh, He went forth, going and journeying towards the South: and always unsettled. By occasion of which wandering to and fro, some say, the Egyptians gave him and his the name of Hebrai.

Further, to prove that he had not formerly beene in the Country, we may note, that ere he came unto Bethel and Haie, and at his first entrance into Canaan, God appeared unto him, saying, Unto thy seed will I give this Land, shewing it him as unto a stranger therein, and as a Land to him unknowne. For Abraham without any other provident care for himselfe, beleaved in the Word of the living God: neither sending before, nor comming first to discover it; but being arrived, he received a second promise from God, that he would give those Countries unto him and his seed to inhabit and inherit.

Lastly, what should move any man to thinke, that Moses would have omitted any such double journey of Abraham, seeing he setteth downe all his passages else-where long and short? as when he moved from Sichem, and feared between Haie and Bethel, the distance being but 20. miles: and when he moved thence to the valley of Mamre, being but 24. miles: and when he left Mamre and late downe at Gerar, being lesse than six miles; No, Moses past over all the times of the first age with the greater brevity, to hasten him to the story of Abraham: shutting up all between the Creation and the flood in six chapters; which age lasted 1656. yeeres: but he bestoweth on the story of Abraham, fourteene chapters, beginning with his birth in the eleventh, and ending with his death in the five and twentieth; and this time endured but 175. years. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moses forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abraham's travels, or other actions: or that he would set down those small removes of five miles, and omit those of three hundred. For such a journey in going and coming would have ministred some variety of matter, or accident, worthy the inserting and adding to Abraham's story.

§. IV.

The answer to another of the objections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth yeere.

Now touching the objection, where it is said, that it was very unlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his 130. yeere, seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to have a son at an hundred: this is hardly worth the answering. This wonder is indeed mis-cast, and mistaken: Abraham having respect onely to Sarah his wife, when he spake of their many yeares. For when the Angel said unto Abraham in his Tent doore at Mamre; Loe Sarah thy wife shall have a Son, it followeth in the next verse, Now Abraham and Sarah were old and stricken in age, and it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women: therefore Sarah laughed, &c.

So then in that it is said, it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, and not on Abraham. For Abraham by his second wife Kezrah had many sons after Sarah's death, as Zimron, Jockshan, Midan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah: and the eldest of these was borne 37. years after Isaac: and the young-est youngest forty years after. What strangeness then, that Terah, being 130 years old, should beget Abraham, will they say, may be gathered from this supposed despair of Abraham at one hundred years? For Sarah died in the year of the world 2145. and Isaac was born in the year 2109. and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109. out of 2145. there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham begat five sons 36. years after this supposed wonder, and when Abraham was 137. years old: it is not strange that his father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Booz, Obed, and Jesse, who lived to many years and ages after Abraham, begat sons at 100. years, or near it, it cannot be marvelled at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130. and Abraham others at the same age and seven years after.

§. V.

The answer to two more of the objections: shewing that we may have certainty of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest Son: and that there was great cause, why in the story of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.

It followeth now to speak something to the objection, which brings Abrahams age altogether in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldest son of Terah, and born when Terah was 70. years old. For Abrahams age being made uncertain, all succeeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this proposition, That we cannot be certain of Abrahams age, unless we make him the eldest son, is false. For it is plain in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205. which was the year of his death: then was Abraham 75. And if you ask, how I can judge of times, either preceding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I answer, That Saint Stephen hath told us, that Abrahams departure followed the death of his Father Terah: and Terah died at 205. so as the 75. year of Abraham was the 205. year of Terah: which known, there can be no error in the account of times succeeding. Now to come to the objection, where it is said, That Moses had no respect unto Nachor and Haran, because they were out of the Church, but to Abraham only, with whom God established the Covenant, and of whom Christ descended according to the flesh, &c. I answer, that Moses for many great and necessary causes had respect of Nachor and Haran. For the succession of Gods Church is not witnessed by Abraham alone, but by the issues of Nachor and Haran, were they Idolaters or otherwise. For Nachor was the Father of Bethuel, and Bethuel of Rebecca, the mother of Isaac: and Haran was the Parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcab: and Sarah was mother to Isaac, and grandmother to Jacob: Milcab also the wife of Nachor, and mother of Bethuel, was Jacobs great grandmother: and the age of Sarah the daughter of Haran is especially noted, in that it pleased God to give her a son at 90. years, and when by nature she could not have conceived. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselves, yet because both Nachor and Abraham married the daughters of their brother Haran; and because Isaac married Rebecca the grand-child of Nachor; and Jacob, Lea, and Rachel, the daughters of Laban, the grand-child also of Nachor: it was not superfluous in Moses to give light of these mens times and ages. And though sometime they worshipped strange gods, as it is Jos. 24. 2. yet I see no cause to think, that they still continued Idolaters. For they believed and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leaving their natural Country, and City of Ur in Chaldea, as Abraham did, and removed thence all, except Haran, who died before his father Terah, ere they left Chaldea; but Lot, his son, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nachor also, who remained at Charran, gave his sons daughters to Isaac, and Jacob, his own kinsmen: he himself having also married in his own Family; not thinking it pleasing unto God to mix themselves with strangers and Idolaters. And that these men at length believed in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For when Laban had seen the servant of Abraham standing at the Well beside Charran, he invited him to his Fathers house in this manner: Come in, thou blessed of Jehovah, &c. And when this servant of Abrahams demanded an answer as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Bethuel, and said, This thing is proceeded of Jehovah: meaning, that it was the will of the true God it should be so; wherein he acknowledged Gods providence. Likewise in the following verse it is written; Take, go, that she may be thy Masters sons wife, even as Jehovah hath said. This their often using of the name of Jehovah, which is the proper name of the true God, it is a sign that they had the knowledge of him.

Now although it be the opinion of S. Chrysostome, and some late Writers, as Cajetan, Olester, Mucinus, Galvin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, because he retained certain Idols, or household Gods, which Rachel stole from him; yet that he believed in the true God it cannot be denied. For he acknowledgeth the God of Abraham and of Nachor, and he called Abrahams servant, blessed of JEHOVAH, as aforesaid. So as for my self I dare not avow, that these men were out of the Church, who, sure I am, were not out of the faith.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three brethren, Gen. II. v. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldest: together with divers reasons proving that Abraham was not the eldest son of Terah.

TO the main objection; which I answer last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that strive to shorten the times, endeavour to prove that Abraham was the eldest son of Terah, and born in the 70. year of Terah's life; grounding to themselves first and chiefly on this place of the Scripture; And Terah lived 70. years and begot Abraham, Nachor, and Haran: To this I say, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the same is no proof at all that he was the eldest and firstborn son of Terah. For it is no necessary consequent, that the first named in Scriptures was therefore eldest in blood and birth; neither doth it appear, that it pleased God to make especial choice of the first sons in nature and time: for Seib was not the first-born of Adam; nor Isaac of Abraham; nor Jacob of Isaac; nor Juda and Joseph of Jacob; nor David the eldest of Jesse; nor Solomon of David: as is formerly remembered.

But it is written of Noah: Noah was 500. years old, and Noah begot Shem, Ham, and Japhet: shewing that at the 500. year of his age he began to beget the first of those three sons. For according to S. Augustine, speaking generally, Nec attendendus est in his ordo natiuitatis, sed significatio futura dignitatis: in qua excelluit Abraham: 1. be order of nativity is not here to be respected, but the signification of the future dignity: in which Abraham was preferred. And therefore as in the order of the sons of Noah: so is it here; where it is said, That Terah lived 70. years, and begot Abraham, Nachor, and Haran: For it was late ere Terah began to beget Sons, himself being begotten by his Father Nachor at 29. as other his Ancestors were at 30. The like also happened to Noah: for whereas Adam begot Seth at 133. Enosh Kenan at 90. Kenan Mahaleel at 70. Mahaleel Jared at 60. Noah was yet 500. years old when he began to beget the first of his three Sons, as aforesaid. And S. Augustine, in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the youngest of Terah's sons, than otherwise: though for his excellency he was worthily named first. His own words are these: Fieri enim potuit ut posterior sit generatus Abraham: sed merito excellentie, qua in Scripturis valde commendatur, prior fuerit nominatus. It might be, saith he, that Abraham was begotten later: but was first named in regard of his excellency, for which in Scripture he is much commended. So as the naming first or last proveth nothing who was first or last born: either in those issues of Noah, or in these of Terah: Neither hath God any respect of the eldest in nature, as touching his election or spiritual blessing; for Moses nameth first the children of the promise, and the eldest and first in Gods favour. *Pietas ergo, vel ipsa potius electio divina, que comitem secum trahit pietatem, & Dei timorem, primas partes dat Semo in liberis Noe, & Abrahamo in liberis Hare: Piety, saith he, or rather divine election, which doth evermore draw with it or after it, piety and the fear of God, gave place and precedency to Sem among the children of Noah, and to Abraham among those of Thare.*

For theret it is manifest, that Abraham entred Canaan in the 75. year of his age. And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Ismael, when Abraham had lived 86. years. It was at Gerar (the South border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham had consumed 100. years. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham rose out, when he rescued Lot and overthrew Amraphel: and he had then but the age of 83. years: and it is as manifest that he parted from Haran after his Father Terah was dead. But if commonly those of the Romish Religion labour to uphold it; nor favour this larger account of times, because many notable men of the Protestant writers have approved it; but for the truth it selfe. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and testimonies of Scripture, I will add thus much more to the rest. First, it is apparent to all men of judgement, that the best approved Historians, divine and prophane, labour to investigate the truth of times, thereby to approve the stories, and forepast actions of the world; and not the truth of histories to approve the times by. Let us then make judgement to our selves, which of those two accounts give the best reputation to the story of the Scriptures; teaching the Worlds new plantation, and the continuance of Gods Church: either that of Josephus, and those which follow him; who makes but 292. 10 years, or thereabouts, between the flood and birth of Abraham: or this other account, which makes 352. years between the one and the other: the one taking Abraham to be the first born of Thare, in the 70. year of his life: the other a younger son of Thare, and born when he had lived 130. years. And if we look over all, and do not hastily sacrifice our understanding with the first things offered, and thereby being satiated do slothfully and drowsily sit down; we shall find it more agreeable rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to some editions, make it above 1072. years between the Flood and Abraham's birth: than to take away any part of those 352. years given. For if we advisedly consider the state and continuance of the world, such as it was in Abraham's time, yea before Abraham was born, we shall find that it were very 20 ill done of us by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times over-deeply between Abraham and the Flood: because in cutting them too neer the quick, the reputation of the whole story might perchance bleed thereby, were not the testimony of the Scriptures supreme, so as no objection can approach it: and that we did not follow withall this precept of S. Augustine, That wheresoever any one place in the Scriptures may be conceived disagreeing to the whole, the same is by ignorance of interpretation mis-understood. For in Abraham's time all the then known parts of the World were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their Kings. Egypt had many magnificent Cities: and so had Palæstina, and all the bordering Countries, yea, all that part of the World besides, as far as India: and those not built with sticks, but of hewne stones, and defended with walls and rampiers: which magnificence needed a parent of more antiquity, than those other men have supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest and best agreeing with reason & nature, to what end should we labour to beget doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonders and marvels giving alld strength thereby to common cavillers, and to those mens apish brains, who onely bend their wits to find impossibilities, and monsters in the story of the World and Mankind.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians, and others, grounded upon the times noted in the story of Abraham.

IN this sort therefore for the reasons before alledged, I conclude, that from the general Flood, to the birth of Abraham, 352. years were consumed: and taking the Assyrian history with us, the same number of years were spent from the Flood to the 43. year of Ninus: in which 43. year of Ninus, Abraham was born: which happened in the year of the world, 2009.

Now of this time of 352. years, we must give one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinaar, as to those that stayed in the East, to wit, 30. years to that Chur, ere he begat Seba: of which, though the Scriptures are silent, yet because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first sons, we may the more safely give the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg Regn at 30. Regu Serug at 32. Now after Seba, Chur begat Havila, Sabta, Raama and Sabtecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was born, as it appeareth Gen. 10. which S. Augustine approveth. Giving then 30. years more to Raama ere he begat Sheba, and five years to the five elder brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered that 65. years were consumed ere Nimrod himselfe was born: and that Raama had that age before any of his sons were were begotten, it may be gathered by example and comparison: for Peleg the fourth from Noah, as Raama was, begat Ren in the same year of his life.

Let us then allow 60. years more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generations to be brought forth, or else we shall hardly find people to build Babel: for sure we are, that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: because it displeased God. These two numbers of 65. and 60. make 125. The rest of the time of 131. (in which year they arrived in Shinaar, whereof there are 6. years remaining) we may give them for their travels from the East: because they were pestered with women, children and cattell: and, as some ancient writers have conceived, and Becanus of later times, they kept alwayes 10 the mountain sides, for fear of a second Flood. Now, if we take this number of 131. out of 352. there remains 221. of which number Berosus bestoweth 65. on Belus, and 42. on Ninus before Abraham born: both which S. Augustine approveth: which two numbers taken again out of 221. there remaineth 114. years of the 352. from the Flood to Abraham's birth: which number of 114. necessity bestoweth on Nimrod.

And if it be objected that this time given to Nimrod is over-long: sure if we compare the age of Nimrod with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather appear over-short. For Nimrod, by this account, lived in all but one hundred seventy nine years: whereof he reigned one hundred and twelve: whereas Sale, who was the son of Arphaxad, the son of Sem, lived four hundred three years: and of the same age of the 20 World was Nimrod the son of Chur, the son of Cham.

Now after Abraham was born,

Ninus reigned 9. years: which added to 43. make 52.

Ninus dieth, and leaveth Semiramis his Successor.

Semiramis governed the Empire of Babylonia and Assyria 42. years, and died in the 52. Of the World. 2017.

year complete of Abraham's life. Of the Flood 261.

Ninias or Lameis succeeded Semiramis, and ruled 38. years, in the second year of whole reign Abraham left Mesopotamia. 403. 4 dñi.

When Abraham was 85. years old, he rescued his Nephew Lot, and overthrew by surprise Amraphel king of Shinaar, or Babylonia. Ninias reigned 38. years, and Abraham 30 came into Canaan but 23. years after Semiramis died: which was the 75. year of his age: so that Amraphel may seem to have been this Ninias the son of Ninus, and Semiramis, whose 23. years, as aforesaid, being the 75. year of Abraham, he and his fellow-kings might have received this overthrow in the 85. year of Abraham, and the 33. year of his owne reigne: after which he reigned five years: which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reasons to the contrary, urging that this Amraphel could not be Ninias, are not easily answered. Howbeit, for the times of the Assyrian kings, that they are to be ordered as we have set downe, according to the times noted by Moses in the story of Abraham, it is most certain; unless we will either derogate from the truth of Moses's computation, which were impiety, or account the whole History of Ninias and Semiramis to be but a fiction; which were to condemne all ancient Historians for fablers.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to have been Ninias the son of Ninus.

AND now touching this Amraphel, whom Moses makes king of Shinaar or Babylonia, in the 85. year of Abraham's life, that is, in the 33. year of the reign of Ninias or Lameis the king of the Assyrians, the son of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirme what he was, and how he could be at this time king of Babylonia: Ninias or Lameis then reigning there. To this doubt the answer which first offereth it selfe as most probable, is that which hath been already noted, that this Ninias or Lameis, was no other than our Amraphel: who invaded Traconitis, or Bajan, and overthrew those five kings of Pentapolis, or the valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell us, that Amraphel was king of Shinaar, which is Babylonia: and the times before accounted make him to be the successor of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85. year of Abraham's life: wherein he rescued Lot, slew Chedorlaomer, and overthrew the rest. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Monarch: for Chedorlaomer commanded in chiefe, though Amraphel be first named by Moses in the first verse of the 14. Chapter of Genesis. For the kings of the valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or the five Cities, were the vassals of Chedorlaomer, and not of Amraphel: as it is written, Twelve years were they subject to Chedorlaomer, but in the 13. year they rebelled, and in the 14. year came they subject to Chedorlaomer, and the Kings that were with him: and therefore was Chedorlaomer the principall in this enterprife, who was then king of Elam, which is Persia: Now Persia being feated over Tygrus, and to the East of Amraphels Countrey; and the other two kings, which were companions with Amraphel, being feated to the West of Shinaar or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it selfe, seemeth at this time to have had no great scope or large dominion. For had Amraphel been so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis whom he succeeded, hee should not have needed the assistance of three other kings for this expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those foure kings, (as it is manifest that he was: For these little kings of Sodome, Gomorrah, &c. were his vassals, and not Amraphels;) yet this makes not the conjecture lesse probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninus. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Assyria had now (as we shall shew more plainly in that which followeth) received a down-right fall at the time of this war: though not long before it commanded all the kingdoms between India and the Phœnician Sea: to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

§. X.

Of Arioch another of the foure Kings, and that Ellas, whereof he is said to have been King, lies between Cœlosyria and Arabia Petrea.

Xenophon.

Gen. 14.

Now the two other kings joyned with Amraphel and Chedorlaomer, were Arioch and Tidal; the one king of Ellasfar, the other of the Nations. For Ellasfar, Aquila convert Heremus write Pontus: so Tostatus thinketh that it should be Hellepont: which opinion Pererius favoureth. But this is onely to defend the Latine translation. For as Pontus, so is Hellepont far distant, and out of the way to fend any Armies into Arabia Petrea, or Idumæa; which Countries these foure kings chiefly invaded: Besides that, it is certaine, that the Assyrians (when they were greatest) had never any dominion in Asia the lesse. For at such time as the Assyrians feared the invasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the lesse as Commanders: but used all the art they had to invite Cæsar to their assistance: perswading him that nothing could be more dangerous for himselfe, and the other Kings of those parts, than the successe of the Medes against the Assyrians. But examine the enterprife what it was. These Kings (saith the Text) made war with Bera king of Sodome, Birha king of Gomorrah, Shinab king of Admath, and Shemebar king of Zeboim, and the king of Bela, which is Loar. All which five kings had not so much ground as Middlesex: being such a kinde of Reguli, as Joseph found in the land long after: namely, Lords of Cities and small Territories adjoining, of which Canaan had three and thirty, all slain or hanged by Joseph. Neither can the other Countries, which in the Text they are said also to have invaded, be imagined to have been at that time of any great power: and therefore to call in kings from Pontus or Hellepont, had manifested a great impotence and weaknesse in the kings of Babylon and Persia.

And though it be alledged for an example, that divers kings far off, came to assist Pompey against Cæsar; yet these same examples without like occasions and circumstances, do neither lead nor teach. For there was no cause to fear the greatnesse of these petty kings, or of the other Countries: But the eyes of the World were fixed on Cæsar; and his undertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no lesse doubtfull than fearfull: But the whole Country by these foure kings mastered in their passage, was afterward given to the halfe tribe of Manasse, Gad, and Reuben: a narrow valley of ground lying between Jordan and the mountaines of Seir: inclosed by the river of Arnon on the South side, and by Lybanus on the North, consisting of the two small Provinces of Tracônitis or Basan, and the region of the Moabites: a conquest far unvaluable, and little answering to the power of the Assyrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus and Semiramis, who subjected all the great Kings of that part of the World, without the assistance of any of the Kings of Hellepont, or any other part of Asia the lesse. But as the vulgar and Aquila convert Ellasfar by Pontus: so Symmachus makes Arioch a King of the Scythians, a King indeed, as far fetched to joyn with the Assyrians in this War, as the World had any at that time.

The Septuagint do not change the word of Ellasfar at all, but as they keep the word Ararat, on the mountaines whereof the Arke did rest; so doe they in this place retaine the Hebrew word Ellasfar, being doubtfull to give it a wrong interpretation. And Pererius himselfe remembreth other opinions far more probable than this of Pontus or Hellepont: yet hee dares not avow his liking of them, because the Latine Translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Urbibus, a Græcian Cosmographer, findeth the Citie of Ellas in the border of Cœlosyria: and S. Hierome calleth Ellas the Citie of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now although the same be feated by Stephanus in Cœlosyria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was king: who formerly joyned with Ninus in all his conquests, being of the same family, and descended from Cham and Chus: after whom the name of Arius was by the Hebrew written Arioch: and afterward againe Aretas; as in the Machabees: the kings of Arabia holding that name even to the time of S. Paul, who was sought to be betrayed by the Lieutenant of Aretas commanding in Damascus. They were Princes for the most part confederate and depending upon the Assyrian Empire. It is true that we finde in Daniel, that in the time of Nabuchodonosor, one Arioch was General of his Army, and the principall Commander under him, who was a King of kings: which makes it plain, that Arioch here (spoken of, the son of that Arioch, confederate of Ninus, was no king of Pontus, nor of Scythia: regions far removed from the Assyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch, who commanded under Nabuchodonosor is mentioned in Judith, by the name of King of the Elymeans: who are a Nation of Persians bordering Assyria, according to Stephanus: though Pliny sets it between the Sea-coast, and Media: and if any brother of the Arabian Kings, or other of that house (known by the name of Arius, Arioch, Areta, or Aretas) had the government of that Persian Province called Elymais (as it seemeth they had by the places of Daniel and Judith) yet the same was in Nabuchodonosors time. But this Arioch here (spoken of may with more reason be taken for the king of Arabia, the son of Arius, the confederate of Ninus: whose sons held league, as their fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all on that side towards the West unto Babylonia, and Chaldaea: and in amitie with them from the beginning, and of their owne house and blood: which Diod. Siculus also confirmeth.

§. XI.

Of Tidal another of the foure Kings.

The fourth king by Abraham overthrown was Tidal, king of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Gojim, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name: Lyra of mixt people: Cæloin of ruanagates without habitation. Pererius out of Strabo, finds that Galilea was inhabited by divers Nations, which were a mixt people: namely, of Egyptians, Arabians, and Phœnicians. Nam tales sunt qui Galileam habitant; Such are the inhabitants of Galile, saith Strabo: and therefore was Tidal called king of these Nations, as they suppose. And it may be so: but the authority of Strabo is nothing in this question. For Galilea was not peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Strabo. For when Abraham came into Canaan, the Canaanite was then in the Land, howsoever they might be afterwards mixt; which I know not. But there are many petty kingdoms adjoining to Phœnicia, and Palesina; as Palmyrena, Batanea, Laodicea, Apamena, Chalcedice, Cassiotis, Chalibonitis, and all these do also joyn themselves to Mesopotamia on the North, and to Arabia on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselves together under Tidal, I take to be the probablest conjecture.

§. XII.

That Chedorlaomer the chiefe of the foure Kings was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

Asfly, whereas it is conceived that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperour, and that Amraphel was but a Sarrape, Viceroy, or Provinciaall governour of Babylonia, and that the other Kings named were such also, I cannot agree with Pterius in this. For Moses was too well acquainted with the names of Assur and Shinaar, to call the Assyrian a king of Elam: those kings being in the Scriptures evermore called by the name of Chaldaea, to Shinaar, Babylonia, or Assyria: but never by Elam; and Chedorlaomer or Kedarlaomer was so called of Kidor, from Cidarim, which in the Hebrew signifieth Regale: for so Curtius calleth the garment which the Persian Kings ware on their heads.

Neither do I beleve that the Assyrian or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatnesse at the time of this invasion; and my reasons are these: First, example and experience reach us, that those things which are set up hastily, or forced violently, do not long last. Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as it lasted not to overlook what it selfe had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetual. For his Empire died at once with himselfe: all whose chief Commanders became kings after him. Tambrlain conquered Asia and India with a storm-like 20 and terrible successe: but to prevalent fury God hath adjoynd a short life: and whatsoever things Nature her selfe worketh in haste, she taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his victories perished with him, if not before.

Ninus being the first whom the madnesse of boundlesse dominion transported, invaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious over them: a man violent, insolent and cruell. Semiramis taking the opportunity, and being more proud, adventurous, and ambitious, than her Paragon: enlarged the Babylonian Empire, and beautified many places therein with buildings unexampled. But her son having changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proved no lesse feminine than she was masculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continuall smart, put the Patient in minde how to cure; so the one, and revenge the other: so those Kings adjoyning (whose subjection and calamities incident, were but new, and therefore the more grievous) could not sleep, when the advantage was offered by such a succellour. For, in regno Babylonic hic parum respiciunt; 2 his King shined little (saith Naclerus of Ninias) in the Babylonian Kingdom. And likely it is that the necks of mortall men having been never before galled with the yoke of forraign dominion, nor having ever had experience of that most miserable and detested condition of living in slavery: no long descent having as yet invested the Assyrian with a right: nor any other title being for him pretended than a strong hand; the foolish and effeminate son of a tyrannous and hated Father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his vassals, with a powerlesse mastering, and a mind lesse industrious than his Father and Mother had used before him. And he that was so much given over to licentious idleness, as to suffer his Mother to reigne 42. yeers, and thereof the greatest part after he came to mans estate: witnessed thereby to the World, that he so much preferred ease before honour, and bodily pleasures before greatnesse, as he neither indeavoured to gain what he could not govern, nor to keep what hee could not without contentious perill enjoy.

These considerations being joyned to the story of Amraphel, delivered by Moses, by which we find that Amraphel king of Shinaar was rather an inferiour to the king of Persia, than either his superiour, or equall; make it seem probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken asunder, and restrained againe to Babylonia. 50

For conclusion, I will add these two arguments confirming the former: First, that at such time as it pleased God to impose that great travell upon Abraham, from Drinchaldea to Charran, and then to Canaan, a passage of 700. miles, or little lesse, with women, children, and carriages: the countries through which he wandred were then settled, and in peace. For it was in the 23. year of Ninias, when Abraham, obeying the voice of God, took this great journey in hand: in which time of 23. yeers after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour Princes had recovered their liberty and former estates. For Semiramis Army of four millions, with her selfe, utterly consumed in India, and all her Armies and and engins of warre, at the same time lost, gave an occasion and opportunitie even to the poorest foules and weakest hearted creatures of the World, to repurchase their former libertie.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and ancientest Historians, that Arins the son of Ninus, or Amraphel, invaded the Bactrians, and Caspians, and againe subjected them: which needed not if they had not beene revolted from Ninias, after Ninus death. And as Arioch recovered one part, so did Balaus or Balaneus, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest revolted, to their former obedience. Of whom is said that he conquered from Egypt to India: and therefore was called Xerxes, id est, Victor & triumphator, a conquerour and 10 triumpher; which undertakings had beene no other than the effects of madnesse, had not those Countries freed themselves from the Babylonian subjection. Now if we shall make any doubt hereof, that is, of the reconquest of Arins and Xerxes, both which lived after Ninus and Ninias, we may as well thinke the rest of Ninus and Semiramis to be but fained: but if we grant this reconquest, then is it true, that while Ninias or Amraphel ruled, the Assyrian Empire was torne alunder, according to that which hath beene gathered out of Moses, as before remembered.

20 That it is not unprobable that the foure Kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had else-where with their colonies planted themselves: and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be so, we neede not say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selves with many other difficulties.

The consent of all Writers, whose workes have come to my perusal, agreeing as they doe, that these four Kings, Amraphel of Shinaar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and those fellows, were Lords of those Regions, whereunto they are or seeme intituled: doth almost inforce us to thinke that the history must so be understood, as I have delivered. But if in this place, as often else-where in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be set for people of those lands, or if (as Hierome hath it) Chedorlaomer was king of 30 the Elamites, as Tidal was said to be of the Nations, that is, of people either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundry regions: then may we otherwise conceive of this Historie: removing thereby some difficulties; which men perhaps have beene unwilling to find, because they could not find how to resolve them. For as it had beene a strange conjecture to think that Arioch was drawn to assist the Persian against the Sodomites, as far as from Pontus, where it is very unlikely that Chedorlaomer was knowne, and almost impossible that the vale of Siddim should have been once named: so in true estimation it is a thing of great improbabilitie, that Chedorlaomer, if he were King of Persia alone, should passe through so great a parte of the World, as the Countries of Assyria, Chaldaea, Mesopotamia, Syria, and parte of Arabia, & Canaan, to subdue those five Townes, 40 whose very names how they should come to his ear, being dis-joynd by so many great nations of different languages, a wise man could hardly conjecture. And if all the Countries bordering Persia together with the Babylonian himselfe, yea the kingdom of Ellasar and that of Tidal, so far off removed, were become his dependances; what reason can we find that might have induced him to hearken after Sodom and Gomorrah? and when he should have sought the establishment of his new gotten Empire, by rooting out the posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharus of Media, and Zoroaster of Bactria) then to employ the forces of Amraphel, and those other Kings, against five pertie Towns, leaving Tyrrus and Sidon, and the great Citie of Damasco, with many other places of much importance, and far neerer unto him, un subdued: Now as these doubts which may be alleged against the first conquest of the vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehement: so are the objections to be made against his reconquest of these five Cities, when they had revolted, as forcible; yea and more, as being grounded partly upon the Text it selfe. For first, what madnesse had it beene in that small Province to rebell against so powerfull a Monarch? Or if it were so that they dwelling far from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, than that he should come or send to reclaim them: was it not more than madnesse in them, when his terrible armie approached, still to entertaine hope of evasion: yea to make resistance (being themselves a dissolute and therefore unwarlike people) against the power of all the Nations between Emprates, yea between themselves & the river of Indus ; Likewise on the part of Cheodorlamoer we should finde no great wisdom, if he, knowing the weakenesse of this people, had raised such a world of men against them : whom by any Lieutenant, with small forces he might have subdued. For the perpetuall inheritance of that little Country, was not sufficient to countervail one moneths charges of so huge an army. How small then must his valour have been, who with so mighty preparations effected no more than the waiting of that Valley, wherein he left the City standing, taking no one of them ; but returned well contented with a few prisoners, and the pillage of the Country, although he had broken their army in the field ? Now the Scriptures do not of this invasion (supposed so great) make any fearfull matter : but compose the two armies as equally matcht, saying they were four kings against 10 five : yea if the place be literally expounded, we shall find that Abraham slew all these Kings ; of which great slaughter no Historie makes mention : Neither will the reigns of Ninias who lived foure or five yeeres longer, permit that he should have died so soone : neither would Histories have forgotten the manner of his death, if he had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appears, that these foure Kings were not the same that they are commonly thought : nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them. It may therefore well be true, that these kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the same title : Lords and Commanders every one of his own company, which he carried forth as a Colony, seeking place where to settle himself and them, as was the usual manner of those times.

Lucis

Neither is it improbable, that Cheodorlamoer leading a troupe of Persians, Amraphel some people out of Shinaar, and Tidal others gathered out of sundry places, might consort together, and make the weakest of the Country which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Whosoever will consider the beginning of the first Book of Thucydides, with the manner of discoveries, conquests and plantations, in the infancy of Greece ; or the manner of the Saracens invading Africa and Spain, with almost as many kings as several Armies : or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new discoveries, passages, and conquests in the West-Indies : may easily perceive, that it was neither unusual for the leaders of Colonies to receive title from the people whom they conducted : nor to make alliances together, and break them again, disturbing sometimes one the other, sometimes helping in pursuit of a conquest. That Amraphel and his associates were such manner of Commanders, it may seem the more likely, by the sloathfull quality of Ninias then reigning in Assyria : whose unmanlike temper was such, as might well give occasion to such undertaking spirits, as wanted the employments whereunto they were accustomed in the reign of Semiramis, rather to seek adventures abroad, than to remain at home unregarded, whilst others, more unworthy than themselves, were advanced. If the consent of the whole stream of writers upon this place make this conjecture disagreeable to the Text, to the authority whereof all humane reason must subscribe, then we may hold our selves to the former conjecture, that Amraphel was Ninias : and that the power of his Ancestors being by his sloath decayed, he might well be inferiour to the Persian Cheodorlamoer : or if this do not satisfie, we may say that Amraphel was an Under-king 40 of Satrapa of Shinaar, under Ninias ; who may be supposed to have had his Imperiall Seat in his Fathers Citie Ninive : and to have preferred it before Shinaar and Babylon the City of his Mother, whom he hated as an usurper of his right. But if it were possible that in a case not concerning any mans Salvation, and wherein therefore none hath cared to take great pains, all might erre : then can I think that the opinion, That those four Kings were leaders of Colonies, sent out of the Countries named in the Text, and not Kings of the Countries themselves, is most consonant both to the condition of those times, and to the Scripture. And hereto adde that Cheodorlamoer seems rather called a Persian King, than King of Persia : and that Arioch (whose Kingdom undoubtedly was between Syria 50 and Arabia) having been a man of action, or being a worthy mans son, was very well pleased, to give passage and assistance to these Captains or pettie Kings. These and such like things here to urge, were but with circumstances to adorn a supposition, which either may stand without them, or if it must fall, is unworthy to have cost bestowed upon it especially considering that it is not my intent to employ any more time in making it good, but to leave it wholly to the Readers pleasure, to follow any of these opinions, or any other, if he find any that shall seem better than these. But of what countries or people forever these 4, were kings, this expedition is the only publick action that we

we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to his Storie, and of his sons, and of his Nephews Esan and Jacob, as they are registered by Moses, because it is not our purpose, either to stand upon things generally known to all Christians, nor to repeat what hath been elsewhere already spoken, nor to prevent our selves in things that may hereafter in due place be remembered, we passe them here in silence. And because in this Storie of Abraham and his posteritie, there is much mention of Egypt : by which it appears that even in the time of Abraham, it was a fertile and flourishing kingdom ; it will not be amiss in the next place to speak somewhat of the antiquities and first kings thereof.

of the Kings of Egypt from the first peopling of it after the Flood, to the time of the delivery of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.

A brief of the names and times of the first Kings of Egypt : with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points.

Soone after the confusion at Babel (as it seems) Cham with many of his issue and followers (having doubtlesse known the fertility of Egypt before the Flood) came thither and tooke possession of the Country ; in which they built many Cities : and began the kingdome one hundred ninety one yeers after the deluge. The ancient Governours of this Kingdome till such time as Israel departed Egypt, are shewn in the Table following.

The Table, and especially the Chronologie, is to be confirmed by probabilities and conjectures, because in such obscurity, manifest and restless truth cannot be found. For Saint Augustine, a man of exceeding great judgement, and incomparable diligence, who had sought into all antiquities, and had read the books of Varro, which now are lost, yet omitted the succession of the Egyptian Kings : which he would not have done, if they had not been more uncertain than the Sicyonians, whom he remembreth, than whom doubtlesse they were more glorious. One great occasion of this obscurity in the Egyptian Story, was the ambition of the Priests : who, to magnifie their Antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many fables, and recounted unto strangers the names of many Kings, that never reigned. What ground they had for these reports of supposed Kings, it shall appear anon. Sure it is, That the magnificent works and royall buildings in Egypt, such as are never found found but in States that have greatly flourished, witnesse that their Princes were of marvellous greatnesse, and that the reports of the Priests were not altogether false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Egyptian History, was the too much credulity of some good Authors, who believing the manifold and contrary reports of sundry Egyptians, and publishing in their own name such as pleased them best; have confirmed them, and as it were enforced them upon us by their authority. A third and generall cause of more than Egyptian darknesse in all ancient Histories, is the edition of many Authors by John Annins, of whom (if to the censures of sundry very learned, I may adde mine) I think thus; that Annins having seen some fragments of those Writers, and added unto them what he would, may be credited, as an avoucher of true Histories, where approved writers confirm him: but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it cometh to passe that the account of Authors, either in the Chronologie or Genealogie of the Egyptian Kings, runs three altogether different ways. The Christian writers, such as are ancient, for the most part follow Eusebius: Many late writers follow the edition of Annins his Authors: The profane Histories follow Herodotus, Diadorus, and such others.

§. II.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appears that Chams reign in Egypt began in the year after the Flood, 191.

TO reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the ancient Kings, about whom is most controversie, the best mean is by help of the Dynasties: of whose continuance there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties (besides the authority of approved Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether, with the Histories of the Assyrians, Trojans, Italians, &c. and others. The beginning of the 16. Dyn. is joyned by generall consent, with the 43. year of Nims: in which Abraham was born. The twelve first Dynasties lasted each of them seven years, under the twelve, which were called the greater gods: so that all the years of their continuance were 84. The thirteenth Dynastie endured fourteen years: the fourteenth 26. the fifteenth 37. These three last are said to have been under the three younger gods. So the fifteen first Dynasties lasted one hundred sixty one years. As I do not therefore believe that the continuance of these Dyn. was such as hath bin mentioned, because Annins in such wise limits out their time: so I cannot reject the account upon this onely reason, that Annins hath it so: considering that both hitherto it hath passed as current, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynastie, in the year of Abraham's birth, as aforesaid: the reckoning is easily cast; by which the sum of 161. years, which according to our account were spent in the fifteen former, being subducted out of the sum of 352. years, which were between the Flood and Abraham's birth, shew that the beginning of the first Dynastie, which was the beginning of Chams reign in Egypt, was in the year 191. As also by other probabilities the same may appear. For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of mankind which came into Shinaar, arrived at Babel, Anno diluvio 131. In building the Tower were consumed forty years, as Glycas recordeth: whose report I have elsewhere confirmed with divers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his company, their Wives, Children, Cattel, and substance through all Syria then desolate, and full of Bogs, Forrests, and Bryers (which the Deluge and want of culture in one hundred seventy one years had brought upon it) no reasonable man will doubt. To this his passage therefore, and the seating of himself in Egypt, we allow twenty years: and these sums being added together, to wit, one hundred thirty 30 one years after the Flood, before they arrive at Babel, 40. years for their stay there, and 20. for Chams passage into Egypt, and settling there, make up the sum of 191. years; at which time we said that Cham began his reign in Egypt, in the beginning of the first Dynastie. And to this summe of 191. years if we adde the 161. years of the 15. first Dynasties, as they are numbered in common account, we shall fall right with the year of Abraham's birth, which was An. Dil. 352. And hereto omitting many other reasons, which might be brought to prove that these first Dynasties must needs have been very short, and not containing in the whole summe of their severall times times above 161. years: Let it suffice that had they lasted longer, then either must Egypt have been peopled as soon as Babel after the Flood, or the Dynasties (as Mercator thinks) must have been before the flood. That the arrival at Babel was many years before the plantation of Egypt, after the flood, enough hath been said to prove: and that the Dynasties were not before the flood, the number of the long-lived generations betweene Adam and the flood, which was lesse than the number of the Dynasties, may sufficiently witness. Or if we will thinke, that one life might (perhaps) be divided into many Dynasties, then may this have beene as well after the flood, as before: considering that the sons of Noah did not in every Countreere such forme of Politie, as had bin used in the fame ere the Deluge: but such, as the disposition of the people, the authoritie and power of the Conducter, together with many other circumstances, did induce or enforce them to.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not divers families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents, oft times many under one King.

THE short continuance of the Dynasties, doth shew that they were not severall races of kings, as the vaunting Egyptians were wont to stile them. What they were, it cannot certainly be warranted. For in restitution of decayed antiquities, it is more easie to denie than to affirme. But this may be said, partly upon good circumstance, partly upon the surest prooffe, That it was the manner of the Egyptian Kings, to put the government of the Countre into the hands of some trustie Counsellor, onely reserving the Sovereignty to themselves, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Masters of the Palace, and as the Turke doth to the chiefe Vizier. This is confirmed, first by the number of the Dynasties, wherof many are under Cham, and more than one under Osiris or Misraims; and must therefore have bin successions, not of Kings, but rather of Counsellors and Regents. Secondly, by custome of such Princes borderers to Egypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures, of whom Abimelech the Philistin in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Phicol Captaine of his Host: though in taking Abraham's wife, and in his private carriage, he followed his own pleasure. Likewise of Abimelech the son of Gidon it was said: Is not he the son of Jerubbaal? and Zebul is his officer? Also Isboseth the son of Saul, feared Abner the Captaine of the Hoste. Yea, David himselfe hating Joab for his crueltie, did not punish him in regard of his greatnesse, which was such, as was feared even of Hadad the Edomite living then in Egypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appears by the Scriptures: therefore likely both for his owne idleness and pleasure, to have laid the burden of government upon others; and upon jealousy, the companion of unworthinesse, to have changed his Lieutenants often. Above all other proofes is the advancement of Joseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Joseph: Only in the Kings throne will I be above thee: behold, I have set thee over all the Land of Egypt. Will. Tyr. de bell. Sacro l. 19. c. 17. l. 18. 19. William Archbishop of Tyre, who flourished about the yeere of our Lord, one thousand six hundred eightie, affirms that the like or very same forme of government by Viceroyes, was in his time practised in Egypt, having there beene in use (as he beleeveth) ever since the time of Joseph. He plainly shewes, that the Soldans of Egypt were not Lords of the Countre, however they have been so deemed: but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the dutie of Subjects unto the Caliphe: who residing in a most magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not only of civil government, but the power of making warre and peace, with the whole office and authority royall, into the Soldans hands. He that shall read in William of Tyre, the state of the Caliphe, or Mulien Elbaderch, with the forme of his Court, shall plainly behold the image of the ancient Pharaoh, ruling by a Lievtenant, as great in authority as Joseph was, though far inferior in wisdom.

To think that many names of such Regents or Lieutenants as Joseph was, have crept into the List of the Egyptian Kings, were no strange imagination. For Joseph's brethren call him, The man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Countre: besides, it is not unlikely that the vain-glorious Egyptian Priests would as easily report him a King to posterity, as ignorant men and strangers deem him such, under whose hand all dispatches of all other Egyptians. This might appear to some a tale not unlike to the Friar's book of Ancient, Potiphar's daughter : but unto such as consider that God works usually by meanes ; and that Potiphar was the Steward of that King, under whom Jacob died : it would seem a matter not probable, had it an Author of sufficient credit to avouch it. Concerning the wars of Hercules, in which by this reckoning hee should have spent 42. yeeres after he left Egypt, ere he began in Italy, it is a circumstance which (the length of the Italian wars considered, and his former enterprises and atchievements proportioned to them) doth not make against us, but for us : or if it were against us, yet could it not so weaken our supposition, as these probabilities collected out of the undisputable truth of Scripture do confirm it. Nevertheless, I freely grant that all these proofs are no other, than such as may be gathered out of Authors, not well agreeing, nor to be reconciled in such obscurity, otherwise than by likelihoods, answerable to the holy Text.

of Typhon, Hercules, Ægyptus, Orus, and the two Sesostris, successively reigning after Mizraim : and of divers errors about the former Sesostris.

Concerning the reign of Typhon, and of Hercules, I find none that precisely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelocrator giveth three yeers to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is so peremptory without proofe, as if his own word were sufficient authority, in many points very questionable ; alledging no witness, but as it were saying, Teste me ipso : yet herein we may think him to speak probably, so far as the learned Krentzheimius affirmeth, that Hercules did very soon undertake his fathers revenge ; and was not long in performing it : and that leaving Egypt to his brother, he followed other wars, in the same quarrell, as hath been shewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzheimius doth) out of Berosus, that Hercules reigned after Typhon : yet seeing Aventinus a follower of Berosus hath it so, I will also beleieve it. That in the reign of Typhon and Hercules, seven yeeres were spent, howsoever divided between them, I gather out of Krentzheimius onely, who placeth the beginning of Orus seven yeeres after the death of Osiris : forgetting to set down his reasons, which in a matter so probable I think hee wanted not. Now whereas hee alloweth 90. yeeres of the 18. Dynastie to Osiris, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus : it seems that the reign of Orus lasted 115. yeeres. From the death of Orus, to the departure of Israel out of Egypt, there passed 122. yeeres by our account : who (according to Berosus and others) think that Abraham was born in the 130. yeer of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus : From the end of the Flood to the birth of Abraham ————— 352

From that time to the vocation of Abraham ————— 75 departure out of Egypt ————— 430 Summa ————— 857

which summe divers other waies may be collected. Since therefore to the departure out of Egypt there do remain (as is aforesaid) onely 122. yeeres from the death of Orus : we are now to consider how many of them are to be allowed unto Sesostris, or Sesostris : who is placed next unto Orus, by authority of the Scoliaſtes Apollonii : not without good probability. For this great King or Conquerour, is by many histories recorded to have over-run a great part of Asia : to have built a fleet of ships on the red Sea : & so to have entred into India : likewise with another fleet on the middle earth Seas, to have passed into Europe, and subdued many Nations. This is he (as Reineccius judgeth) whom Justin erring in account of his time, calleth Vexoris : For Justin placeth Vexoris in ages before Ninus : whereby it would follow that Sesostris, if he were Vexoris, was more ancient than was Osiris (otherwise Atinurim) a thing altogether unlikely. Certain it is, that after the departure of Israel out of Egypt, no one Pharaoh came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Egypt into Asia) till the father in law of Solomon, Pharaoh Vapres, took Gerar, and gave it to his daughter : (as we may reade more at large in the holy History of the Bible) after which time Sesac oppressed Rehoboam, and Necho fought passage through the land of Israel, when hee made his expedition against the Chaldeans. Of King Vapres and Necho it is out of question, that neither of them was the great King Sesostris. Of Sesac it is doubted by some, so far as much as he came into Judea with with a great Army. Reineccius propounding the doubt, leaveth it undecided ; unless it be sufficient proofe of his own opinion, that he himself placeth Sesostris next to Orus ; following the Scoliaſtes Apollonii. But further answer may be made to shew that they were not one. For as Justin witnesseth, Sesostris, otherwise Vexoris, made war on people far removed, abstaining from his neighbours. Sesac came up purposely against Hierusalem. Sesostris, as Diodorus witnesseth, had but 24000. horse ; Sesac had 60000. Sesostris had 8020. chariots ; Sesac 1200. Sesostris made his expedition for no private purpose, but to get a great name : Sesac, as most agree, had no other purpose than to succour Jeroboam, and give him countenance in his new reign ; whom he had favoured even against Solomon : therefore Sesostris must needs have reigned whilst Israel abode in Egypt.

Whereas Krentzheimius collecteth out of Herodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menus, or Menis, was next to Orus : because those Historians affirm that he reigned next after the gods ; it moveth me nothing. For Osiris did succeed those fifteen gods ; namely, the twelve greater, and three lesser : himself also (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being called Menis. Which name, as also Menais, and Menis, were titles of dignity : though mistaken by some as proper names. Krentzheimius doth very probably gather, that Menus was Mercurius Ter-maximus ; the Hebrew word Meni signifying an Arithmetician ; which name Ter-maximus might well be attributed to Osiris, who was a great Conquerour, Philosopher, and Benefactor to mankind, by giving good laws, and teaching profitable Arts. In prowess and great undertakings Sesostris was no whit inferiour to Osiris. For he fought victory not for gain, but for honour onely ; and being well contented that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and submitted themselves to his will and royall disposition, leaving them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Egypt. Soon upon his return he was endangered by a great Treason, the house in which hee was being by his own brother purposely fired : which nevertheless he is said to have escaped, and to have reigned in all thirty three yeeres : after which time he chose rather to die than to live ; because he fell blinde. Both Herodotus and Diodorus affirm, that Sesostris left a son, whose name was Pheron, or Pheronos : who afterwards took the name of Sesostris ; but was nothing like to his father in glory : for he shortly fell blind. The cause of his blindness, Herodotus attributes to his assaulting the river Nile with a javelin : which tale Diodorus having likewise heard, yet reports as a fable, saying that perhaps he took the disease naturally from his father. How long this man reigned, it is no where exprest : yet so far as much as Orus the second, (otherwise Eusiris, who succeeded him, began 14. yeeres after that this Sesostris had been King, it must needs be that this reigned 14. yeeres at least. That Eusiris began not untill these 14. yeeres at least were expired, the very account of time from the first of Eusiris, to the departure of Israel out of Egypt, plainly shews, being almost generally agreed upon, to have been 75. yeeres. That none came between Sesostris the second, and Eusiris or Orus the second, it stands onely upon probabilities : which are these. After Sesostris had reigned some while, he fell blind ; after certain yeeres he recovered his sight, as is said : which may have been true, but is more like to have been a fable : surely the manner of his recovery, as it is set down, is very fabulous : namely, that by looking upon a woman, or walking his eyes with her water, who had onely known her own husband, he got his sight again. As the time of his reign, before his blindness, and when he was well again (if ever he were) may have taken up a good part of 14. yeeres : so his works which were great, do much more strongly argue, that his reign was not very short. His works are largely set down by Herodotus and Diodorus : a part of which may seem to have been the finishing of that which his father had begun, about the channels and sluices of Nile : whom I think he rather frightened, (as his father had done) with spades and shovels, than with darts and javelins ; and by his diligent oversight of that work, was like enough to lose both his eye-sight and his peoples love ; whom his father had very busily employed in excessive labour about it.

Of Busiris the first oppressor of the Israelites; and of his successor Queen Thermutis that took up Moses out of the water.

Exod. 1.

And herein (if I may presume to conjecture) Busiris, who was afterwards king, is like to have dealt with him, as Jeroboam did with the son of Solomon. For that Busiris himself was much addicted to magnificent works, it well appeared by the drudgery wherewith he wearied the children of Israel in his buildings: If therefore he were employed by the great Sesoftris, as Jeroboam was by Solomon, in the oversight of those businesses, he had good opportunity to work his greatness with the king by industry; and afterward with the people, by incensing them against their new king, as Jeroboam did. For what the multitude will endure at one Princes hands, they will not at another: unless he have either an equal spirit, or a surer foundation. If moreover he sought to derive all the pain and labour of publick works from the Egyptians to the Israelites: he surely did that which to his own people was very plausible: who (as appears in Exodus) were nothing slack in fulfilling the Kings cruelty. Now that Orus the second, or Busiris, was the king that first oppressed Israel, and made the Edict of drowning the Hebrew children, which (saith Cedrenus) lasted ten moneths: it is a common opinion of many great and most learned Writers; who also think that hereupon grew the fable of Busiris sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Exod. 1. that the king who knew not Joseph, was a king of a new family. That Busiris was of a new family, Reineccius doth shew; who also thinks him Author of the bloody Edict. Nevertheless, true it is, that Busiris, according to all mens computation, began his reign five years after the birth of Moses; before whose birth it is most manifest that the law was made, and much more that the persecution began; which Bunting thinks to have lasted 87 years, ere the departure out of Egypt. Let us therefore consider, besides the blindness of Sesoftris the second, how great the power of the Regents or Vice-Royes in Egypt was; and how great confidence the kings did put in them, seeing Joseph ruled with such full power, that hee bought all Egypt, and all the Egyptians for bread; giving at the same time the best of the land to his own father and brethren for nothing: seeing also that when the Egyptians cried out upon Pharaoh for bread; Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, Go to Joseph; what he saith to you, do ye. If to a stranger born, lately fetcht out of prison, a king well able to have governed himself, would give such trust, and sovereign authority; it is not unlikely that a blind Prince should do it to a man of especial reputation. For God often prospers, not onely the good (such as Joseph was) but wicked men also, as his instruments against the day of wrath. Therefore perhaps the king did (as many have done) resigne his kingdom to him, though his reigne was not accounted to have begun, till the death of Sesoftris. But whether Busiris did usurp the kingdom, or protection of the land by violence: or whether the blind king resigned it, keeping the title; or whether Busiris were onely Regent, whilst the king lived, and afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) king himself: it might wel be said that Pharaohs daughter took up Moses, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel; seeing he both at that time was king in effect, and shortly after, king in deed and title both. It were not absurd for us to say, that the blind king Sesoftris the second oppressed Israel: but forasmuch as it may seem that the wicked Tyrant shewed his evil nature even when he first arose: I think it more likely, that Busiris did it, using at first the power of a king, and shortly after the stile. Thus of the 122 years which passed between the beginning of Sesoftris his reign, and the departure of Israel out of Egypt, 47 being spent, the 75 which remain are to be accounted to Busiris, or Orus the second, and his children. Busiris himself reigned 30 years, according to Eusebius: whom very many judicious Authors herein approve. After him his daughter, who took Moses out of the water, is said by all that I have read, to have reigned 12 years. Her name was Thermutis Pharis, or Atthis, according to Cedrenus: Euseb. calls her Acencheris; and out of Artabanus his History, Merin: Joseph calls her both Acencheris, and Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panario saith, that she was honoured afterward of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis the daughter of Amenophis, the son of Pharaoh. Of this last title question might be made, and much spoken: for the Scriptures call her not Pharaohs sons daughter, but Pharaohs daughter.

Amenophis

§. VIII.

Of the two brethren of Queen Thermutis: and what king it was, under whom Moses was born: and who it was that perished in the Red Sea.

He had two brethren: the one was Rathoris, or Athoris, who succeeded her; the other Telegonus, who is onely named by Eusebius; but his lineage and off-spring described by Reineccius. Rathoris after his sisters death reigned nine years: after whom Chencheris, thought to be his son, reigned ten years, and then perished in the Red Sea. During the reign of Chencheris, Eusebius saith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus upon Io: of which History elsewhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Chencheris (whom some call Acencheris: but all or most do stile Siquaxer, a fighter against God) Acherres reigned 8 years; and then Cherres 15. This descent seems from father to son. In the 11 year of Cherres it is said by Eusebius, that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Egypt, built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwise was not unlikely: viz. That Egypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laid upon it, and the destruction of her King and Army in the Red Sea: else could it not have had two reigning in it at once; the latter of whom, or his posterity, seems to have taken all from Cherres: the grand-child of Chencheris. For whereas Armais is said to have reigned four years after Cherres: and Armais one after Armais: these two kings are by Eusebius and others accounted as one, and his reign said to have been five years. His name is called Armeus, otherwise Danans: and his pedigree thus described by Reineccius in his hystor. Julia.

Telegonus:
Epaphus:
Lybia, who had

Agenor, Belus, and Busiris.

Egyptus or Rameses, who gave name to the Country, having expelled his brother Danans, reigned, and begat Lyncus, married to Hypermetra.

Danans or Armeus expelled by his brother Egyptus, after hee had reigned five years, became king of Argos in Greece: was father to Hypermetra.

How it might come to passe that the Nephews sons of Epaphus should have occupied the Kingdom after Cherres, it is hard to say: considering that Epaphus himself is reported by Eusebius to have been born in the time of Chencheris. But forasmuch as the History of Epaphus his birth, is diversely related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the father of Danans and Egyptus, otherwise called Armeus and Rameses, was equally distant from Busiris or Orus the second, with Cherres the grand-child of Chencheris. And that the posterity of Telegonus did marry very young, it appears by the History of these two brethren, Danans and Egyptus : of whom the former had 50. daughters, the latter 50. sons : perhaps, or rather questionable, by divers women : yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth : Howsoever it were, the generall consent of writers is, that Armenus or Danans did succeed Cherres : and (according to Ensebius and good Authors approving him) reigned five years. Rameffer followed, who reigned 68. years. This Rameffer or Egyptus, is that Armesimianum, or Armesimianus, under whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that follows Mercator, Moses was born : and the cruell Edith made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reign seems to me the chiefe, if not the onely ground of Mercator's opinion. For whereas the Lord said to Moses, Go, return to Egypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee : Mercator hereupon conceives, that it was one and the same king under whom Moses was born, and under whom he slew the Egyptian at the 40. year of his age : and fled into the wilderness, and there abode for fear : all which circumstances could agree with none, but this Rameffer, who reigned so long : wherefore desirous rather to hold a true Paradox, than a common error, he placeth one Alisfragmuthosis (whose name is found in the list of Egyptian kings, but the time uncertain wherein he reigned) in an age 112. or 113. years more ancient than others left him in : and so continuing the Catalogue of his successors from Themosis (whom Ensebius calls Anasis) downwards, with no other variation of the length of each mans reign, than is the difference between Manetho and Ensebius, he findes Moses born under Armesimianum, and Israel delivered in the dayes of his son Amenophis. The very name of Alisfragmuthosis seems to him with little alteration to sound like Pharater, of which name one was thought to have flourished either as a king, or a wife man, about the time of Isaac. For (saith he) from Alisfragmuthosis to Phragmuthosis, Pharmuthosis, or Pharater, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent learning and industry : and one to whom the world is bound for his many notable works : yet my assent herein is withheld from him, by these reasons. First, I see all other Writers agree, that Chenres was king, who was drowned in the Red Sea. Secondly, the place. Exod. 4. all are dead, &c. may better be understood of Eufiris and all his children, than of one king alone. Thirdly, S. Cyril in his first book against Julian the Apostata, saith, that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moses was 120. years old : Rameffer, which was this Armesimianum, being then king of Egypt. After Rameffer, Amenophis reigned 19. years : who is thought by Mercator, and peremptorily by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that perished in the Red Sea : of which our opinion being already layed open, I think it most expedient to referre the kings ensuing to their own times (which a Chronological Table shall lay open) and here to speak of that great deliverance of Israel out of Egypt : which for many great considerations depending thereupon, we may not lightly over-passe.

CHAP. III.

of the delivery of Israel out of Egypt.

§. I.

of the time of Moses birth, and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

TRue it is that the History it selfe is generally and well knowne : yet concerning the time of Moses his birth, who was the excellent and famous instrument of this and other great workes of the Highest, the different opinions are very neere as many, as the men that have written of that Argument.

L. Vives in his annotations upon S. Augustine citeth very many of their conjectures : as that of Porphyrie out of Sanchoniato, that Moses lived in the time of Semiramis : But if he did meane the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit : for besides that the same is contrary to all Stories divine and human ; while that Semiramis lived, she commanded Syria, and all the parts thereof absolutely : neither were the Ammonites, or Mobabites, or Edomites, while she ruled, in vassalage.

A second opinion he remembereth of Appion, taken from Ptolomy a Priest of Mendes, who saith that Moses was borne while Inachus did rule the Argives, and Ameffer in Egypt.

The third opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greeke History, the first Booke : that Moses was borne while Apis the third King ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Assyrius, who though he cite some authorities, so that Moses lived after the Trojan war, is himselfe of opinion, that Moses was far more ancient, proving it by many arguments.

Fifthly, he setteth downe the testimony of Numinius the Philosopher, who took Musaeus and Moses to be one : confirming the same out of Artapanus, who confesseth that Moses was called Musaeus, by the Grecians : and who farther delivereth that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis, the daughter of Egypt : the same which Eupolemus calleth Meris ; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermothos. Ensebius also affirmeth, that by Eupolemus in his first booke de bono, Moses, vir Deo conjunctissimus, is called Musaeus Judeorum. Ensebius in his Chronology, findes that Moses was borne while Amenophis ruled Egypt. The ancient Manethon calls that Pharao, which lived at Moses birth, Thumosis or Thumosis : the same perance which Appion the Grammarian will have to be Ameosis, and elsewhere Amenophis the Father of Sethosis : to whom Lyimachus and Cornelius Tacitus gave the name of Bocchoris. To me it seemes most probable, that while Saphrus, called also Spherus or Iphereus, governed Assyria ; Orthopolis, Sicyonia ; and Criafus the Argives ; that then (Sesostris the second ruling in Egypt) Moses was borne. For if we beleieve S. Augustine, it was about the end of Cecrops time, that Moses led Israel out of Egypt. Eduxit Moyses ex Aegypto populum Dei novissimum tempore Cecropis Atheniensium Regis ; Moses (saith he) led the people of God out of Egypt, about the end of Cecrops time, King of the Athenians. In this sort therefore is the time of Moses birth, and of his departure out of Egypt best proved. S. Augustine affirms (as before remembred) that Moses was borne,

Saphrus governing Assyria ; and that he left Egypt about the end of Cecrops time. Now Saphrus ruled 20. years ; his successor Mameus 30. years ; Spartus after him 40. yeeres : in whose fourth yeere Cecrops began to governe in Attica : Ascatades followed Spartus, and held the Empire 41. So as Moses being borne while Saphrus ruled Assyria ; Orthopolis Sicyonia ; and Criafus Argos (for these three Kings lived at once at his birth, saith S. Augustine, as Cecrops did when he departed Egypt) it will follow that the birth of Moses was in the nineteenth year of the Assyrian Saphrus : for take one year remaining of 20. (for so long Saphrus reigned) to which adde the thirty yeeres of Mameus, and the 40. yeeres of Spartus, these make 71. with which there were waited three yeeres years of Cecrops his 50. years : then take nine years out of the reigne of *Afcata*der, who was Spartes succedour, those nine yeeres added to 71. make 80. at which age Mofes left Egypt : and adde these nine yeeres to the three yeeres of Cecrops formerly spent, there will remaine but foure yeeres of Cecrops his 50. and so it falleth right with S. Auguftines words, affirming that towards the end of Cecrops his time, Mofes led the people of Israel out of Egypt.

Exod. I.

Now the time in which the Hebrews were oppressed in Egypt, seemeth to have had beginning some eighty or nine yeeres before the birth of Moses, and 54. yeeres, or rather more after Joseph: between whose death and the birth of Moses, there were consumed 64. yeeres, some of which time, and 80 yeeres after, they lived in great servitude and misery. For as it is written in Exodus: They set task-masters over them, to keepe them under with burdens: and they built the Cities, Pitihom and Ramases, &c. And by cruelty they caused the children of Israel to serve: and made them weary of their lives, by sore labour in clay and bricke, and in all worke of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid upon them by a mastering power and strong hand, they endured to the time by the wisdom of God appointed: even from 54. yeeres, or not much more after the death of Joseph, who left the World when it had lasted 2370. yeeres to the eightieth yeere of Moses, and until he wrought his miracles in the field of Zaan, which he performed in the Worlds age 2514. towards the end thereof, according to Codoman, or after our account, 2513. And because those things which we deliver of Egypt, may the better be understood, I thinke it necessary to speake a few words of the principall place therein named, in this discourse.

§. II

Of divers Cities and places in Egypt, mentioned in this Story, or elsewhere in the Scripture.

THis City which the Hebrews call Zaan, was built Seven years after Hebron. Ezechiel calleth it Tappenes; and so doth Hieremy; the Septuagint, Tanais; Josephus, Protopolis; after the name of an Egyptian Queen; Antonius gives it the name of Thanes; Hezefippus, Thannna; and William Lyryus, Tapins. It adjoyneth to the land of Gosen, and is the same, wherein Hieremy the Prophet was stoned to death, for preaching against the Egyptian and Jewish Idolatry.

Zean or Taphus was in Moes time the Metropolis of the lower Egypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly resided; and not unlikely to be the same City, where Abraham in his time found him. But Eusebius out of Aristapane's affirmeth, that Abraham did reade Astronomy in Heliopolis, or On, to Pharetes King of Egypt. Alex. Polybius, out of Eupolemus hath it otherwise, saying, that Abraham instructed the Egyptian Priests, and not the King; both which authorities Eusebius citheth. The Septuagint, and the Vulgar edition, for Zean write Heliopolis, Pagnin, Vatablus, Junius, and our English call it On; and Ptolomy Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Egypt, towards the South; the other somewhat lower on the Easter-most branch of Nilus falling into the Sea at Pelufium. And it may be that Heliopolis to the South of the river Trojan, was the fame which Vatablus and our English call Aven. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certain knowledge; the fame which Pomp. Mela, and Pliny call Solis oppidum; Tyrris in the Holy War, Malbec; the Arabians, Babalbeth; and Simcon Setbi: Fo Solk. Of this Heliopolis, or On, was Potiphar Priest, or Prince, whose daughter Joseph married. In the Territory adjoining Jacob inhabited, while he lived in Egypt. In the confines of this City, Onias, the high Priest of the Jews, built a Temple, dedicated to so the eternal God; not much inferior to that of Hierusalem (Ptolomy Philopater then governing in Egypt) which stood in the time of Vespasian, 333. years after the foundation by Onias, whom Josephus falsly reporteth herein to have fulfilled a prophecy of Elsay, c. 19. In die illa erit Altare Domini in medio terre Egypti; in tunc day shall the Altar of the Lord be in the midst of the Land of Egypt. *Antiochus Epiphane*s at the time of the building tyrannizing over the Jews, gave the occasion for the erecting of this Temple in Egypt. Lastly, there it was that our Saviour Christ Jesus remained, while Joseph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: neer which (saith Brocard) the fountain is still found, called Jesur mell, whose streams do afterward water the Gardens of Balsamm, no where else found in Egypt. And hereof see more in Brochurd, in his description of Egypt.

There is also the City of Noph, remembred by Efay and Ezechiel, the same which Ho- see the Prophet calleth Noph; which latter name itooke from a Mountain adjoyning to called; which Mountain Hecodon remembreth. And this is that Great City, which was called Mempbis; and so the Septuagint writeth it. It is known to the Arabians by the name of Adamar. The Chaldeans name it Alcabon; and Tadalenfis Mizraim.
Pelufius, which Vatablus, Pagrin, Jennin, and our Engels write Sim; the Septuagint call it Sais; and Montanus, Lebnu; is not the same with Damiata, as Gul. Tyrinus witnesseth. In the time of Baldwin the third, Pelufius was called Belbeis. Belbeis (saith Tyrinus) que olim dicta est pelufius; Belbeis; that in times past was called Pelufius.

The City of No, the Septuagint call Diopolis. Of which name there are two or three Exer. 30. 15, 16 in Egypt. Hierome converts it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future.

Eubastus, (for so Hierome and Zeigler do write it) is the same which the Hebrews call Ezech. 30. 17.

To make the story the more perceivable, I have added a description of the land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited; with holy Cities and places so often remembered in the Scripture: as of Tophet or Leam, Jerusalem or Bethlemes, Ballyphon, Succoth, and the rest; together with Moses passage through the Desarts of Arabia the Story. For all story without the knowledge of the places wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure; so it no way enricheeth the knowledge and understanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing serve to retain, what we read, in our memories, so well as these pictures and descriptions do. In which respect I am driven to digresse in many places, and to interpose some such discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent: taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned man, Arias Montanus; who in his Preface to the Story of the Holy Land, hath these words: Si enim absque locorum observatione res gesta narrentur, aut sine Topographica cognitione historię legantur, adeo confusa atq; perturbata erunt omnia, ut ex his nihil non obscure, nihil non difficile elici possit; If narration (saith he) be made of those things which are performed, without the observation of the places, wherein they were done: or if Histories be read without Topographical knowledge; all things will appear so intricate and confused, as we shall thereby understand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficulty.

§. III.

Of the cruelty against the Israelites young children in Egypt: and of Moses his preservation 40 and education.

BUt to return to the story it selfe. It appeareth that notwithstanding the labour and slavery, which the Israelites endured; yet they decreased not in numbers: inso-much as Pharaoh considering the danger of discontented poverty, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perillous they might be to his estate, by suggestion of the Devil, resolved to slaughter all the male children of the Hebrews, as soon as they should be born. To which end he sent for Sephora and Thura, women the most famous and expert amongst them, que præerat (saith Comefort) multitudinis obsequium, who had command given them over all mid-wives; by whom (as it seemeth) he gave order 50 to all the rest for the execution of his Edict. For to have called all the Mid-wives of Egypt together, had been a strange Parliament. Now whether these two (before named) were of the Hebrews, or of the Egyptians, it is diversly disputed. S. Augustine calls them Hebrews, because it is written Exodus the first, The King of Egypt commanded the Mid-wives of the Hebrew women, &c. But Iosephus, Ambrosius, and Cicerinus believethem to be Egyptians. Whosoever they were, when it pleased God to frustrate the execution of that secret murder, to the end the world might witness both the wickednesse of the Egyptians, and the just cause, thereby made manifest, of his future indignation and revenge: Pharaoh finding these women filled with piety, and the fear of God, commanded commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publicly, or howsoever, to destroy all the male Hebrew children born within his dominions.

Now besides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrews, the greatest part of whom he might have assured, by affording them the justice which every King oweth to his vassals, and the rest he might have employed or sent away at his pleasure; Joseph giveth another cause of his rage against them, namely, That it was prophetically delivered him by an Egyptian Priest, that among the Hebrews there should be born a child, who growing to mans estate, should become a plague and terror to his whole Nation. To prevent which, (and presuming that he could resist the ordinance of God, by a mean, contrary to the laws of heaven and of nature) he stretched out his bloody and merciless hand to the execution of his former intent. The same prevention Herod long after practised, when fearing the spirituall Kingdom of Christ, as if it should have been temporal, he caused all the male children at that time born, to be slaughtered. And that Pharaoh had some kind of foreknowledge of the future successe, it may be gathered by these his own words, in the tenth verse of the fifth of Exodus: Come, let us work wisely with them, lest they multiply; and it come to passe, that if there be war, they joyne themselves also unto our enemies, and fight against us, and get them out of the Land. But we see, and time hath told it us from the beginning, how God derideth the wisdom of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they rely on the inventions of their own most feeble, and altogether darkened understanding. For even by the hands of the dearly beloved daughter of this tyrant, was that great Prophet and Minister of Gods marvellous works taken out of Nilus, being thereinto turned off, in an Ark of reeds, a sucking and powerlesse infant. And this Princeesse having beheld the child his form and beauty, though but yet in the blouth, so pierced her compassion, as she did not only preserve it, and cause it to be fostered; but commanded that it should be esteemed as her own, and with equal care to the son of a King nourished. And for memory that it was her deed, she called the child Moses, as it were, extrañus or erectus, taken out, to wit, out of the water: or after Josephus and Clycas, Moy, a voice expressing water, and Esifas, as much to say, as that which is drawn out of water, or thence taken. Clement Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Moses was circumcised before he was put in to the Ark of reeds, and that Amram his father had named him Joachim. In his youth he was carefully bred, by the care, and at the charge of Pharaohs daughter, and by men of the most understanding, taught and instructed: quem regio more educavit, preestitit sapientibus Egyptiorum Magistris, a quibus erudiretur, saith Basil; unto whom she gave princely education, appointing over him wise masters of the Egyptians for his instructors. Thereby (say Josephus and Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Egyptians; which also the Martyr Stephen in the seventh of the Acts confirmeth; And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. Which wisdom or sapience, such as it was, or at least so much thereof as Six. Senensis hath gathered, we have added, between the death of Moses, and the reign of Josua.

§. IV.

Of Moses his flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certain ancient Historians of his war in Aethiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo his judgement of his Pastoral life: and that of Pterius of the Books of Genesis and Job.

When Moses was grown to mans estate, Josephus and Eusebius out of Artapanus, tell us of ten years war that he made against the Aethiopians: of the besieging of Saba, afterward by Cambyser, called Ateroe; and how he recovered that City by the favour of Tharbis, a daughter of Aethiopia, whom he took to wife. So hath Comefor a so pretty tale of Moses. How after the end of that war, Tharbis resisting his return into Egypt, Moses most skillfull in Astronomy, caused two Images to be engraven in two precious stones, whereof the one increased memory; the other caused forgetfulness. These he set in two rings; whereof he gave the one, to wit, that of oblivion, to his wife Tharbis, reserving the other of memory for himself: which ring of forgetfulness, after she had a while worn, she began to neglect the love she bare her husband; and so Moses without danger returned into Egypt. But leaving these fancies to the Authors of them: It is true, that about the 40. year of Moses age, when he beheld an Egyptian Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppressed Hebrews, moved by compassion, in respect of his brother, and stirred up by disdain against the other, in the contention he slew the Egyptian. Soon after which fact, finding a disposition in some of his own Nation to accule him, for whose defence he had thus greatly endangered his own life: by the ordinance and advice of God, whose chosen servant he was, he fled into Arabia Petrea, the next bordering Countrie to Egypt; where wandering all alone, as a man left and forsaken, in a place unknown unto him, as among a Nation of barbarous strangers; and who in future times were the irreconcilable enemies of the Hebrews: it pleased God (working the greatest things by the weakest worldly means) to make the watering of a few sheep, and the assisting of the Daughters of Raguel the Madianite, an occasion whereby to provide him a wife of one of those, and a father in law, that fed him, and sustained him in a Country neereft Egypt, fittest to returne from; necessary to be known, because interjaent between Egypt and Judea, through which he was to lead the Israelites; and wherein God held him, till the occasion which God presented, best served. And lastly, where the glory of the world shined least, amidst mountainous Desarts, there the glory of God, which shineth most, covered him over, and appeared unto him, not finding him as a Kings son, or an adopted child of great Pharaohs daughter, but as a meek and humble shepherd, sitting at a mountains foot, a keeper and commander of those poor beasts only.

In that part of Arabia neer Madian, he consumed 40. yeers. And though (as Philo in the story of Moses life observeth) he did not neglect the care of those flocks, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Pastoral knowledge; yet in that solitary Desart he enjoyed himself: and being separate from the preasse of the world, and the troublesome affairs thereof, he gave himself to contemplation, and to make perfect in himself all those knowledges, whereof his younger yeers had gathered the grounds and principles: the same Author also judging that his Pastoral life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principality, which he afterward obtained. Est enim (saith Philo) ars Pastoralis, quasi preludium ad regnum, hoc est, ad regimen hominum, gregis mansuetissimi. Quae admodum bellicis ingenia praerexerunt se in venationibus, experientia in feris, quod postea in militia & bello perfectura sunt; brutis praebentibus materiam exercitii, tam belliquam pacis tempore. At vero praefectura mansueti pecoris, habet quiddam simile cum regno in subditis; ideoque Reges cognominantur Pastores populorum, non contemnenda, sed honoris gratia; The art of keeping sheep is, as it were, an introductory exercise unto a Kingdom, namely, the rules over men, the most gentle flock: Even as warlike natures do before-hand exercise themselves in hunting, practising on wild beasts those things, which after they will accomplish in warfare: those brute beasts affording matter, wherein to train themselves, both in time of war and of peace. But the government of gentle cattell, hath a kinde of resemblance unto a Kingly rule over subjects; therefore Kings are stiled shepherds of the people, not in way of reproach, but for their honour.

That Moses, in this time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Book of Job, as Pterius supposeth, I cannot judge of it, because it is thought, that Job was at that time living. Neither dare I subscribe to Pterius opinion, That Moses while he lived in that part of Arabia, wrote the Book of Genesis; although I cannot deny the reason of Pterius conjecture, That by the example of Jobs patience he might strengthen the oppressed Hebrews: and by the promises of God to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, put them in assurance of their delivery from the Egyptian Slavery, and of the Land of rest, and plentie promised.

Of this calling back into Egypt by the Angell of God, and the marvels and wonders which he performed, thereby to persuade Pharaoh, that he was the messenger of so the most High, the particulars are written in the first fourteen Chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needlesse. But for the first, it is to be noted, that when Moses desired to be taught by God, by what name he should make him known, and by whom he was sent; he received from God so much, as a man could comprehend of his infinite and ever-being nature. Out of which he delivered him in the first part of his answer, a name to be considered of by the wisest: and in his second, to be understood by all. For there is nothing that is, or hath being of it self, but the Eternal: which truly is; which is above all; which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed every moment: their substance wasteth, and is repaired by nutriment, ment; never continuing at one stay, nor being the same so long as while one may say, Now. Likewise, whatsoever is consumed in the longest continuance of time, the same in every shortest piece of time suffereth decay; neither doth any thing abide in one state. *Una est Dei & sola natura que veri est: id enim quod subsistit, non habet aliunde, sed suum est. Cetera que creata sunt, etiamvis videntur esse, non sunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & potest rursum non esse, quod non fuit; It is the one and only nature of God, which truly is: for he hath his being of himself, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they seem to be, yet they are not; for sometimes they were not: and that which hath not been, may again want being. And with this, in respect of the divine nature, the saying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth: Totam rerum naturam umbra est, aut inanis, aut fallax; The whole nature of things is but a shadow, either empty or deceitfull: in comparison of whom (saith Esay) all Nations are as nothing, lesse than nothing, and meer vanity.*

Of the ten plagues wherewith the Egyptians were stricken, the first was by changing the Rivers into blood: God punishing them by those waters, into which their Forefathers had thrown, and in which they had drowned the innocent children of the Hebrews. To which this place of the Revelation may be fitly applied: And I heard the Angel of the water say, Lord, thou art just, which art, and which wast; and holy, because thou hast judged these things; for they shed the blood of thy Saints and Prophets, and therefore hast thou given them blood to drink.

The rest of the plagues by Frogs, Lice, Flies, or stinging Wasps; by the death of their Cattell; by leprous Scabs; by Haile and Fire; by Grasshoppers; by Darknesse; after which Pharaoh forbade Moses his presence: moved the hardened heart of the unbelieving King, no longer, than the pain and perill lasted; till such time as his own first-born, and the first-born of all his Nation perished. He then, while he feared his own life, (a time wherein we remember God performe) stood upon no condition: whereas before, he first yielded but to the departure of the men; then of the men, women, and children, reserving their bestiall; but he was now content for the present, that the Israelites should not onely depart with all their own, but with a part of the Silver, Gold, and Jewels, of his own people: of which (the fear being past) he suddenly repented, so him, as his pursuit after them proved. For when every one of the Hebrews had (according to direction from Moses received) slain a Lamb, without spot or blemish, for the Passover, (a Sacrament of the most clean and unspotted Saviour,) and with the blood thereof coloured the post and lintern of the doors; the Angel of God in the night smote every first-born of Egypt, from the son of the King, to that of the Beggar and Slave: the children of the Israelites excepted. At which terrible judgement of God, Pharaoh being more than ever amazed, yeelded, as before is said, to their departure. The Egyptians (saith Epiphanius) did in after-times imitate this colouring with blood, which the Israelites used after the Passover; ascribing an exceeding virtue to the Red Colour: and therefore they did not onely mark their Sheep and Cattell, but their Trees bearing Fruit, to preserve them from lightning and other harms.

§. V.

Of Pharaohs pursuit of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so far as Succoth.

Now, when the people were removed, and on their way, (his heart being hardened by God) he bethought him as well of the honour lost, as of the shame remaining after so many Calamities and Plagues, in suffering them to depart with the spoils of his people, and in despite of himself. And having before this time great Companies of Souldiers in readinesse, he consulted with himself what way the Israelites were like to take. He knew that the shortest and fairest passage was through the Country of the Philistines. But because these people were very strong, and a warlike Nation, and in all probability of his Allies, he suspected that Moses meant to finde some other out-let, to wit, through the Desert of Etham; and there, because the Country was exceeding mountainous, and of hard access, and that Moses was pestered with multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattell, he thought it impossible for the Israelites to escape escape him that way. In the mean while having gathered together all the Chariots of Egypt, and 600. of his own, and Captains over them; he determined to set upon them in the plains of Gosen, which way soever they turned themselves. For it was the ancient manner to fight in those Chariots, armed with broad and sharp hooks on both sides, in fashion like the Mowers sythe. Which kinde of fight in Chariots, but not hooked, the Brittains used against the Romans, while they made the war for the conquest of this Land. Of this Army of Pharaoh, Josephus affirmeth, that it consisted of 50000. Horse, and 20000. Foot; which, were it true, then it cannot be doubted but that Pharaoh intended long before to assault the Hebrews at their departure, or to destroy them in Gosen; and refused them passage, till such time as he had prepared an Army to set on them. For, as it is written in the first of Exodus, he doubted two things, either that the Hebrews might joyn themselves to his enemies within the Land; or being so multiplied, as they were, might leave his service, and get themselves thence at their pleasure. But the plagues which God grieved him withall, enforced him at this time to give an assent to their departure: perchance fore-running his intent. But were it otherwise, and Josephus partial in this affair, yet by the words of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariots of Egypt, which could not be done in haste. For Moses made but three dayes march, ere Pharaoh was at his heels; and yet the last day he went on sixteen miles: which, in so hot a country, and to drive their cattell and sheep with them, pestered with a world of women and children, was a march witnessing the dread of a powerfull Enemy at hand. Now, as Moses well knew that he went out with a mighty hand, and that God guided his understanding in all his enterprizes; so he lay not still in the ditch crying for help, but using the understanding which God had given him, he left nothing unperformed becoming a wife man, and a valiant and skilfull Conductor; as by all his actions and counsells from this day to his death, well appeared.

When Moses perceived that Pharaoh was enraged against him, and commanded him not to dare to come thenceforth into his presence: after that he had warned Israel of the Passover, he appointed a generall Assembly or Rendezvous of all the Hebrews at Rameses, in the territory of Gosen; a City standing indifferent to receive from all parts of the Country the dispersed Hebrews: and gave commandment, that every Family should bring with them such store as they had of dough, and paste, not staying to make it into bread: knowing then that Pharaoh was on foot, and on his way towards them. Which done, and having considered the great strength of Pharaohs Horse-men and Chariots, of which kinde of defence Moses was utterly unprovided (though, as it is written, the Israelites went up armed) he marched from Rameses East-ward, towards the Desarts of Etham, and incamped at Succoth; which he performed on the fifteenth day of the moneth Abib: which moneth from that time forward they were commanded to account as the first moneth of the year. Whether in former times they had been accustomed to begin their year in some other moneth, following the manner of the Egyptians, and were now recalled by Moses to the rule of their fore-fathers, it is uncertain. Certain it is, that they had, and retained another beginning of their politick year, which was not now abrogated, but rather by some solemnities thereunto annexed, was confirmed, and still continued in use. Wherefore in referring things done, or happening among them, unto the beginning, midst, or ending of the year; that distinction of the Sacred and the Politick year is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of dayes in every moneth, and the whole form of their year, like enough it is that Moses himself in forty yeeres space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to whose care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was given in trust: but that any rule of framing their Kalendar was made publick, before the captivity of Babylon, I do not find. Now because time and motion begin together, it will not, I think, be any great breach of order, to shew here at their first setting forth, what was the form of the Hebrew year: with the difference between them and other Nations in ordering the account of time.

VE Adar was an intercalary moneth, added some yeers unto the other twelve, to make the Solary and Lunary year agree; which (besides the generally inconvenience that would otherwise have risen, by casting the moneths of Summer into the Winter season, to the great confusion of all account) was more necessarily to be regarded of the Hebrews, because of the divine Precept. For God appointed especial Feasts to be celebrated precisely in such a moneth of the year, and withall on a set day, both of the Moon and of the moneth; as the feast of the First-fruits; the new Moons, and the like: which could not have so been kept, if either the day of the Moon had fallen in some other part of the moneth, or the moneth it self been found far distant from his place in the season of the year.

Other Nations, the better to observe their Solemnities in the due time, & to ascertain so all reckonings and remembrances, (which is the principall commodity of time, that is the measure of endurance) were driven in like manner to make their yeers unequal, by adding sometimes, and sometimes abating one or more dayes, as the error committed in foregoing yeers required. The error grew at first, by not knowing what number of dayes made up a complete year. For though by the continuall course of the Sun, causing Summer and Winter duly to succeed each other, it is plain enough, even to the most savage of all people, when a year hath passed over them; yet the necessity of ordinary occurrences, that are to be numbred by a shorter tally, makes this long measure of whole yeers insufficient for the smaller sort of more daily affaires. Therefore men observed the monethly conspicuous revolution of the Moon, by which they divided the year into twelve parts, subdividing the moneth into 29. dayes & nights, & those again into their quarters and hours. But as the marks of time are sensible and easily discerned; so the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexity in the understanding. Twelve revolutions of the Moon, containing lesse time by 11. dayes, or thereabout, than the yearly course of the Sun through the Zodiack, in the space of sixteen yeers, every moneth was found in the quite contrary part of the year, to that wherein it was placed at the first. This caused them to adde some dayes to the year, making it to consist of 12. moneths, and as many dayes more as they thought would make the courses of the Sun and Moon to agree. But herein were committed many new errors. For neither did the Sun determine his yearly revolution by any set number of whole dayes; neither did the Moon change always at one hour; but the very minutes and lesser fractions were to be observed by him, that would seek to reduce their motions (which motions also were not still alike) into any certain rule.

Here lay much Wisdom and deep Art, which could not soon be brought to perfection. Yet as making an estimate at random, the Athenians held the year to contain three hundred and sixty dayes, wherein most of the Greeks concurred with them.

That 360. dayes filled up the Grecian year (besides many collateral proofes) it is manifest by that which Pliny directly affirmeth, telling of the Statues, erected in honour of

Demetrius

Demetrius Phalerens, which were (saith he) 360. whilest as yet the year exceeded not that number of dayes. By this account neither did any certain age of the Moon begin or end their moneths; neither could their moneths continue many yeers in their own places: but must needs be shifted by little and little from Winter to Summer, and from Summer to Winter, as the dayes forgotten to be inserted into the Almanack by men, but not forgotten by the superiour bodies in their courses, should occupy their own rooms in their due turns. Now, because the solemnity of the Olympian games was to be held at the full Moon, and withall, on the 15. day of the moneth Hecatombæon (which answered in a manner to our June) they were careful to take order, that this moneth might ever begin with the new Moon; which they effected by adding some two dayes to the last moneth of every year; those games being held once in four yeers. This intercalation sufficed not to make the matter even; which caused them sometimes to omit one day in the fourth year, which was the second of the moneth Edromion (agreeing neerly with our August) sometimes not to omit it, or (which is all one) to insert another for it in their fourth Lunary year, accounting by the Moon, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithstanding, their moneth of June would every year have grown colder and colder, had they not sought to keep all upright, by intercalating in each other Olympiad, that is, each eighth year, one whole moneth, which they called the second Posideon, or December; which was the device of Harpalus, who also taught them to make one moneth of 29. dayes, another of 30. dayes, & so successively through the whole year. Thus with much labour they kept their year as neer as they could, unto the high way of the Planets; but these marks which they observed, were found at length to be deceitfull guides. For it was not possible so to fashion this eighth yeers intercalation, that it should not deceive them in 11. hours and 18. minutes at the least, or some wayes in 34. hours and 10. minutes, or 36. and 41. minutes; which differences would in few Ages have bred much confusion. The first that introduced a good method, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth yeers intercalation, devised a Cycle of 19. yeers, wherein the Moon having 235. times run out her circuit, met with the Sun in the same place, and on the same day 30. of the year, as in the 19. year before past had done. This invention of Meton was entertained with great applause, and passing from Greece to Rome, was there inserted into the Kalendar in Golden Letters, being called the Golden Number, which name it retaineth unto this day. Hereby were avoided the great and uncertain intercalations that formerly had been used; for by the intercalation of 7. moneths in the 19. yeers, all was so even, that no sensible difference could be found. Yet that error which in one year could not be perceived, was very apparent in a few of those Cycles; the new Moons anticipating in one Cycle 7. hours, and some minutes of the precise rule. Therefore Calippus devised a new Cycle, containing four of Metons, that is to say, 76. yeers; and afterwards Hipparchus, a noble Astrologer, framed another, containing four of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding some error in the former observations, which they diligently corrected. The last reformation of the Kalendar was that which Julius Cæsar made, who by advice of the best Mathematicians, then to be found, examining the courses of those heavenly bodies, reduced the year unto the form which is now in use with us, containing 365. dayes and six hours, which hours in four yeers make up one whole day, that is intercalated every fourth year, the 24. of February. The correction of the Julian year by Pope Gregory the 13. Anno Dom. 1582. is not as yet entertained by general consent; it was indeed but as a note added unto the work of Cæsar: yet a note of great importance. For whereas it was observed, that the Sun, which at the time of the Nicene Council, Anno Dom. 324. entered the Æquinoctiall on the 21. day of 50 March, was in the year 1582. ten dayes sooner found, in that time Pope Gregory strook out of the Kalendar ten dayes, following the fourth of October, so that in stead of the fifth day was written the fifteenth; by which means the moveable Feasts depending on the Suns entrance into Aries, were again celebrated in such time, as at the Nicene Council they had been. And the better to prevent the like alterations, it was by the Council of Trent ordained, that from thence forward in every hundred year, the Leap-day should be omitted, excepting still the fourth hundred: because the Sun doth not in his yearly course take up full six hours above the 365. dayes; but ffaithle so many minutes, as in 400. yeers make about three whole dayes.

But the Cycle of 29. yeers, which the Hebrews used, was such as neither did need any nice curiosity of houres, minutes, and other lesser fractions to help it; neither did in summing up the dayes of the whole year, neglect the dayes of the Moon, confounding one moneth with another. For with them it fell out so, that alwaies the Kalends or first day of the moneth was at the new Moon; and because that day was festivall, they were very carefull as well to observe the short year of the Moon, passing through all the 12. Signes in one moneth, as that longer of the Sun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First, therefore they gave it to Nisan their first moneth, which is about their March or April, 30. dayes; to Iar their second moneth 29. dayes; and so successively 30. to one, 29. to another. Hereby it came to passe, that every two moneths of theirs contained somewhat evenly two revolutions of the Moon, allowing 29. dayes 12. houres, and odde minutes, from change to change. The spare minutes were bestowed among the superfluous or Epact dayes; which made up 7. moneths in 19. yeers; to 6. of which, 7. were commonly given 30. dayes; to one of them 29. dayes, or otherwise as was found requisite. Their common year (as appeareth by the severall dayes of each moneth) contained 354. dayes, which fall of the year, wherein the Sun finisheth his course, 11. whole dayes, with some fractions of time. But these dayes, and other broken pieces, howsoever they were neglected in one year, yet in the Cycle of 19. yeers were so disposed of by convenient intercalations, that still at the end of that Cycle, both the Sun and Moon were found on the same day of the year, moneth and week, yea, commonly on the same houre of the day, where they had been at the beginning of it 19. yeers before.

Divers have diversly set down the form of the Hebrew year, with the manner of their Intercalations. Signonius tells us, that every second year they did adde a moneth of 22. dayes; every fourth year a moneth of 23. in the regard of 11. dayes and a halfe wanting in 12. Moons, to fulfill a year of the Sun. But herein Signonius was very much deceived. For the Moon doth never finish her course in 22. or 23. dayes: and therefore to have added so many dayes to the end of the year, had been the way to change the fashion of all the moneths in the yeers following, which could not have begun, as they ought, with the new Moon. Genebrard saith, that every third year, or second year, as so need required, they did intercalate one moneth, adding it at the yeers end unto the other 12. This I beleieve to have been true; but in which of the yeers the intercalation was (if it be worthy of consideration) me thinks they do not probably deliver, who keep all far from evenness, untill the very last of the 19. yeers. For (to omit such as erre grossly) some there are who say, that after three yeers, when besides the dayes spent in 36. courses of the Moon, 33. dayes are left remaining, that is, 11. dayes of each year; then did the Hebrews adde a moneth of 30. dayes; keeping three dayes, as it were, in plussage unto the next account. The like, say they, was done at the end of the sixth year; at which time, besides the Intercalary moneth, remained six dayes, namely, three surmounting that moneth, and the Epact of three yeers, besides the three formerly reserved. Thus they go on to the 18. year; at which time they have 18. dayes in hand: all which with the Epact of the 19. year, make up a moneth of 29. dayes, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle, makes all even.

Whether this were the practice, I can neither affirm nor deny; yet surely it mult needs have bred a great confusion, if in the 18. year, every moneth were removed from his own place by the distance of 48. dayes, that is, half a quarter of the year and more; which inconvenience by such a reckoning was unavoidable. Wherefore, I preferre the common opinion, which preventeth such dislocation of the moneths, by setting down a more convenient way of Intercalation in the 8. year. For the 6. dayes remaining after the two former Intercalations made in the third and sixth yeers, added unto the 22. dayes, arising out of the Epacts of the 7. and 8. yeers, do fitly serve to make up a moneth, with the borrowing of one day or two from the year followings; and this borrowing of two dayes is so far from causing any disorder, that indeed it helps to make the yeers ensuing vary the lesse from the proper season of every moneth. This may suffice to be spoken of the Hebrew moneths and yeers, by which they guided their accounts.

§. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red Sea: and of the divers waies leading out of Egypt.

From Succoth in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Desert of Etham, to recover the Mountain foot, by the edge of that Wilderness, though he intended nothing lesse than to go out of that way, of all other the nearest. But being assured of the multitude of Horfemen and armed Chariots that followed him, he kept himself from being compassed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham he rested but one night, and then he reflected back from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the distance between it and Succoth being about eight miles. That he forbore to enter Arabia, being then in sight thereof, it seemeth to proceed from three respects; the first two, naturall; the third, divine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and having received intelligence of the way which Moses took, perfwaded himself, that the numbers which Moses led, consisting of above a Million, if not two Millions of souls, (for as it is written Exod. the 12. It is probable that all those Egyptians and others brought by the Hebrews to the knowledge of the true God, followed Moses at his departure. Great multitudes of sundry sorts of people went out with them) could not possibly passe over those desert and high Mountains with so great multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattell, but that at the very entrance of that false way he should have overtaken them, and destroyed the greatest numbers of them. For these his own words: They are tangled in the Land, the Wilderness hath shut them in, do shew his hopes and intents; which Moses, by turning another way, did frustrate. Secondly, Moses by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh toward the East-side of the Land of Gosen, or Rameses: from whence (missing Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult, by reason of the roughness of the way; and howsoever, yet while the Hebrews kept the Mountain foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the over-bearing violence both of the Horfe and Chariots. Thirdly, Moses confidence in the All-powerfull God was such, by whose spirit, only wife, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leave the glory of his deliverance and victory to Almighty God, than either by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, consisting of 600000. men, to cast the success upon his own understanding, wife conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the Valley of Pihacheroth, 16. miles distant; and fate down between two ledges of Mountains adjoining to the Red Sea, to wit, the Mountains of Etham on the North, and Baalzephon towards the South; the same which Orosius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there stood a Temple dedicated to Baal. And, as Phagins noteth, the word so compounded, is Climax is rather so called in respect of a passage up and down, than that it is any proper name. as much to say, as, Dominus specula, sive custodia; Lord of the watch tower. For the Egyptians believed, or at least made their slaves believe, that if any of them offered to escape that way into Arabia, this Idoll would both arrest them, and force them to return to their Lords and Masters. For the Egyptians had gods for all turns. Aegyptii diis succedunt; The Egyptians were fruitfull in gods, saith Saint Hierome. But Moses, who encamped at the foot of this Mountain with a million of souls, or as others conceive, with two millions, found this Lord of the watch-tower asleep, or out of countenance.

Now these two passages leading out of Egypt into Arabia upon the firm land, Moses Exod. 13. 17. refused as well that of Pelusium and Cafioti, the fairest and shortest of all other, in respect of Judea, as the other by Etham, from which he reflected, for the reasons before remembered, and took the way by the Valley of Pihacheroth, between the Mountains, which made a straight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharaoh made so great speed with his Horfe-men and Chariots, as he gave the Hebrews no time at all to rest them after so long a march; but gave sight of them, and they of him, even at the very brink and wash of the Sea: inasmuch as the Hebrews being terrified with Pharaohs sudden approach, began to despair, and to mutine, at that time when it behooved them most to have taken courage for their own defence; laying it to Moses charge, that themselves foresaw those perils in which they were wrapped. And fear, Which, saith the Book of Wisdom, is the betraying of those succours which reason offereth, made them both despair in Gods former promises, and to be forgetfull of their own strength and multitudes.

§. VIII.

Of their passage over the Red Sea : and of the Red Sea itself.

BUt Moses who feared nothing but God himself, persuaded them to be confident in his goodness, who hath never abandoned those, that assuredly trust in him; uning this comfortable and resolved speech : Fear not, &c. for the Egyptians whom ye have seen this day, ye shall never see them again. The Lord shall fight for you. After which Moses called on God for succour, received encouragement, and commandment to go on in these words : *Wherefore criest thou unto me ? Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward ; and lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it, and let the voice of God, in the dark of the night finding the sands uncovered, pass on towards the other side and coast of Arabia : two parts of the night being spent ere he entered the Foord, which it pleased God by a forcible Eastern wind, and by Moses rod to prepare.*

Pharaoh followed him even at the heels, finding the same dry ground which Moses trod on. Therefore, as it is written : The Angel of God which went before the Host of Israel, removed, and went behind them ; also the pillar of the cloud went from before them, and stood behind them ; which is, that it pleased God therein either by his immediate power, or by the ministry of his Angel, to interpose his defence between the Hebrews and their Enemies ; to the end that the Egyptians might hereby be blinded, in such sort, as they could not pursue Israel with any harmful speed. But in the morning watch, Moses seized the other bank of Arabia side : and Pharaoh (as the dawn of day began to illighten the obscure aire) finding a beginning of the Seas return, halted himself towards his own Coast : But Moses stretched forth his hand, and the Sea returned to his force, that is, the Sea moved by the power of God, ran back towards the land with irresistible fury and swiftness, and overwhelmed the whole Army of Pharaoh, so as not one escaped. For it is written, that God took off their Chariot wheels, that is, when the waters began to cover the sands, the Egyptians being stricken with fear of death, ran one athwart another, and missing the path by which they had past on after the Hebrews, their wheels so stuck fast in the mud and quick-sands, and could not be drawn out : the Sea coming against them with supernaturall violence.

Lysanus upon Exod. 14. and others, following the opinions or old Traditions of the Hebrews, conceived, that after Moses had by the power of God divided the Red Sea, and that the children of Israel were fearful to enter it, Aminadab Prince or Leader of the Tribe of Juda first made the adventure ; and that therefore was that Tribe ever after honoured above the rest, according to the prophecy of Jacob, Gen. 49. 8. Thy fathers sons shall bow down unto thee. But Hierome upon the 11. of Hosea condemns this opinion. And though it be true, that Juda had the first place in all their marches in the Desert, and as we now call it, led the Van-guard, (whereupon it may be inferred, that he also led the way through the Red Sea) yet that Moses himself was the Conductor of Israel at that time, it is generally received. For, as it is written in the 77. Psalms : Thou didst lead thy people like sheep by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

The Hebrews have also another fancy, that the Red Sea was divided into twelve parts, and that every Tribe past over in a path apart, because it is written in the 125. Psalms, according to the vulgar : Divisit mare rubrum in divisiones ; He divided the Red Sea in divisions. Also that the bottom of the Sea became as a green Field or Pasture. But Origen, Epiphanius, Abulenstz, and Genebrard, favouring this conceit, had forgotten to consider, that there were not twelve Pillars, nor twelve Armies of the Egyptians. It is written Psal. 77. v. 16. Thy way is in the Sea ; not thy waies : and in the last Book of Wisdom, 50. ver. 7. In the Red Sea there was a way.

Now this Sea, through which Moses past, and in which Pharaoh, otherwise called Cheneus, perished in the 16. year of his reign, is commonly known by the name of the Red Sea, though the same differ nothing at all in naturall colour from other waters. But as Philostrophus in his third book noreth, and our selves know by experience, it is of a bluish colour, as other Seas are. It entreteth at a narrow strait between Arabia the Happy and Ethiopia, or the land of the Abyssins : the mouth of the indraught from the Cape, which Ptolomy calleth Possidium, to the other Land of Ethiopia, hath not above six leagues in breadth, and the same, also filled every where with Islands, but afterwards it extendeth it self 58. Leagues from Coast to Coast, and it runneth up between Arabia the Happy, and Arabia Petrea, on one side, and Ethiopia and Egypt on the other, as far as Sues, the uttermost end and indraught of that Sea : where the Turk now keepeth his fleet of Gallies. The Cosmographers commonly give it the name of the Arabian Gulf : but the North part towards Sues, and where Moses past, is called Heropolites, of the City Hero ; sometime Troy, and of later times Sues. Pliny calls it Cambysis, by which name it was known, saith he, before it was called Hero many yeers. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North Apocopa, Eccant, and Eant. Arzenidorus writes it Elaniticum : 10 King Juba Leuiticum, others more properly Elaniticum, of the Port and City Elana : which the Septuagint call Elath : Ptolomy, Elana : Pliny, Elana : and Marinus Niger, Aila : there is also Ilalab in Assyria, to which Salmanasser carried the Israclites captive, 2 King 8. 11. which Ilalab in Assyria the Septuagint call Eleea : and in the first of Chr. the 5. Aila. But as for this Red Sea on the parts thereof, thus diversly named, the Moors and Arabians (Vassals to the Turk) know it by no other appellation, than the Gulf of Mecca, after the name of Mahomet's Town Mecca. The Greeks write it the Sea Erythraeus, of a King called Erythras, or Erythraeus : and because Erythros in the Greek signifieth Red : hence it is, that being denominated of this Erythraeus, the son of Perseus and Andromeda, yet it took the name of the Red Sea, as Quintus Curtius conjectureth : which Arianus and 10 Strabo confirm. But it seemeth to me by the view of a Discovery of that Sea in the year 1544. performed by Stephen Gama, Viceroy of the East India for the King of Portugall, that this Sea was so called from a reflection of rednesse, both from the banks, cliffs, and sands of many Islands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For I finde by the report of Castro, a principall Commander under Gama (which discourse I gave Master Richard Hakluyt to publish) that there is an Island called Dalagus, sometime Legues, containing in length 25. Leagues, and 12. in breadth ; the earth, sands, and cliffs, of which Island, being of a reddish colour, serve for a foile to the waters about it : and make it seem altogether of the same colour. Secondly, the same Castro reporteth, that from 24. degrees of Septentrionall Latitude, to 27. (which make in length of Coast 180. miles, lying as it doth Northerly and Southerly) all the cliffs and banks are of red earth or stone, which by reflection of the Sun-beams, give a kind of reddish lustre to the waters. Thirdly, those Portugals report, and we know it by many testimonies, that there are found in the bottom of this Sea towards the shore, great abundance of red stones, on which the greatest store of Corall grows, which is carried into most parts of Europe, and elsewhere. There are also on the Islands of this Sea many red Trees, saith Strabo, and those growing under water may also be a cause of such a colour. Of these appearances of rednesse by the shadows of these stones, sands, earth, and cliffs, I suppose that it first took the name of the Red Sea, because in so many places it seemeth to be such : which Johannes Barros in his second Decade, eighth Book and first Chapter, confirmeth.

40 The breadth of this Sea from Elana, or Exion-Gaber adjoining, now Toro, called by the ancient Cosmographers, Simus Elaniticus, which walleth the banks of Madian or Adrian, is for 16 or 17. Leagues together, along Northward towards Sues, some 3. Leagues, or nine English miles over, and from this Port of Toro to Sues, and the end of this Sea, it is in length about 28. Leagues, of which the first 26. have nine miles breadth, as aforesaid, and afterward the lands both from Egypt and Arabia, thrust themselves into the Sea, and strengthen it so fast, as for six miles together it is not above three miles over ; from thence upward the land on Egypt side, falleth away, and makes a kind of Bay or Cove for some ten miles together, after which the land grows upon the Sea again, and so binds it into the very end thereof, at four miles breadth, or thereabout, in which so that it was that Moses past it over, though others would have it to be over-against Elana or Toro, but without judgement : for from Ramaser to Pibacheroth and Baalzephon, there is not above 30. miles interjacent, or 35. miles at most, which Moses past over in three daies : and between the land of Egypt, opposite to Elana or Toro, the distance is above 80. miles. For Ramaser, to which City Moses came (being the Metropolis of Gosen) when he left Pharaoh at Zaan, and took his last leave, standeth in 30. degrees five minutes of Septentrionall Latitude ; and Atigdol, or the Valley of Pibacheroth, at the foot of the Mountain Climax, or Baalzephon, in nine and twenty and a half, which make a difference of five and thirty English miles, the way lying in effect North and South.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not a low ebbe.

THe Egyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who in hatred of the Hebrewes have objected that Moses past over the Red Sea at a low ebbe, upon a great spring-tide, and that Pharaoh, conducted more by fury than discretion, pursued him so far, as before he could recover the coast of Egypt, he was over-taken by the flood, and therein perished; did not well consider the nature of this place with other circumstances. For, not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, to which makes it plaine, that the Waters were divided, and that God wrought this miracle by an Easterly winde, and by the hand and rod of Moses (which authority to men that beleeve not therein, perswadeth nothing) I say, that by the same naturall reason unto which they fastned themselves, it is made manifest, that had there been no other working power from above, or assistance given from God himself to Moses and the children of Israel, than ordinary and casuall, then could not Pharaoh and all his Army have perished in that pursuit.

For wheresoever there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulfe, or indraught, there doe the waters fall away from the Land, and runne downwards toward the Ocean, leaving all that part towards the Land as far as the Sea can ebbe, or fall off, to be dry Land. Now Moses entering the Sea at Migdol under Baalzephon (if he had taken the advantage and opportunity of the tide) must have left all that end of the Red Sea towards Suez, on his left hand dry and uncovered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the water ten or twelve miles farther into the Sea than Suez, and between it and where Moses past, who entered the same so far below it, and towards the body of the same Sea: it followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleeve or Strait, had bin by the ebbe of a spring-tide discovered, when Pharaoh found the flood increasing, he needed not to have returned by the same way toward Egypt side, but might have gone on in his return before the tide, on his right hand: and so taken ground again at the end of that Sea, at Suez it self, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures do truly witnesse the contrary, that is, That the Sea did not fall away from the Land, as naturally it doth, but that Moses past on between two Seas, and that the waters were divided. Otherwise Pharaoh by any returne of waters could not have perished, as he did: and therefore the effects of that great Armies destruction, prove the cause to have been a power above nature, and the miraculous worke of God himself. Again, those words of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to runne back by a strong East-wind, doe rather prove the miracle, then that thereby was caused an ebbe more than ordinary: for that Sea did not lye East and West, but, in effect, North and South. And it must have bene a West and North-west winde, that must have driven those waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-east into the Sea. But the East winde blew athwart the Sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell back towards the South and main body thereof, the other part remained towards Suez, and the North. Which being unknowne to Pharaoh: while he was cheekt by that Sea which used in all times before to ebbe away, the flood prest him and over-whelmed him. Thirdly, seeing Josephus avoweth, that Moses was not onely of excellent judgement generally, but also, so great a Captain, as he over-threw the Athiopians in battels, being employed by Pharaoh, and wan divers Cities seeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemn him of this grossenesse, and distraction: that rather than he would have endured the hardnesse of a Mountainous passage at hand (had not God commanded him to take that way, and foretold him of the honour which he would there win upon Pharaoh) he would have trusted to the advantage of an ebbing water. For he knew not the contrary, but that Pharaoh might have found him, and prest him, as well when it flowed as when it ebbed, as it seemeth he did. For the people, beholding Pharaohs approach, cried out against Moses, and despaired altogether of their safety: and when Moses prayed unto God for help, he was answered by God: Wherefore criest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward, and lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand upon the Sea, and divide it: which proves that there was not at the time of Pharaohs approach any ebbe at all; but that God did disperse and cut through the weight of waters, by a strong East-winde, whereby the Sands dis-discovered themselves between the sea on the left hand toward Suez, from whence the waters moved not, and the sea which was towards the South on the right hand, so that the waters were a wall unto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the waters so defended them on both sides, as the Egyptians could onely follow them in the same path, not that the waters stood upright as walls do, as some of the School-men have fancied. For had Pharaoh and the Egyptians perceived any such buildings in the sea, they would soon have quitted the chase and pursuit of Israel. Furthermore, there is no man of judgement that can think, that Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the observations of heavenly Motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes and refluxes of the sea, in his own Countre, on his own coast, and in his own most traded and frequented Ports and Havens; and wherein, his people having had so many hundreds of yeers experience of the tides, he could not be caught, as he was, through ignorance, nor by any foreknown or naturall accident, but by Gods powerfull hand onely; which then falleth most heavily on all men, when looking through no other spectacle but their own prosperity, they least discern it coming, and least fear it. Lastly, if the Army of the Egyptians had been overtaken by the ordinary return of the flood before they could recover their own coast; their bodies drowned would have been carried with the flood which runneth up to Suez, and to the end of that sea, and not have been cast ashore on that coast of Arabia where Moses landed, to wit, upon the sea-bank over against Baalzephon, on Arabia side: where it was that the Israelites saw their dead bodies, and not at the end of the Red Sea, to which place the ordinary flood would have carried them: Which flood doth not any where cross the Channel, and run athwart it, as it must have done from Egypt side to Arabia, to have cast the bodies there; but it keeps the naturall course towards the end of that sea: and to which their carcases should have been carried, if the work had not been supernaturall and miraculous. Apollonius in the lives of the Fathers affirmeth, that those of the Egyptians which stayed in the Countre, and did not follow Pharaoh in the pursuit of Israel, did ever after honour those Beasts, Birds, Plants, or other creatures, about which they were buied at the time of Pharaohs destruction: as he that was then labouring in his garden, made a god of that Plant or Root about which he was occupied: and so of the rest. But how those multitudes of gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall be given elsewhere. Orosius, in his first Book and tenth Chapter against the Pagans, tells us, that in his time, who lived some 400. yeers after Christ, the prints of Pharaohs Chariot wheels were to be seen at a low water on the Egyptian sands: and though they were sometime defaced by wind and weather, yet soon after they appeared again. But hereof I leave every man to his own belief.

Of the journeying of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was given them: with a discourse of Laws.

§. I.

A transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologie: with a continuance of the story, untill the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

BUt to go on with the story of Israel, in this sort I collect the times. Moses was born in the yeer of the World, 2434. Saphran then governing Assyria; Orthopolis, Sycionia or Peloponnesus; Crius, the Argives; Orus, Egypt; and Dencalion, Athens. He fled into Midian, when he had lived forty yeers, in the yeer of Isaac 14. the World, 2474. and two yeers after was Caleb born. He returned by the commandment and ordinance of God into Egypt, and wrought his miracles in the fields of Zaan, in the yeer 2514. the last moneth of that yeer. On the 14. day of the first first Hebrew moneth Abib, or the 15. of that moneth, beginning the day (as they) at Sun-setting, in the year of the World, 2514. was the celebration of the Passover: and in the dead of the night of the same day were all the first-born slain through Egypt, or in all those parts where the Hebrews inhabited not. The 15. day of the first moneth of the Hebrews called Abib, being about the beginning of the year of the World, 2514. Moses with the children of Israel removed from the generall Assembly at Ramefes, and marched to Succoth.

And departing thence, they made their third Station at Etham: and journeying from Etham, they encamped in the Valley of Pihacheroth, or Migdol, under the mountain Baal-zephon; and in the same night after midnight, they past the Red Sea: Pharaoh and his Army perishing in their return, about the first dawn of the day. Moses having recovered the banks of Arabia, gave thanks unto God, for the delivery of Israel: and making no stay on that coast, entred the Desarts of Arabia Petraea, called Sur. But finding no water in that passage, he incamped at Marah, in the Desert of Etham, which in Exod. 15. 22. is also called Sur, 25. miles from the Sea: where the children of Israel, preft with extreme thirst, murmured against Moses the second time; first, at Pharaoh's approach in Pihacheroth, and now in Arabia. But Moses taking the branches of a tree, growing near a Lake of bitter water, and casting the same thereinto, made the same sweet: a plain type and figure of our Saviours, who upon the tree of the Crofs changed the bitterness of everlasting death into the sweetness of eternall life. Plinie remembers these bitter Fountains in his sixth Book and 29. Chapter. From whence to Delta in Egypt, Scopius first, Darius after him, and lastly, Ptolemy the second, began to cut an artificiall river, thereby by boats and small shipping to trade and navigate the Red Sea, from the great Cities upon Nilus. From Marah he removed to Elim, the sixth Mansion, a march of eight miles: where finding twelve Fountains of sweet water, and three-score and ten Palm-trees, he rested divers days.

Whether this Helim were the name of a Town or City in Moses time, I cannot affirm. And yet the scarcity of waters in that Region was such, as Helim, which had twelve Fountains, could hardly be left unpeopled. William, Archbishop of Tyre, in his History of the Holy War, found at Helim the ruines of a great and ancient City. And at 30 such time as Balaam the first past that way into Egypt. Ingressus (saith he) Helim civitatem antiquissimam, populo Israelitico aliquando familiarem: ad quam cum pervenisset, loci illius incolae, Regis adventu praecognito, naviculam ingredientem, in mare vicinum se contulerunt; Entering Helim a very ancient City, well known Sometime to the people of Israel; whither when he came, the inhabitants, forewarned of the Kings approach, took boat, and shifted themselves into the sea lying near them. From Elim he returned again towards the South, and late down by the banks of the Red Sea: the seventh Mansion. For it seemeth that he had knowledge of Amalech, who repaired to resist his passage through that part of Arabia. And Moses, who had not as yet trained those of the Hebrews, appointed to bear arms: nor assured the mindes of the rest, who encountering with the least misery, were more apt to return to their quiet slavery, than either to endure the wants and perils which every where accompanied them in that passage, or at this time to undertake or sustain so dangerous an enemy: he therefore made stay at this Mansion until the fifteenth of this second moneth called Zim, or Jiar: and made the eighth Mansion in the Desert of Zim; where the children of Israel mutined against Moses the third time, having want of food. In the sixteenth Chapter of Exodus, Moses omitteth this retreat from Elim to the Red Sea, but in the collection of every severall incamping, in the 33. of Numbers, it is set down.

Here it pleased God to send fo many flights of Quails, as all the Countrie about their incamping was covered with them. The morning following it also rained Manna, being the sixteenth of their moneth, which served them in stead of bread. For now was the store consumed which the people carried with them out of Egypt. And though they had great numbers of cattell and sheep among them, yet it seemeth that they durst not feed themselves with many of those: but reserved them, both for the milk to relieve the children withall, and for breed to store themselves when they came to the Land promised.

From hence towards Raphidim they made two removes of twenty miles: the one to Daphca, the other to Alm, distant from Raphidim six miles. Here being again preft with want of water, they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Egypt, where they rather contented themselves to be fed and beaten after the manner of beasts, than to suffer a casual and sometime necessary want, and to undergo the hazzards and travells which every manly mind seeketh after, for the love of God, and their own freedoms. But Moses with the same rod which he divided the Sea withall, in the sight of the Elders of Israel brought waters out of the rock, wherewith the whole multitude were satisfied.

to

10

§. II.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, upon occasion of the battell with the Amalekites, and Jethro's coming: who being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

And while Moses incamped in this place, the Amalekites, who had knowledge of his approach, and ghesied that he meant to lead the children of Israel through their Countrie (which being barren of it selfe, would be utterly wasted by so great a multitude of people and cattell) thought it most for their advantage to set upon them at Raphidim: where the want of water, and all other things needfull for the life of man, infected them. On the other side, Moses perceiving their resolutions, gave charge to 10 Jehosua to draw out a sufficient number of the ablest Hebrews, to encounter Amalech. Between whom and Israel the victory remained doubtful, for the most part of the day: the Hebrews and Amalekites contending with equall hopes and repulses for many hours. And had not the strength of Moses prayers to God been of far greater force, and more prevalent, than all resistance and attempt made by the bodies of men; that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly endangered the whole enterprife. For those bodies which are unacquainted with scarcity of food, and those mindes whom a servile education hath dulled, being beaten, and despaird in their first attempts, will hardly, or never be brought again to hazzard themselves.

After this victory, Jethro repaired to Moses, bringing with him Moses his wife, and his two sons, which either Jethro forbore to conduct, or Moses to receive, till he had by this overthrow of Amalech the better assured himself of that part of Arabia. For it is written in Exod. 18. 1. When Jethro the Priest of Madian, Moses father in law, heard all that God had done for Moses, &c. of which, the last deed, to wit, the overthrow of Amalech, gave Jethro courage and assurance, he then repaired to his son in law Moses, at Sinai; where amongst other things, he advised Moses to appoint Judges and other Officers over Israel: being himself unable to give order in all causes and controversies, among so many thousands of people, full of discontentment and private controversy.

This Jethro, although he dwelt amongst the Madianites, yet he was by nation a Kenite, 40 as in the fourth of Judges, ver. 11. & 17. it is manifest: where it is written, Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, to wit, the son of Jethro, the father in law of Moses, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his tents untill the Plain of Zaanaim, which is by Kedesb. Likewise in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, lest he should destroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountains of Sin Kadesb: and the Amalekites dwelt in the Plains, according to the saying of Balaam, speaking of the Kenites: Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou hast put thy nest in the rock. And that Saul spared this Nation, he giveth 50 for cause, that they shewed mercy to all the children of Israel, when they came up from Egypt. For these Kenites were a Nation of the Madianites, and the Madianites were of the issues of Madian, one of the six sons which Abraham begat on Kethura: and might also take that name of Kenites from Kethura, of whom they descended by the mother, who (as it seemeth) kept the knowledge of the true God among them, which they received from their parent Abraham. For Moses, when he fled out of Egypt into Madian, and married the daughter of Jethro, would not (had he found them idolaters) have made Jethro's daughter the mother of his children. And although the Kenites are named amongst those Nations, which God promised, that the seed of Abraham should root out, and inherit their lands; yet it cannot be meant by these, who are descended from Abraham himself: but by some other Nation, bearing the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chus. For in the fifteenth of Genesis, ver. 19. these Kenites or Chusites are lifted with the Hittites and Perizzites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergesites, and Jebusites, which were indeed afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites descended from Abraham, had separated themselves from among the rest, which were altogether idolatrous. For, as it is before remembred, Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites; that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh or Cadesh. Again, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abraham's other sons were born; which he did (referring my selfe to better judgement) rather, because they were more ancient, than by anticipation.

And as of the Kenites, so we may consider of the Madianites, parted by Moses into five Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and heathens; as those of Madian by the river Zared, afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Madianites near the banks of the Red Sea, where Moses married his wife Zippora, and with whom he left her and his children, till after the overthrow of Amalech, seem likewise not to have been corrupted. For these Madianites with the Kenites assisted Israel, and guided them in the Desarts. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petra, were by Israel rooted out, when those adjoining to the Red Sea were not touched.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Madian, of whom Jethro was Priest, and the other Cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrary is more probable. For Moses would not have sent 12000. Israelites as far back as the Red Sea, from the Plains of Moab, to have destroyed that Madian, where his wives kinsred inhabited; seeing himself coming with 600000. able men, was encountered by Amalech in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Desarts, wherein himself and Israel had wandred 40. years.

That Jethro or Jothor, Raguel or Reuel, and Hobab, were but one person, the Scriptures teach us. For the Vulgar and Septuagint, which call him Raguel, and our English, Reuel, Exod. 2. 18. calls him Jethro, or Jothor, Exod. 3. 1. & 4. 18. & 18. 1. & 6. 9, 10, 12. and in Num. 10. 29. Hobab. Others take Jethro and Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was given; with divers commendations of the invention of Laws.

The rest of the moneths of this year 2515. were spent in the Desart of Sinai, near the mountain of Sinai or Horeb, the twelfth Manzion. Eusebius thought that Sinai and Horeb were distinct mountains: Hierome, to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many Scriptures. For, in Exodus 3. 1. it is called Horeb; and in Exodus 24. 19. it is written Sinai. In the 106. Psalm, ver. 19. Horeb: in Exod. 19. 11. Sinai. And so it is called, Galatians 4. 24. And again, Deut. 4. 10. and 15. and Deut. 5. 2. Horeb. And so it is in the first of Kim. 8. 6. and the second of Chron. 5. 10. and in *Mala-*chie 4. 4. Finally, in Ecclesiasticus 48. 7. they are named as one. Which bearded (saith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the judgement of the vengeance. Somewhat they are dis-joyned at the top by the report of Peter Belonius; who in the year 1588. past out of Egypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de Fumet of France, and travelled to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by far the higher hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there falleth a very fair Spring of water into the Valley adjoining: where he found two Monasteries of Christian Maronites, containing some hundred Religious persons of divers Nations, who had pleasant gardens, delicate fruits, and excellent wine. These (saith the same Author) give entertainment to all strangers, which passe that way.

Now that there was some such Torrent of water near Sinai in Moses time, it is very probable: First, because he camped thereabout almost a yeer, and drew no water, as in other places, by miracle: Secondly, because it is written, Exod. 32. 20. that when Moses had broken the golden Calf to powder, which Aaron set up in his absence, he cast the powder thereof into the water, and made the children of Israel to drink thereof.

On this mountain, the Law by the Angel of God was given to Moses, where he stayed stayed a whole yeer, wanting some ten or twelve daies: for he removed not till the 20. day of the second moneth of the second yeer; and he arrived about the 45. day after the egression: the Law being given the 50. day.

At this Manzion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29. Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that booke; all in Leviticus; and all in Numbers, to the 10. Chapter. Whereof (because there is no story nor other passage) I will omit the repetition, and in place thereof speake somewhat of the Law, and the Kindes and use thereof; whereby, if the Reader finde the story any way dis-joyned, he may turne over a few leaves, and omitting this, finde the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, levell, and square of Laws: so it pleased God to give thereby unto Moses the powerfulllest man (his miraculous grace excepted) to govern that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conquest. For as the North star is the most fixed directour of the Seaman to his desired Port: so is the Law of God the guide and conductor of all in generall, to the haven of eternall life: the Law of nature, from God his eternall law deduced, the rule of all his creatures: the Law humane, depending on both these, the guard of Kings, Magistrates, and vertuous men; yea, the very spirit, and the very finew of every Estate in the world, by which they live and move: the Law, to wit, a just law, without passion; as an Heart without affection, to an Eye without lust, and to a Minde without passion; a Treasurer, which keepeth for every man what he hath, and distributeth to every man what he ought to have. This benefit the Ancient, though barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those which were taken for the first makers of Laws, were honoured as gods, or as the sons of gods: and the rest, that made either additions or corrections, were commended to all posterity for men of no lesse vertue, and no lesse liberally beneficiall to their Countries, than the greatest and most prosperous Conquerours that ever governed them. The Israelites, the Lacedemonians, and the Athenians, received their Laws from one: as the Israelites, from Moses; the Lacedemonians, from Lycurgus; the Athenians, from Solan; the Romans, sometime from their first Kings, from their Decem viri, from their Senatours, from their Lawyers, and from the people themselves: other from the Prince, Nobility, and People; as in England, France, and in other Christian Monarchies and Estates.

§. IV.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law, and Right.

The word Lex, or Law, is not alwaies taken alike, but is diversly, and in an indifferent sense used. For if we consider it at large, it may be understood for any rule prescribing a necessary mean, order, and method, for the attaining of an end. And so the rules of Grammar, or other Arts, are called Laws. Or it is taken for any private ordinance of Superiours or Inferiours: for the commandments of Tyrants, which they cause to be observed by force, for their Decrees do also usurp that Title, according to the generall acceptation of the word Law: of which Esay, Woe unto them that Esay 10. decree wicked decrees, and write grievous things. Likewise, the word is used for the tumultuary resolutions of the people. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call Laws, though evill and insufficient: Mala lex est, quæ tumultuaria posita est; It is an evill law that is made tumultuously. So as all ordinances, either good or evil, are called by the name of Laws.

The word Law is also taken for the morall habit of our mind, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to it self, as to their pattern and plat-form. And thus the law of the flesh, which the Divines call legem fomitis, is to be understood. For every law is a kind of pattern of that which is done according unto it: in which sense, as elsewhere, this morall habit or disposition of the heart is called the frame or figmentum of the heart: so in S. Paul to the Romans it is called a Law: But I see another law in my members, rebelling against the Law of my minde, and leading me captive unto the law of sin. Again, the nature and inclinations of all creatures are sometime called (a) laws, so far as they agree with the reason of the law eternall; as the law of a Lion, to be fierce or valiant.

Also

Also private contracts among Merchants and other Trades-men, do often put on the name of laws. But law commonly and properly, is taken for a right rule, prescribing a necessary mean, for the good of a Common-wealth, or Civill Communitie. The rest, to wit, the commandments of Tyrants, &c. which have not the common good for their end, but being leges iniquæ, are by Thomas called violentiæ magis quàm leges; rather compulsions than laws: And whatsoever is not just, S. Augustine doth not allow for laws, howsoever established: for he calls them iniqua hominum constituta, quæ nec jura dicenda, nec putanda sunt; the unjust constitutions of men, which are neither to be termed nor thought of as laws. For, saith Aristotle, Legalia jura sunt factiva, & conservativa felicitatis; just laws are the workers and preservers of happiness: because by them we are directed ad vitam to quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero: Yea, to life everlasting, according to the Scriptures. For the end of the Law, saith Plato, is God and his worship: Finis legis Deus & cultus ejus. Lex, or the Law, is so called by the Latines, à legendo, or à ligando, of reading, or binding: Leges quia lædè & ad populum lædè, saith Varro; For after Laws were written and published, all men might read them, and behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Etymology, à ligando, is no lesse agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called also a yoke, and a band: as confringunt jugum, diruperunt vincula: they have broken the yoke, they have broken the bands. And in the second Psalm, Dirumpamus vincula eorum, & projiciamus à nobis funes ipsorum; Let us break their bands in sunder, and cast away their cords from us.

The Covenant it is called, because of the conditionall promises of God; and because of Gods peoples voluntary submission of themselves unto it: for which word the Septuagint, and the Epistle to the Hebrews, use the word διαθήκη, a Testament, or last Will: which name it hath, because it is not other wise effectual for our salvation, but in respect of the death of the Testator; for without the death of the Testator, the Testament is of no force, as Heb. 9. 17. it is said, Testamentum in mortuis ratum est.

The Hebrews call the law Thorah, of teaching, because every man is thereby taught his duty, both to God and Men. The Greeks call it Nómos, of distributing, because it distributeth to every man his own due; the power of the law is the power of God: Justice being an attribute proper unto God himself. Imperium legis, imperium Dei est; 30 The reign of the law, is the reign of God.

Law in general is thus defined by the Philosophers: Lex est vitæ regula, præcipiens quæ sunt sequenda, & quæ fugienda; Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow, and what to shun: or Lex est omnium divinarum & humanarum rerum Regina; Law is the Queen or Princeesse of things both humane and divine. But this description is grounded upon the opinion of inevitable fate. Law is the very wisdom of Nature: the reason and understanding of the prudent: and the rule of right and wrong. For as a right line is called, Index sui & curvis, the demonstration of it self, and of the crooked: so is the law, the judge and measure of right and wrong.

M. Hooker calls the Law a directive rule to goodnesse of operation: and though law, 40 as touching the substance and essence, consist in understanding: Concludit tamen aliquid voluntatis; Yet it comprehends the act of our will. The word jus is also diversly taken, as sometime for the matter of the law, and for common right: sometime for the law it self as jus civile, or jus gentium. Aristotle distinguisheth the two generall words, jus and fas: whereof jus, saith he, hath reference to men, Fas to God. Fas lex divina, jus lex humana. To go over another mans field, is permitted by Gods law, not by mans; and therefore in a thing out of controversy, Virgil used both these words: as, Fas & jura sinunt, God and men permit.

The word jus, or Right, is derived or taken from the old substantive Noun jussus, a bidding or commandment: or perhaps from the Greek ζωω, which is the name of jupiter, or of the Latine genitive case Jovis; because, as the Scripture speaks, the judgement is Gods. For as it is certain that jus-jurandum came of Jovis-jurandum, (for so we finde it written in Nomus out of the ancient, in which sense the Scripture calls it juramentum Jehove) so also we may say, that jus came of Jovis, quia Jovis est: because as God is the Author and Pattern, and Maintainer of right, so also in his Vicegerents, the Magistrates, he is the Pronouncer and Executor of right. Of this jus the just are denominated, jus est à jure, and justitia à justo; The right gives name to the righteous; and justice takes her name from the just.

§. V.

Of the definition of Laws, and of the Law eternall.

BUT because laws are manifold, and that every kind hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, first to divide and distinguish them. I mean those sorts of laws, from whence all other particulars are drawn: leaving the individuals of humane laws to their infinite and horrible confusion.

The law eternall is thus defined by Thomas. Lex eterna est æternus divina sapientie conceptus, secundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipso præcognitarum; The eternall law is the eternall conceit of Gods wisdom as it is referred to the government of things foreknown by himself. Or, Lex eterna est summa atque æterna ratio divine sapientie: quatenus res omnes ad definitos fines ita dirigit, ut illis juxta actionem ipsarum modum aliquem necessitate asserat; It is the high and eternall reason of divine sapience: as it directeth all things in such sort to their proper ends, imposing a kind of necessity, according to their severall natures, or conditions. Now the difference lieth in this: That as the same divine understanding directeth all these to their proper ends; so it is called providence: but as it imposeth a necessity according to the nature of all things which it directeth, so it is called a law.

Of this eternall law Cicero took knowledge, when in his book of Laws, he wrote in this manner: Erat ratio perfecta, rerum natura, & ad rectè faciendum impellens & à dilecto avocans: quæ non tum incipit lex esse cum scripta est, sed tum cum orta est. Orta autem fuit cum mente divina: quamobrem lex vera atque princeps, apta adjubendum & ad vetandum, ratio est rectæ summi Jovis; That perfect reason and nature of things, encouraging or impelling to rightfull actions, and calling us back from evill, did not (saith he) then begin to be a law when it was written, but when it had being. Being and beginning it had together with divine understanding, and therefore a true law, and a fit Princeesse to command and forbid, is the right reason of the most high God. This eternall law (if we consider it in God, or as God) is always one and the same; the nature of God being most simple: but as it is referred to divers objects, so the reason of man finds it divers and manifold. It also seemeth one law in respect of things necessary, as the motions of the heavens, stability of the earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwise to things contingent: another law to men, another to other creatures, having life, and to all those that be inanimate.

By this eternall law all things are directed, as by the counsell and providence of God: from this Law all laws are derived, as from the rule universall: and thereto referred, as the operation of the second to the first.

The eternall, and the divine law, differ onely in consideration; the eternall directing more largely: as well every creature, to their proper and naturall ends, as it doth man to his supernaturall: but the divine law to a supernaturall end onely: the naturall law is thence derived, but an effect of the eternall: as it were a stream from the fountain.

The Law humane or temporall is also thence drawn: in that it hath the form of right reason: from wh ch if it differ, it is then impositio iniqua, a wicked imposition: and onely borroweth the name of a law.

To this eternall law all things are subjected, as well Angels and Men, as all other creatures, creatures, or things created; whether necessary or contingent, naturall or morall, and humane. For the Law eternall runneth through all the universall, and therefore it is the law also of things which are simple, naturall and inanimate.

Psal. 148.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creator and Directour: as Praise him all ye his Angels: praise him Sun and Moon, all bright Stars: beavers of heavens, for he hath established them for ever and ever. He hath made an ordinance which shall not passe: Praise ye the Lord from the earth ye Dragons and all Deeps: Fire and haile, snow and vapours, stormy winds, which execute his word: mountains and hills, fruitfull trees and all Cedars: Beasts, and all Cattel, &c. Now as the reasonable creatures are by this eternall law bound, by the glory and felicity proposed unto them (beatitude being both the attractive, and the end) so all other naturall things and creatures, have in themselves, and in their own natures, an obedience formall to it, without any proper intention, known cause, or end proposed. For beasts are led by sense, and naturall instinct: things without life by their created form, or formall appetites, as that which is heave to fall downward: things light to mount upward, &c. and fire to heat whatsoever is opposed. This kinde of working, the Aristotelians ascribe to common nature; others to fate; a difference used in terms only; it being no other than Gods generall providence: for as it is truly said of God, that he is omnia super omnia: so are all things which appear in themselves thence derived: there-under subjected: thence-from by his eternall law and providence directed, even from the greatest to the least of his creatures, 20 in heaven and in earth.

The Schoolmen are very curious and ample in the consideration of these laws: and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and object of the eternall law. But as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who have thence-from, either reason, sense, vegetation, or appetite, to conduct them: so is the object and matter of the law, the whole creature. For according to S. Augustine, Lex eterna est, qua iustum est, ut omnia sint ordinatissima; The law eternall is that, whereby it is just, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order.

John 18. 30. Psal. 69. 22.

Lastly, it is disputed, whether the eternall law be immutable, yea or no? But the resolution is, that it changeth not; for which S. Augustine useth a sufficient argument in 30 his first Book of Free-will, the sixth Chapter. For the law of Moses which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last untill the time of the Pædagogic of Gods people, or introduction to Christ should be expired; which time of expiration some think our Saviour noted to become, when on the Crosse he said, Consummatum est. But I rather think these words of our Saviour to have no other signification, than that now the prophetic of their giving him Vinegar to drink was fulfilled. For so Saint John expounds it, when he saith v. 28. That Christ seeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, Ut consummaretur Scriptura, That the Scripture in this also might be fulfilled, said, I thirst: though I deny not, but at the same time also the date of the law was expired, to wit, of the law ceremoniall, and of so much of the judiciall, as appertained peculiarly to the Jews, and 40 agreeth not with the law of the new Testament and Gospel of Christ. For the immutable law of God, though prescribing things mutable, is not therefore changed in it self; but the things prescribed, change according to this eternall ordinance, of which the Wisdom of Solomon, and being one she can do all things, and remaining in her self reneweth all.

§. VI.

Of the Law of nature.

OF the law of Nature as it is taken in generall, I find no definition among the 50 School-men: only as it is considered in man, it is called the impression of divine light, and a participation of the eternall law in the reasonable creature. Lex naturalis est impressio divini luminis in nobis, & participatio legis eternæ in rationali creatura. Olibian defines the naturall law to be the same which nature hath taught all living creatures: Jus naturale est quod Natura omnia animalia docuit: and he afterward addeth, Jus istud non humani generis proprium, sed omnium animalium quæ terra marique nascuntur, omnium quoque commune est; The law of nature is not proper to man alone, but the same is common to all living creatures, as well to birds, as to those which the Land and Sea produce. But

Aug. in Ep. ad Hil. 85. in Evang. Joh. tract. 49. Ut de iustitia & iure. l. 1. tit. 1.

But this definition is not generall, but of the naturall Law in things of life.

The Law of nature in generall, I take to be that disposition, instinct, and formall quality, which God in his eternall providence hath given and imprinted in the nature of every creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is divinum lumen in men, enlightning our formall reason; so is it more than sense in Beasts; and more than vegetation in plants. For it is not sense alone in Beasts, which teacheth them at first sight, and without experience or instruction, to flee from the enemies of their lives: seeing that Bulls and Horses appear unto the sense more fearful and terrible, than the least kind of dogs; and yet the Hare and Deer feedeth by the one, and flieth from the other, yea, though 10 by them never seen before, and that as soon as they fall from their Dams. Neither is it sense which hath taught other Beasts to provide for winter, Birds to build their nests, high or low, according to the tempestuous or quiet seasons: or the Birds of India, to make their nests on the smallest twigs which hang over Rivers, and not on any other part of the tree, or elsewhere: to save their eggs and young ones from the Monkeys, and other Beasts, whose weight such a twig will not bear: and which would fear to fall into the water. The instances in this kinde are exceeding many which may be given. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of plants, that some trees, as the female of the Palmitto, will not bear any fruit except the male grow in sight. But this they do by that Law, which the infinite and unsearchable wisdom of God had in all 20 eternity provided for them, and for every nature created. In man this Law is double, corrupt, and incorrupt: corrupt, where the reason of man hath made it self subject, and a Vassall to passions, and affections brutall: and incorrupt, where time and custome hath bred in men a new nature, which also, as is aforesaid, is a kinde of Law. For it was not by the Law of Nature incorrupt, which S. Augustine calleth the law of reason, but by a nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did anciently allow of theft: and that other Nations were by Law constrained to become Idolaters; and that by the Laws of Lycurgus it was permitted to men to use one anothers wife, and to the women, to chooſe 30 them others besides their husbands, to beget them with child: which law in those parts hath lasted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

Seyr. 6. §. 4. cap. 1. loco. ad Rom. 7. 23.

Theod. 1. 9. de curandis affect. Græcorum.

Acqſa.

The Scythians, and the people of both Indies, hold it lawfull to bury with them the best beloved wives: as also they have many other customs remembered by G. Valentia, against nature and right reason.

And I know not from what authority it is, that these Laws some men avow to be naturall: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guile with guile: to become faithlesse among the faithlesse: to provide for our selves by another mans destruction: that injury is not done to him that is willing: to destroy those whom we fear, and the like. For taking the definition of naturall laws, either out of S. Augustine, 40 Quinias, (the one calling it the impression of divine light; the other, the discate, or sentence of præcique reason) the same can reach us, or incline us to no other thing, than to the exercise of Justice and uprightnesse: and not to offer or perform any thing toward others, save that which we would be content should be offered or performed toward our selves. For such is the Law of nature to the minde, as the eye is to the body; and that which, according to David, sheweth us good, that is, the observation of those 50 things which lead us thereby to our last end; which is eternall life; though of themselves not sufficient without faith and grace.

Now, that which is truly and properly the law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the law, is, as aforesaid, the impression of Gods divine light in men, & a participation of the law increased and eternal. For without any law written, the right reason and understanding, which God hath given us, are abilities within our selves, sufficient 50 to give us knowledge of the good and evill, which by our gratitude to God and distribution of right to men, or by the contrary, we prepare and purchase for our selves. For when the Gentiles (saith S. Paul) which have not the law, do by nature those things contained in the law: they having not the law, are a law unto themselves. Now, to love God, by whom we are, and to do the same right unto all men, which we desire should be done unto us, is an effect of the purest reason: in whose highest Turrets, the quiet of conscience hath made her resting place, and habitation; In ære altissima rationis quies habitat. Therefore the Gentiles (saith S. Paul) which shew the effects of the law written in their hearts, have their consciences for a witness of those effects: And the reprobate their thoughts to accuse theirs. 60 And

Rom. 2. 14.

Rom. 2. 11.

And it is most true, that whoſoever is not a law unto himſelf (while he hopeth to abuſe the world by the advantage of hypocriſie) worketh nothing elſe, but the betraying of his own ſoule, by crafty unrightcouſneſſe, purchaſing eternall perdition. For it helpeth us not to hide our corrupt hearts from the worlds eye, ſeeing from him, who is an infinite eye, we cannot hide them: ſome Garlands we may gather in this May-game of the world, Sed ſiſ ille, dum loquimur, areſcit; thoſe flowers wither, while we diſcuſſe of their colours, or are in gathering them. That we ſhould therefore inhabit and dwell within our ſelves, and become fearful witnesses of our ſecretſt evils, did that reverend Philoſopher Pythagoras teach in this golden precept: Nil turpe committas, neque coram aliis, neque tecum; maxime omnium vere reſpice; Commit nothing ſoul or diſhoneſt, ſaith he, neither to be known to others, nor to thine own heart: but above all, men reverence thine own conſcience. And this may be a precept of nature and right reaſon: by which law, men, and all creatures, and bodies are inclined to thoſe operations, which are answerable to their own form; as fire to give heat. Now, as the reaſonable minde is the form of man, ſo is he aptly moved to thoſe things which his proper form preſenteth unto him: to wit, to that which right reaſon offeth; and the acts of right reaſon, are the acts of vertue: and in the breach of the rules of this reaſon, is man leaſt excuſable: as being a reaſonable creature. For all elſe, both ſenſitive, growing, and inanimate, obey the law which God impoſed on them at their firſt creation.

Gen. 1.

Job c. 28.

The Earth performeth her office, according to the law of God in nature: for it bringeth forth the bud of the herb which ſeedeth ſeed, &c. and the beaſt, which liveth thereon. He gave a law to the Seas, and commanded them to keep their bounds: which they obey. He made a decree for the rain, and a way for the lightning of the thunders. He cauſed the Sun to move, and to give light, and to ſerve for ſignes and for ſeaſons. Were theſe as rebellious as man, for whoſe ſake they were created, or did they once break the law of their natures and forms; the whole world would then periſh, and all return to the firſt Chaoſ, darkneſſe, and conſuſion.

By this naturall law, or law of humane reaſon, did Cain perceive his own wickedneſſe and offence, in the murder of Abel: for he not onely feared the diſpleaſure of God, but the revenge of men: it being written in his reaſon, that whatſoever he performed towards others, the ſame by others might be done unto him again. And that this judgement of well and evil doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternall Law, before the law written, Moſes in the perſon of God, witnesseth, Gen. 4. If thou doe well, ſhalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doe not well, ſin lieth at thy doore.

The Schoolmen are large alſo in this queſtion of the naturall law: the ſame being opened amply by Reinerius, Antonius, and Valentia. But it is not my purpoſe to write a Volume of this ſubject.

But this law which Thomas Aquinas calleth an act of reaſon taken properly; and not a habit, as it is an evident naturall judgement of practick reaſon: they divide into indemonſtrable, or needing no demonſtration (as that good is to be followed, and evil eſchewed) and demonſtrable, which is evidently proved out of higher and more univerſall propoſitions. Again, as it answereth the naturall appetite, preſcribing things to be deſired as good, or to be avoided as evil (as of the firſt, to deſire to live, and to ſatiſſie hunger, &c. and of the ſecond, to eſchew pains, ſorrow, and death) in this conſideration they divide it, according to the divers kindes of appetites that are in us. For in every man there are three ſorts of appetites, which answer the three degrees of naturall law. The firſt is, to be that which we are; in which is comprehended the deſire, both to live, and to preſerve our being and life, alſo the deſire of iſſue, with care to provide for them: for the Father after his death, lives in his children; and therefore the deſire of life comprehends the deſire of children. And to theſe appetites are referred the firſt indemonſtrable lawes of nature, for the moſt part. For it needs no proof, that all creatures ſhould deſire to be, to live, and to be defended, and to live in their iſſue, when they cannot in themſelves. And as man is a being, Ens or Reſo: he doth deſire good, and ſhun evil. For it is common to all things, to deſire things agreeable to their owne natures, which is, to deſire their owne good. And ſo is good defined by Ariſtotele, to be that which all deſire. Which definition Baſil upon the 44. Pſalme approveth: Reſpo quidem bonum deſiderant, quod omnia expetunt; Rightly have ſome men defined good, or goodneſſe, to be that which all things deſire.

Epic. l. c. c.

The

The ſecond kinde of appetite is of thoſe things which appertain to us, as we have ſenſe. Whence, by the law of Nature, we deſire the delights of every ſenſe; but with ſuch moderation, as may neither glut us with ſatiety, nor hurt us with exceſſe. For as Senſe it ſelf is for the preſervation of life and being: ſo it is meet, even by the law of Nature, that the ſenſitive appetite ſhould not carry us to the deſtruction, either of our life or being. And although (ſeeing both theſe kindes of appetites are in beaſts) we may well ſay, that Nature hath given divers laws unto them: In which ſenſe the Croſſians define Naturall right, or jus naturale, to be the ſame which Nature hath taught all living creatures: Yet the Schoolmen admit not, that the inſtincts of beaſts can be properly called a law, but onely a jus, or Right, which is the matter, and aime of every law. For ſo they diſtinguiſh it; where Ulpian affirmeth, that jus naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all living creatures. In this place (ſaith Valentia) jus is not to be taken for a law, but for the matter of the law. And yet where Ulpian alſo diſtinguiſheth the right belonging to living creatures in general, from the right belonging to men; calling the one jus naturale, the other jus gentium: the Divines underſtand the law of Nature more largely, that is, for all evident dictates, precepts, or biddings of divine reaſon, both in beaſts and men; and reſtrain the law of Nations to a kind of humane right.

The third appetite is of thoſe things which appertain properly to man, as he is a living creature reaſonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our ſelves: and the laws of this appetite are the commandments of our Religion.

Now although there are many other branches and diviſions of this law of Nature answering the diviſion of matter, which it preſcribeth, and as manifold, as the morall actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeth; yet is the law of Nature but one law, according to Aquinas: firſt, becauſe it hath one fountain or root in the naturall or motive facultie, which is but one, (ſtirring up to good, and declining the contrary: ſecondly, becauſe all is contained in that generall naturall precept, That good is to be followed, and ill avoided: and thirdly, becauſe all the parts are reduced to one and the ſame laſt end.

That this law of Nature bindeth all creatures, it is maniſeſt: and chiefly man; becauſe he is indued with reaſon: in whom as reaſon groweth, ſo this band of obſerving the law of Nature increaſeth; Postquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tunc fit quod scriptum est, Baſil. Adveniente mandato, peccatum revocatur; When reaſon grew to perfection, then it came to paſſe, which was written by S. Paul, When the commandment came, ſin revolved. Neither is it a ſmall warrant for this law of Nature, when thoſe which break the ſame, are ſaid by S. Paul, To be delivered over into a reprobate ſenſe (or minde) to do thoſe things which are not convenient: And again, that their conſciences bear witneſſe, and their thoughts accuſe them. Rom. 2. 15. For, though this law of Nature ſtretch not to every particular; as to command faſting, and the like: yet it commandeth in general all good, and whatſoever is agreeable to right and reaſon. And therefore, ſaid Damaſcene; Homines facti ſunt mali, declinando in id quod contra naturam eſt; Men (ſaith he) are made evil, by declining unto that which is contrary to nature: And S. Auguſtine, Omne vitium natura nocet, ac per hoc contra naturam eſt; Every vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrary unto it. L. 2. Fid. m. 10.

Neither yet are the rules of this law of Nature ſo ſtraight, but that they ſuffer exceptions in ſome particulars. For whereas by this law all men are born Lords of the earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of portions, according to unequal merit: by taking from the evil, and giving to the good; and by permitting and commanding that all men ſhall enjoy the fruits of their labours to themſelves: according to the rules of juſtice and equity.

And though the law of Nature command, that all things be reſtored which are left ſo in truſt, yet in ſome cauſes, this her law the ſuffereth to be broken: as to deny a mad man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while he was ſober. But the univerſall principles can no more be changed, then the decrees of God are alterable: who, according to S. Paul, abideth faithfull, and cannot deny himſelf. 2 Tim. 2.

§. VII.

Of the written Law of GOD

Ang. de Civit.
Dei, lib. 1.

After the eternall, and naturall, the law Positive or imposed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather explication of the former, hath two kinds: Divine and Humane. Again, the divine positive law is double; the Old and New: The Old was given unto Moses in Mount Sinai or Horeb, at such time as the world had stood 2513. whole years; and in the 67. day of this year, when as Ascalades or Afcades governed the Assyrians, Adarathus the Sycionians, Triopus the Argives, Cecrops 10 Attica, and Acheres Egypt: to wit, after the promise to Abraham, 430. years. And this it seems, was the first written law which the world received. For the very word Nomes, signifying a law, was not then, nor long after invented by the Grecians; no not in Homer's time, who lived after the fall of Troy 80. years at least: and Troy it self was cast downe 335. years, after Moses led Israel out of Egypt. This law, it pleased God to engrave in stone, that it might remaine a lasting work of his exprest will in the Church: and that the Priests and people might have whereof to meditate, till the coming of Christ: and that so these Children of Israel, though bred among an Idolatrous people in Egypt, might be without excuse, the slight defences of ignorance being taken from them.

The reason known to us why this law was not written before, is, that when the people 10 were few, and their lives long, the Elders of Families might easily, without any written law, instruct their own Children: and yet as they increased, so doubtlesse they had, besides the law of Nature, many precepts from God, before the law written. But now at length, forasmuch as the law of Nature did not define all kinds of good, and evil; nor condemn every sin in particular: nor sufficiently terrifie the consciences of offenders: nor so expound divine worship, as for those after ages was required, who gave every day less authority than other to the naturall law; in these respects it was necessary, that the law should be written, and set before the eyes of all men: which before, they might, but would not, read in their own consciences. The Schoolmen, and the Fathers before them, enlarge the causes and necessity, why the law was written; whereof these are the chiefest. 30

The first, for restraining of sin, directly grounded upon this place of David, The law of the Lord is undefiled, converting souls: The testimonies of the Lord are faithfulfull, giving wisdom to children. For the humane law, saith Saint Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessary, and hinder common profit: but the divine law written, forbiddeth every evil, and therefore by David it is called undefiled.

Secondly, it serveth for the direction of our mindes. For the Lawes of men can only take knowledge of outward actions, but not of internall motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that we be no lesse cleane in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words converting our souls, added by David: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists. Actiones hominum nulle sunt, nisi prius in mente discreverit: The actions of men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceived in the minde.

Thirdly, it leadeth us to the knowledge of truth, which by reason of diversitie of opinion, and difference of peculiar Lawes among sundrie Nations, we cannot be assured of: but the law of GOD bindeth all men, and is without error: and therefore also said David, That the testimony of the Law of God is faithful: giving Wisdom to children.

§. VIII.

Of the unwritten Law of God, given to the Patriarchs by Tradition.

NOW, that in all this long tract of time, between the creation and the written law, the world and people of God were left altogether to the law of reason & nature, it doth not appear. For the Patriarchs of the first age received many precepts from God himself, and whatsoever was first imposed by Adam, the same was observed by Seth, who instructed Enos: from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and Moses. Yea, many particular commandments afterward written, were formerly imposed and delivered over by tradition; which kinde of teaching the Jews after-ward ward called Cabala, or Receptio: precepts received from the mouth of their Priests and Elders: to which the Jews after the law written, added the interpretation of secret mysteries, reserved in the bosoms of their Priests, and unlawfull to be uttered to the people. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeed the divine law revealed to the Patriarchs, and from them delivered to the posterity, when as yet it was unwritten. The commandments which God gave unto Adam in the beginning, were, that he should impose names to all beasts, according to their natures; to whole perfection of understanding they were sufficiently known. For finding the reason of his own name Adam, or Adamah, Earth, or red clay, he gave other names significant, not 10 only to beasts, but to his children and nephews, which afterward his issues imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the Church, or rather, one given in recompence for Abel that was slain: and Enosh signifieth man, or miserable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the ground, and to live by the labour thereof: God also gave him the choice of all fruits, but the forbidden; and in Adam also was marriage first instituted: all men thence-after being commanded to co-habit with their wives, rather than with their father or mother.

That murder and cruelty was also forbidden, both before the law written, and before the flood it self, it is manifest. God himself making it appear, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of mankind by the general flood. For God said 20 unto Noah, An end of all flesh is come before me: for the earth is filled with cruelty through them: and behold, I will destroy them. * from the earth. That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be unknown to all that perished: Gods mercy and justice interposing between the untaught, and revenge. This commandment God repeated to Noah, after the waters were dried up from the earth: Whoso sheddeth mans blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the Image of God hath he made man.

Also the law of honouring and reverencing our Parents, was observed among the faithful, and the contrary punished by the fathers curse: as, Cursed be Canaan, a servant of servants: shall he be unto his brethren. Again, we find that the unnatural sin of the Sodomites was punished in the highest degree, as with fire from heaven. The sin of Adultery and Ravishment, was before the law no lesse detested than the rest, as appeareth by that revenge taken for Dina's forcing: and by the judgement which Juda gave against Tamar, That she should be burnt: and by the repentance of Pharaoh and Abimelech, against whom this sentence was pronounced, How art but dead, because of the woman which thou hast taken: for she is a mans wife. To these we may add the ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of clean and unclean beasts; of Circumcision, of the brother to raise up seed to his brother that left a widow childles, and divers other constitutions, partly Morall, and partly Ceremoniall, which being delivered before the written law, were after by it confirmed. So that this Divine Law imposed, of which the law of Moses containeth that which is called, The Old Testament, may be said, not only to have been 40 written in the hearts of men, before it was engraven in stone, but also in substance to have been given in precept to the Patriarchs. For as S. Paul witnesseth of himself, I know not sin, but by the law: so ever the law naturally preceded, and went before offences, though written after offences committed. It is true, that all the creatures of God were directed by some kinde of unwritten law; the Angels intuitively; Men by reason; Beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse; Plants by their vegetative powers; and things inanimate by their necessary motions, without sense or preception.

Of the Morall, Judiciall, and Ceremoniall Law, with a note prefixed, how the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

NOW as the word (Law) in general, as is aforesaid, hath divers significations, and is taken for all doctrine which doth prescribe and restrain; so the law, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by S. Paul diversly: as sometime for all the Old Testament; as, Now we know whatsoever the Law saith, it saith to them which are under the Law. Rom. 7. 12. When it is opposed, or differed from the Prophets and Psalms, it is there taken for the five Books of Moses. For so S. Luke hath distinguished them; as, All must be fulfilled which are written of me in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Psalms. Lw. 24. 44.

Rom. 3. 28.

When it is opposed to the Gospel, then it is taken for the law Morall, Ceremoniall, and Judiciall; as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is justified by Faith, without the works of the law.

Rom. 6. 4.
Gal. 3. 18.

When it is opposed to Grace, it signifieth the declaration of Gods wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of the law, and summum jus: as, For ye are not under the law, but under grace.

John 1. 17.

When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the Ceremonies or signes are taken for the things signified; as the sacrifice for Christ, and the like: then it signifieth but shadows and figures; as The law was given by Moles, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ.

Gal. 3. 22.
Luc. 16. 6.

Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christ's coming, it signifieth the whole polity of the Jews: Common-wealth; as, Before faith came, we were kept under the law, &c. Or the law of the order and institution of the Aaronicall Priesthood; as, All the Prophets and the law, or the Priests prophesied unto John. And if the Priesthood be changed, the law also, to wit, of the Priesthood, must needs be changed.

Heb. 7. 12. &
10. 1.

The word (Law) is sometime also taken by the Figure Acronymia, for Interest, Authority, and Empire, or for constraining force; as, The law of the Spirit of life, the law or the force of sin and death, the enforcements of conscience, &c.

Rom. 8. 2.
Rom. 7. 23.

But the Written law of Moles, or the law of the Old Testament, of which we now speak, is thus defined. The law is a doctrine, which was first put into the minds of men by God, and afterwards written by Moies, or by him repeated, commanding Holinesse and Justice, promising eternal life conditionally, that is to the observers of the law, and threatening death to those which break the law in the least. For according to S. James, Whoever shall keep the whole, and faileth in one point, is guilty of all. The definition used by the Schoolmen in which both the old and new law are comprehended, is thus given: Lex divina est divinum decretum, hominibus prescribens modum necessarium, ut apte pervenire possint ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, quae est ultimus humanae vitae finis: The divine Law (say they) is the decree of God, prescribing unto men a necessary mean, whereby they may aptly attain supernatural beatitude, which is the last end of mans life.

James 2. 10.

The law of Moies hath three parts: Morall, Ceremoniall, and Judiciall. The Morall part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that evil to be avoided, in 30 particular; as also it declareth, for whose sake it is to be done; as, Do this, for I am the Lord; whereas the law of nature commands it but in generall. Again, the Morall law entreateth of vertue and goodnesse; the Ceremoniall of divine service, and of holinesse; (for externall worship and the order of hallowing our selves unto God is called Ceremony) and the Judiciall teacheth the particular government, fit for the Common-wealth of the Jews, and prescribeth orders for justice and equity. And therefore was it said of S. Paul, The Commandment is just, holy, and good: just, or justice being referred to the Judiciall: holy, or holinesse to the Ceremoniall; good, or honest to the Morall. The Judiciall part is touching the government of the Common-wealth of the Jews, in which many things must needs be proper to that estate, as such as were instituted either 40 in respect of place or persons.

Rom. 7. 12.

The Ceremoniall is divided into four parts, according to the four kindes of things of which it speaketh, to wit, Sacrifice, holy things, Sacraments, and Observances. To Sacrifices belong beasts, and the fruits of the earth; to holy things the Tabernacle, Temple, Vessels, Altars, and the like; to Sacraments, Circumcision, the Passover, and such like. For Observances, they consisted either in prohibition of certaine meats, as not to eat the blood and fat of beasts: or in some other outward things, as in washings, purifying, annointings, and attire, as not to wear mixt garments of Linnen and Woollen: as also it prohibiteth other unnaturall and unproper commixtions, as, Thou shalt not yoke together in a Plough an Oxe and an Asse, or cast mingled seed in one field. It also exhorteth 50 to naturall compassion, and forbiddeh cruelty even to beasts, birds, and plants, whereby the creatures of God might be destroyed without any profit to man. For so some refer these precepts, Thou shalt not kill the bird sitting on her nest; nor beat down the first birds of the tree, nor muzzle the labouring oxe, and the like, to the Ceremoniall law.

Neither is there any of these three parts of the law of Moies, but it hath as yet in some respects the same power which it had before the coming of Christ. For the Morall liveth still, and is not abrogated or taken away: saving in the ability of justifying or condemning; for therein are we commanded to love and worship God: and to use charity

one towards another: which for ever shall be required at our hands. Therein also are we in particular directed, how this ought to be done: which power of directing by speciall rules and precepts of life, it retaineth still. For these things also are commanded in both Testaments to be observed: though principally for fear of God in the one, and for the love of God in the other.

The Ceremoniall also lived in the things which it fore-signified. For the shadow is not destroyed, but perfected, when the body it self is represented to us. Besides, it still liveth, in that it giveth both instruction and testimony of Christ, and in that it giveth direction to the Church, for some Ceremonies and Types of holy signification, which 10 are still expedient; though in a far fewer number than before Christ's coming, and in a far lesse degree of necessitie.

Lastly, the Judiciall liveth in substance, and concerning the end, and the naturall and universall equitie thereof.

But the Morall faileth in the point of justification, the Ceremoniall as touching the use and externall observation (because Christ himself is come, of whom the ceremonies were signes and shadows) and the Judiciall is taken away, as far forth as it was peculiar to the Jews Common-weale and policie.

§. X.

A proposall of nine other points to be considered, with a touch of the five first.

As for that which remaineth in the generall consideration of the divine written law, it may in effect be reduced into these nine points.

1. The dignity and worth of the Law.
2. The Majesty of the Law-giver.
3. The propriety and peculiarity of the people receiving it.
4. The conveniency of the time in which it was given.
5. The efficacy and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the old and new Testament.
7. The end and use of the Law.
8. The sense and understanding of the Law.
9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The dignity of the Law is sufficiently proved by S. Paul, in these words: Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment is holy, and just, and good: which three attributes are referred, as aforesaid, to the Morall, Ceremoniall, and Judiciall.

2. The Majesty of the Law-giver is approved in all his creatures: who as he hath given all things their lives and beings, so he only gave the Law, who could only give the end and reward promised, to wit, the salvation of mankind: but he gave it not to 40 Moies immediately, but by the ministry of Angels, as it is said: And the law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediator: And in the Acts, He gave the law by the ordinance of Angels.

3. The propriety and peculiarity of the people, receiving the Law, is in three respects. First, in that they were prepared. Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and dislevered. Thirdly, in that they were the children of the promise made to Abraham. Prepared they were, because they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were Idolaters. A Nation apart and severed they were, because of Gods choice and election. Children of the promise they were, for the promise was made by God unto Abraham and his seed: not unto his seeds, as to Esaú and Jacob, but to his seed, as to 50 Jacob or Israel singularly, of whom Christ. Now to Abraham and his seed were the promise made: he saith not, to the seeds, as speaking of many, but, to thy seed, as of one, which is Christ. Gal. 3. 16.

4. The conveniency of the time, in which it was given, is noted by S. Augusline: that it was about the middle time, between the Law of Nature, and Grace: the Law of Nature continued from Adam to Moies: the Law written in the Commandments received by Moies in the worlds year 2514. continued to the Baptism of John: from which time, began the law of Grace, which shall continue to the worlds end. Other reasons for the conveniency are formerly given.

5. The fifth consideration is of the efficacy of this law, the same being a disposition to, or signe of our Justification: but not by it self sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteousness in morall precepts. For through the passion of Christ were sins forgiven, who taketh away the sins of the world: and therefore S. Paul calleth the rudiments of the law beggerly and weak; beggerly, as containing no grace, weak, as not able to forgive and justifie. The blood of Goats and Bulls, and the almes of an Heifer could onely cleanse the body; but they were figures of Christ's blood, which doth cleanse the inward soul. For if the law could justifie, then Christ died in vain.

Heb. 9.

Gal. 2.

§. XI.

Of the sixth point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the old and new Testament.

The old and new Testament differ in name, and in the meane & way proposed for attaining to salvation; as the old by works, the new by grace: but in the thing it self, or object and remote end, they agree: which is, mans happinesse and salvation.

Heb. 8. 13.

The old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witnesse of Gods will, was called the old, because it preceded the new Testament; which is an explication of the old: from which the new taketh witnesse. Yet the new is of more excellency, in that it doth more lively expresse, and openly and directly delineate the waies of our redemption. It is also called the old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated: In that he saith the New Testament, he hath abrogated the old. For the old law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and delivered with wonderfull miracles, yet was it constituted in a policy perishable: but the new was given in a promise of an everlasting Kingdom, and therefore called in the Apocalypse, a Testament and Gospel for ever during.

The old Testament is called the Law, because the first and chief part is the Law of Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalms are Commentaries, explicating that Law.

The new Testament is called the Gospel, because the first and chief part thereof, is the glad tidings of our Redemption: the other Books, as the Epistles, or Letters of the Apostles, and the Acts or story of the Apostles, are plentifull interpreters thereof: The word Evangelion, signifying a joyfull, happy, and prosperous message, or (as Homer used it) the reward given to the Messenger, bringing joyfull news. It is also sometime taken for a sacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleasing successe, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations. First, for glad tidings in generall, as in Eph. 5. 20. 7. concerning peace. Secondly, by an excellency it is restrained, to signifie that most joyfull message of Salvation, as in Luk. 2. 10. whence also by figure it is taken for the History of Christ: and so we understand the four Gospels.

Act. 1.

Lastly, for the preaching and divulging the doctrine of Christ, as 1 Cor. 9. 14. and 2 Cor. 8. 18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I think, as they are divided in volumes) is by Daneus comprised in these four.

In their Author.

In the substance of the Covenant, or things promised.

In the foundation, to wit, Christ.

In the effects, that is, in righteousness and justification.

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament and will of God in substance of doctrine. For as there was ever one Church, so was there one Covenant, one Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old law doth point at Christ, so doth the new Law teach Christ: the old proposing him as to come, the new as already come; one and the same thing being promised in both; both tending to one, and the same end, even the salvation of our souls: which according to S. Peter, is the end of our Faith. For although it be said, that Moses did promise by observing the law, an earthly kingdom, a land flowing with milk and honey, the propagation of children, and other worldly blessings: yet all these were but figures to teach, and pledges to assure the Fathers of those spirituall blessings by Christ; for by the earthly, he raised their minds to the hope of heavenly. And the Fathers notwithstanding these worldly goods, did yet acknowledge themselves strangers and pilgrims, expecting the heavenly Hierusalem: according to this place of the Hebrews: All these died in faith, and received not the promises: but saw them a far off and believed them, confessing that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. To which purpose also S. Augustine, Omnino pauci veterem legem intelligunt, Cap. 11. c. 13.

Lib. de Civit. Dei. 18. c. 15.

gunt, non attendentes per promissa terrena, eterna promitti: Few (saith he) do understand the old law: not attending that by things earthly, eternall are promised. And S. Hierome: Nobis in Sphm. c. 3. Deus pascit: Judaeos more pecorum corporalibus donis opibique, ut Judei somniant; God would not feed the Jews as beasts with corporall gifts and riches, as themselves dream. And this may be gathered out of Gods own words, Ego sum Deus tuus; & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God, and I will be your God. For the words, I will be your God, prove that it was not for the present, or for perishable things, that God gave them this promise, but in respect of the future: to wit, the safety of their souls. For as God created both body and soul, so hath he of his goodnesse, not left the better part uncared for, which liveth ever.

10 The agreement between the old and new Testament in substance, infers also the agreement in foundation. For Christ is called the foundation of the law, laid both by the Apostles and Prophets; in whom all the promises of God in the old and new, are assured: the Fathers having eaten the same spirituall food, which we eat in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects, is, in that the knowledge of our sin and misery, which is taught us by the law, maketh way, and as it were, serveth in subordination to the Gospel, the proper effects whereof are mercy and salvation: to which the law serving as an introduction (for to those which acknowledge their sin & misery, God sheweth his mercy and salvation) may be said to agree with the Gospel in the effect. For otherwise, if we sever the Law from subordination to the Gospel, the effects are very different: the one sheweth the way of righteousness by works, the other by faith: the Law woundeth, the Gospel healeth: the Law terrifieth, the Gospel allureth; Moses acculeth, Christ defendeth: Moses condemneth, Christ pardoneth. The old restrained the hand, the new, the minde. Data est lex quae non sanaret (saith S. Augustine) sed quae egrotantes probaret; The Law was given, not to help, but to discover sickness: & S. Chrysostome; Data est lex, ut se homo inveniret, non ut moribus sanaretur, sed ut medicus quereretur: The law was given that man might finde and know his own imperfection: not that his disease was thereby holpen, but that he might then seek out the Physician. For Christ came to save the world, which the law had condemned. And as Moses was but a servant, and Christ a Son; so the greatest benefit was reserved to be brought, as by the worthiest person, saith Cyril: for this law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope.

§. XII.

Of the rest of the points proposed.

The seventh consideration is of the end, and use of the law: which is to bring us to Christ: for finding no righteousness in our own works, we must seek it in some other. But this is the last, and remote, and utmost end: the next and proper end of the law, is to prescribe righteousness, and to exact absolute and perfect obedience to God. Cursed is he which continueth not in all the things of this law.

40 The second end of the Law, is to render us inexcusable before God: who knowing so perfect a law, do not keep it: the law requiring a perfect and intire, not a broken or half obedience: but both inward and outward righteousness, and performance of duty to God and Men.

The third and chief end of the law, is, as hath bin said, to send us to Christ, and his grace, being in our selves condemned and lost. For the law was delivered with thunder, and with a most violent and fearful tempest, threatening eternall death.

The fourth end of the law was to designe, and preserve, the place of the Church and true people of God: and to hold men in one Discipline, and awe, till the coming of Christ: after whom the Church was to be dispersed over the whole world.

50 These be the ends of the Law, is to render us inexcusable before God: who knowing so perfect a law, do not keep it: the law requiring a perfect and intire, not a broken or half obedience: but both inward and outward righteousness, and performance of duty to God and Men.

The third and chief end of the law, is, as hath bin said, to send us to Christ, and his grace, being in our selves condemned and lost. For the law was delivered with thunder, and with a most violent and fearful tempest, threatening eternall death.

Lastly, for the durance or continuance of the Law, the same had being until the passion of Christ: before which time, and while Christ taught in the world, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true sacrifice was offered upon the Altar of

* Gen. 49. 10. The Scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor a Law-giver from between his feet until Shiloh come.

of the Crosse, then the Jewish sacrifices and ceremonies, which were Types and figures of Christ (Christ being the body of those shadows) ceased to binde the conscience any longer: the mystery of our redemption being now by Christ and in him finished. In token whereof, the vail of the Temple rent asunder; noting that the ceremonial vails and shadows were now to be removed, not that the morall law of the Commandments was hereby abolished, or weakened at all: otherwise than that it had not power to condemn according to the Jewish doctrine, as aforesaid. For the observing of the law was by Christ himself severely commanded: our love towards God being thereby to be witnessed. And herein David too much rejoiced, as he preferred the observation of the law before all that the world could yeeld. In via testimoniorum tuorum delectatus sum, sicut in omnibus divitiis; I have been delighted in thy law, as in all manner of riches: And again, The law of thy mouth is good for me above thousands of gold and silver. This is the love God (saith S. John) that we keep his Commandment. And that there is no excuse for the neglect of the things commanded in the law, God himself in Deuteronomy witnesseth. This Commandment (saith he) which I command thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither is it far off. It is not in heaven that thou shouldst say, Who shall go up for us to heaven, and bring it us, and cause us to hear it, that we may do it: neither is it beyond the Sea, that thou shouldst say, Who shall go over the Sea for us, and bring it us? &c. but the word is very nigh unto thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart for to do it. Behold (saith Moses) I have set before thee this day life and death, good and evil, in that I command thee this day, to love the Lord thy God, to walk in his way, and to keep his Commandments, and his Ordinances, and his Laws; that thou mayst live, &c. Neither is it said in vain in S. Matthew: Si vis vitam ingredi, serva mandata; If thou wilt enter into life, keep the Commandments: and in S. John; Scio quia mandatum ejus vita eterna est; I know that his Commandment is life everlasting. And if this be the charity of God, or of Men towards God, as S. John hath taught, to wit, that we keep his Commandments: certainly, he is but a liar, that professeth to love God, and neglecteth to observe the word of his will, with all his power. And though I confesse it not in mans ability, without the special grace of God to fulfill the law (Christ onely as man excepted) yet if we rightly consider the mercifull care which God had of his people in those his Commandments, we shall finde in our selves, how we borrow liberty, and rather let slip our affections, and voluntarily loosen them from the chains of obedience, to which the word of God and divine reason hath fastened them, than that we are excusable by those difficulties and impossibilities, which our minde (greedy of liberty) propoeth to it self. For this is the love of God, that we keep his Commandments, and his Commandments are not grievous, 1 John 5. 12. and if we examine every precept apart, and then weigh them each after other, in the balance of our consciences: it is not hard for any man to judge, by what easie persuasions, we steal away from our own power, as unwilling to use it against our pleasing desires.

§. XIII.

Of the severall Commandments of the Decalogue: and that the difficulty is not in respecting of the Commandments, but by our default.

For by the first we are commanded to acknowledge, serve, and love one God. Now, whereby are we inticed to the breach of this precept? seeing every reasonable man may conceive and know, that infinite power cannot be divided into many infinities: and that it is of necessity, that by this almighty Unity, all things have been caused, and are continued. And if brute beasts had this knowledge of their Creator, and how in his providence he hath also provided for every of them, Which giveth to beasts their food, &c. there is no doubt but that they would also serve and love him onely.

The second precept is the forbidding of Idolatry, and worship of Images: the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the invention of an ill intent in the beginning, seeing this is generally true; Omnia mala exempla bonis initiis orta sunt; All ill examples did spring and arise from good beginnings. For their first erection was to keep the memory of men famous for their virtue: untill (saith Lactantius) the devill crept into them, and (having blotted out the first intent) working in weak and ignorant souls, changed the nature of the one, and the reason of the other, to serve himself thereby. For what reasonable man, if he be not forsaken of God, will call on those blinde, deaf, dumbe, and dead stocks, more worthless than the most worthless of those, that having life and reason, implore their help, which have neither: yea, of more vile prize and baser, than the basest of beasts, who have sense and estimation? For what do we thereby (saith the Widome of Solomon) but call to the weak for help, pray to the dead for life, require aid of him that hath no experience, assistance in our journeyes of him that cannot go, and successe in our affairs of him that hath no power? And whether the Idolater, or the block, to which he prayeth, be more senselesse, David maketh a doubt. For (saith he) they that make them are like unto Psal. 135. 18. them, and so are all the rest that trust in them.

The branch of the third Commandment, is neither perswaded by worldly pleasure, nor worldly profit: the two greatest enchanters of mortall men. No, we are no way allured to this horrible disdain of God, unless the hate of good men, and Gods curse, be accounted an advantage. For as our corruptest nature gives us nothing towards it, so can it satisfie no one appetite, except everlasting sorrow, and hell dwell in our desire. And therefore this strange custom hath the devil brought up among men, without all subtiltie of argument, or cunning perswasion, taking thereby the greatest and most scornfull advantage over us. For laughter satisfieth hatred, Theft gives satisfaction to greed, Adultery to lust, Oppression to covetousnesse: but this contemptuous offence of blasphemy, and the irreverent abuse of Gods name, as it giveth no help to any of our worldly affections, so the most salvage Nations of the world do not use it.

The fourth Commandment, to keep the Sabbath day holy, hath neither pain, burden, nor inconvenience. For it giveth rest to the labourer and consolation to their Masters. And that this law was imposed on man for his benefit, Moses teacheth in the reason of the law: as in Exod. 23. 12. And in the seventh day thou shalt rest, that thine Ox and thine Ass may rest, and the son of thy maid, and the stranger may be refreshed.

The first of the second Table, to honour our Parents, with whom we are one and the same, is a gratitude which nature it self hath taught us towards them, who, after God, gave us life and being, have begotten us, and born us, cherished us in our weak and helpless infancy, and bestowed on us the harvest and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore, in the Temporall and Judicall ordinances, cursing of Parents, or the offending them violence, was made death.

The next is, that thou shalt not Murder, that is, thou shalt not do the acts following the affections of hatred. For the law of God, and after it our own laws, and, in effect, the law of all Nations, have made difference between slaughter-casual, and furious. Affectio enim tuæ (saith Bracton) imponit nomen operi tuo; It is the affection and will that makes the work such as it is. And certainly, whosoever cannot forbear to commit murder, hath neither the grace of God, nor any use of his own will.

The third of the second Table, commands us from adultery. Now if the preservation of Virginity have been possible for thousands of men and women, who in all Ages have mastered their fleshly desires, and have returned chaste to their grave: It cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbear the dishonour and injury, which we offer to others by such a violation, seeing marriage is permitted by the laws of God and men, to all that affect it. And there is no man living, whom the desire of beauty and form hath so constrained, but he might with ease forbear the prosecution of this ill, did not himself give suck to this infant, and nourish warmth till it grow to strong heat, heat till it turn to fire, and fire to flame.

The fourth of the second Table, is, That we shall not steal. And if that kinde of violent robbery had been used in Moses time, which many Russians practise now a daies in England, and, to the dishonour of our Nation, more in England, than in any Region of the world among Christians; out of doubt, he would have censured them by death, and not by restitution, though quadruple. For I speak not of the poor and miserable souls, whom hunger and extreme necessity inforceth; but of those derailed Theeves, who, to maintain themselves Lord-like, assault, rob, and wound the Merchant, Artificer, and labouring man; or break by violence into other mens houses, and spend in Braverie, Drunkenesse, and upon Harlots, in one day, what other men sometime have laboured for all their lives: impoverishing whole Families, and taking the bread and food from the mouths of their children. And that this Commandment might easily be observed, it would soon appear, if Princes would resolve, but for a few years, to pardon none. For it is the hope of life, and the argument of sparing the first offence, that encourageth these Hell-hounds. And if every man presume to be pardoned once, there is no State or Common-wealth, but these men would in a short time impoverish or destroy it.

The fifth Commandment of this second Table, is, the prohibition of false witness: from which if men could not forbear, all surety of estate and life were taken away. And so much did God detest a false witness, and a false accuser, especially in matters criminal, that the law ordained him to suffer the same death or punishment, which he fought by falsehood to lay on his brother.

The last of the ten Commandments forbiddeth us to covet any thing, which belongeth to another man, either the bodies of their wives for concupiscence, or their goods for desire of gain. And this precept seemeth the hardest for men to observe; so esteemed by reason of our frail affections; and yet if we judge hereof rightly, it may be doubted whether it extend to all our inconsiderate fancies and vain thoughts. For, although it be not easie to master all our sudden passions, yet we may restrain and hinder the growing, and farther increase, if we please to intend our strength, and seek for grace. How the word coveting reacheth to all those, it is to be considered. For Concupiscentia, according to some, Est effrenatus habendi appetitus; An unbridled, or unrestrained appetite of having: And as touching such an appetite, we cannot excuse our selves by any our natural frailty, or unadvised error; But, as I suppose, the word Concupiscentia is more largely taken, either for a determinate and unbridled evil intent, or for some urging inclination thereunto. All the question is of the latter sort: which is, Actus in-20 perfectus, id est, non deliberatus ratione, quæ est principium proprium actus boni aut vitiosi; Such passions, or inclinations are imperfect acts, that is, not deliberated upon by reason, which is the proper principle of a good or vicious action. And sure, it may seem, that so long as we resist such motions, they harm us not: as they say, Quamdiu res fragamur, nihil nocent: nocent autem cum eas dominari permittimus; As long as we give no assent unto them, it is thought by some that they hurt us not; and that then only they hurt, when we suffer them to bear sway. But these men, as it seems, make nothing forbidden in the tenth precept, but what hath been forbidden in the other: for in every Commandment, not onely the outward act, but also the inward assent unto evil, though it break not out into act, is forbidden: therefore, that we may know the difference between this Commandment and the rest, 30 the distinction of desires is to be held: that some are with assent, and unbridled, others bridled, and without assent. For so even the Morall Philosopher can tell us, that the continent man hath evil desires, but without assent (for they are bridled by the strength of right reason) as, on the other side, the Incontinent hath good desires, but restrained and suppressed by contrary passions. The evil desires, when they are accompanied with assent, are in every Commandment forbidden, together with the outward act: and therefore, if we will have any thing proper to this Commandment, we must needs say, that the evil desires of the continent man (that is, even those which we resist and bridle) are here forbidden. For though he that bridleth his evil desires, be much better than he that yeeldeth unto them: yet such a man, even according to the Heathen Phi-40 losopher, is not worthy the name of a vertuous man. For Aristotle himself makes Continentia, not to be vertue, but onely a degree unto it: confessing, that though the Continent man do well in bridling his evil affections, yet he doth not all, seeing he ought not so much as to have them at all. Neither is it much more, that true divinity delivereth touching this matter. For, as he saith, that in the continent man the having of these evil desires, though he resist them, is the cause that he cannot be called a vertuous man: so we, that the having of them is a sin. Onely in this we excell him here: that we are able out of divinity to give the true reason of this doctrine: which is, that every one sinneth, that doth not love God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth, that the evil desires of the Continent man; that is, of him which bridleth 50 them, must needs be sin: seeing such desires, though bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleased God, to make us know, that by our faithfull endeavours to keep his commandments, we witness our love toward himself: we may not safely give liberty to our vanities, by casting back upon God (who is justice it self) that he hath given us Precepts altogether beyond our power, and Commandments impossible for us to keep. For, as he is accused (saith Saint Hierome) that avows that the Law is in all things possible to be observed: so he hath made this addition: Maledictus qui qui dicit impossibilia Deum præcepisse; Accusatus est he that saith that God hath commanded things (in themselves, and not through our fault) impossible. Now, as the places are many which command us to keep the Law; so is our weaknesse also in the Scriptures laid before us, and therefore it is thus safely to be understood, that we should without evasion, or without betraying of our selves, do our faithfull endeavours to observe them: which if we do unfaithfully, no doubt but God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no man just, David witnesseth: Enter not into judgement with thy servant, for in thy sight no flesh that liveth shall be justified. And in the first of Kings, There is no man that sinneth not: And again, Who can say, I have made my heart clean? But seeing there is no sin given willingly, or restrain himself in all that he can; yea, or no? For when a King gives to his subject a commandment upon pain of losse of his love, to perform some service: if the subject neglecting the same, seek to satisfie his Sovereign with shifting excuses, out of doubt such a Prince will take himself to be derided therein.

§. XIV.

If there were not any Religion, nor Judgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be observed.

20 And if we consider advisedly and soberly of the Morall Law, or ten Commandments, which God by the hand of Moses gave unto his people, it will appear, that such was his mercifull providence in the choice of them, as were there neither pain nor profit adjoynt to the observing, or not observing of them; were there no divine power at all, nor any Religion among men; yet if we did not for our own sakes strive to observe these laws, all society of men, and all endeavours, all happinesse and contentment in this life would be taken away: and every State and Common-wealth in the World fall to the ground and dissolve. Therefore these laws were not imposed as a burden, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might be defended, that every 30 man might enjoy the fruits of his own travell, that right might be done to all men from all men: that by justice, order, and peace, we might live the lives of reasonable men, and not of beasts; of free-men, and not of slaves; of civil men, and not of savages. And hereof making our humane reason onely Judge, let us see the inconveniences in this life which would follow by the breach and neglect of these laws.

As first, what would the issue be, if we acknowledged many gods? would not a far greater hatred, war, and blood-shed follow, than that which the difference of ceremony, and diversity of interpretation hath already brought into the World, even among those Nations which acknowledge one God, and one Christ?

And what could it profit mankind to pray to Idols, and Images of gold, metall, dead 40 stones, and rotten wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the losse of time, and an impossibility to receive thence from, either help or comfort?

The breach of the third Commandment bringeth therewith this disadvantage, and ill to man, that whosoever taketh the Name of God in vain, shall not at any time benefit himself by calling God to witness for him, when he may justly use his holy Name.

The observing the Sabbath holy, giveth rest to men and beasts, and nature her self requirith intermission of labour.

If we despise our Parents, who have given us being, we thereby teach our own children to scorn and neglect us, when our aged yeers require comfort and help at their hands.

50 If murder were not forbidden, and severely punished, the race of mankind would be extinguished: and whosoever would take the liberty to destroy others, giveth liberty to others to destroy himself.

If adultery were lawfull and permitted, no man could say unto himself; This is my son: there could be no inheritance proper, no honour descend to posterity, no endeavour by vertue and undertaking to raise Families: murders and poisonings between man and wife would be daily committed: and every man subject to moist filth and unclean diseases.

If stealth and violent rapine were suffered, all mankind would shortly after perish, B b or or live as the salvages, by roots and acorns. For no man laboureth but to enjoy the fruits thereof. And such is the mischief of robbery, as where Moses for lesser crimes appointed restitution fourfold, policy of State and necessity hath made it death.

To permit false witness, is to take all mens lives and estates from them by corruption: the wicked would swear against the virtuous: the waster against the wealthy: the idle beggar and loyterer, against the careful and painfull labourer: all triall of right were taken away, and justice thereby banished out of the world.

The coveting of that which belongs to other men, bringeth no other profit than a distraction of minde, with an inward vexation: for while we covet what appertains to others, we neglect our own: our appetites are therein fed with vain and fruitlesse hopes, so long as we do but covet; and if we do attain to the desire of the one, or the other, to wit, the wives or goods of our neighbours; we can look for no other, but that our selves shall also, either by theft or by strong hand, be deprived of our own.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandments, if there be nothing in them, but rules and directions for the generall and particular good of all living? Surely, for our own good, and not in respect of himself, did the most mercifull and provident God ordain them; without the observation of which, the virtues of heavenly bodies, the fertility of the earth, with all the blessings given us in this life, would be unto us altogether unprofitable, and of no use. For we should remaine but in the state of brute beasts, if not in a far more unhappy condition.

§. XV.

Of humane law, written and unwritten.

Humane law, of which now it followeth to speak, is first divided into two: (Viz.) Written, and Unwritten. The unwritten consists of usage, approved by time: which Isidore calls Mores: and he defines Mores to be Consuetudines veritate probate; to be customs approved by antiquitie, or unwritten laws. Now custome differeth from use, as the cause from the effect: in that custome is by use and continuance established into a law: but yet there where the law is defective, saith Isidore.

And of customes there are two generall natures, containing innumerable particulars; the first are written customes received and exercised by Nations, as the customes of Englundy and Normandy, the ancient generall custome of England, and the customes of Cisle, and other Provinces.

The second are these petty customes, used in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The generall or Nationall customes are some written, others unwritten.

The particular or petty customes are feldome written, but witnessed by testimony of the inhabitance. The customes of the Duchie of Cornwall, comprehending also the Countie of Devon, as touching Tin, and Tin caules are written in Devon, but not in Cornwall. But howsoever use and time hath made these customes as laws, yet ought every custome to be rationalizab, as well as prescripta. Non firmatur tractu temporis, quod de jure ab initio non subsistit; but which at first was not grounded upon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (saith Ulpian) quod ab initio vitiosum est, non potest tractu temporis convalescere; Course of time amends not that which was naught from the first beginning. For these two defences are necessary in all laws of custome; the one, that it be not repugnant to the law divine, and naturall: the other, that the cause and reason be strong, proving a right birth, and necessary continuance: it being manifest, that every custome which is against the law, had his beginning from evil deeds, and therefore not without the former considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all customs of this nature, were but tolerated for a time, by the law-makers, though they have been since continued; because posterity is not bound to examine by what cause their Ancestors were thereto moved. For, Non sufficit simplex tolerantia. And it is in this sort over-ruled in the law; Per populum consuetudo contra legem induci non potest, nisi de voluntate illius, qui novam legem & novam constitutionem statueret potest, qui solus princeps est; The people cannot bring in a new custome against law, save by his will, who hath power to make a new law and ordinance, which is only the Prince.

Humane law generally taken, to wit, humane law written, is by some defined to be the decree or doom of practick reason: by which humane actions are ruled and directed.

rected. Papinian calls the law a common precept, the advisement of wise men, and the restraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Isidore calls the law a Constitution written, agreeing with Religion, fittell for government and common profit: And more largely, Omne id quod ratione consistit: All that stands with reason.

Lastly, and more precisely, it is thus defined. Humane law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the law naturall & eternall: made by the rationall discourse of those, that exercise publicke authority: prescribing necessary observances to the subject. That every law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Augstine teacheth, saying: Mibi lex esse non videtur, que iusta non fuerit; It seems to be no law at all to me, which is not just: and just it cannot be, except it agree with the law naturall and eternall. For there is no law just and legitimat (saith S. Augstine) which the Law-makers have not derived from the eternall. Nihil iustum atque legitimatum est, quod non ab eterna lege sibi homines derivaverunt.

Secondly, it ought to be constituted by discourse of reason, whereby it is distinguished from the law naturall, to wit, the naturall, indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration, from whence the law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to be made by an authorized Magistracy, it cannot be doubted, be the government of what kind soever. For it falleth otherwise under the title of those decrees called violencia, or iniqua constitutiones; Violences, or wicked constitutiones.

Of humane law there are four properties, especially answering these four conditions in the former definition. First, as it is drawn out of the law of Nature; so every particular of the humane law may be resolved into some principle or rule of the naturall.

Secondly, it is to be considered as it is referred unto, and doth respect the common good.

Thirdly, it is to be made by publicke authority.

Fourthly, concerning the matter of the law, it prescribeth and directeth all humane actions. And so is the law as large and divers, as all humane actions are divers, which may fall under it. For according to Thomas, Alia lex Julia de Adulteris, alia Cornelii de Siccariis; The law of Julian against Adultery, is one, the Cornelian against Ruffians, is another. Now the humane law generally taken, is in respect of the first of these considerations, divided into the law of Nations, and the Civill.

The law of Nations is taken lesse or more properly; lesse properly for every law which is not of it self, but from other. higher principles deduced: and so it seemeth that Ulpian understands it: for he defineth jus Gentium, or the law of Nations, to be that which is only common amongst men, as Religion, and the Worship of God: which is not in the very nature of this law of Nations; but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other divine Revelations. But the law of Nations properly taken, is that dictate, or sentence, which is drawn from a very probable, though not from an evident principle, yet so probable, that all Nations do assent unto the conclusion, as that the free passage of Ambassadors be granted between enemies, &c. which Nationall law, according to divers acceptations, and divers considerations had of the humane law, may be sometime taken for a Species of the Naturall, sometime of the Humane.

Jus Civile, or the Civill law, is not the same in all Common-wealths, but in divers Estates it is also divers and peculiar, and this law is not so immediately derived from the law of Nature, as the law of Nations is: For it is partly deduced out of such principles as all Nations do not agree in, or easily assent unto; because they depend on particular circumstances, which are divers, and do not fit all estates. Hereof Ulpian, jus Civile neque in totum a Naturali & Gentium recedit, neque per omnia ei servit: itaque cum ali- quid addimus, vel detrahimus juri communi, jus proprium, id est, Civile efficitur. The civill law (saith he) doth neither wholly differ from the law of Nature and Nations; nor yet in all points obey it: therefore when we add ought to, or take from the law that is common, we make a law proper, that is, the Civill Law.

The law now commonly called the Civill law, had its birth in Rome: and was first written by the Decem-viri, 303. years after the foundation of the City. It was compounded as well out of the Athorian and other Greecian laws, as out of the ancient Roman customs and laws Regall. The Regall laws were devised by the first Kings; and called Leges Regiae; for Papirian, because they were gathered by Papirius, Tarquin then reigning. For though so many of the former laws as maintained Kingly authority, were abolished with the name; yet those of Servius Tullius, for commerce and contracts, and all that appertained to Religion and common utility, were continued, and were a part of the laws of the twelve Tables. To these laws of the twelve Tables were added (as the times gave occasion) those made by the Senate, called Senatus-consulta: those of the common people, called Plébiscita, those of the Lawyers, called Responsa-prudentum: and the Edicts of the Annual Magistrate: which Edicts be called first gathered and interpreted by Julian, and presented to Adrian the Emperour, they were by him confirmed and made perpetual laws, and the Volume stiled Edictum perpetuum as those and the like collections of Justinian afterward were.

The difference anciently between Laws and Edicts, which the French call Règlements, consisted in this, that laws are the constitutions made or confirmed by sovereign authority (be the sovereignty in the people, in a few, or in one) and are withall generall and permanent: but an Edict (which is but Justum magistratus, unless by authority it be made a law) hath end with the Officer, who made the same, saith Varro. Qui plurimum Edicta tribuit, legem annuam esse dicitur; They who ascribe the most to an Edict, say that it is a law for one year: Though Isidore doth also expresse by the word Constitutiones or Edicts, those Ordinances called Acts of Prerogatives; as, Constitutio vel Edictum est quod Rex vel Imperator constituit, vel edicit; An Ordinance or Edict is that which a King or Emperour doth ordain, or proclaim.

Lastly, the Humane law is divided into the Secular, and into the Ecclesiasticall, or Canon. The Secular commanding temporall good, to wit, the peace and tranquility of the Common-weal: the Ecclesiasticall the spirituall good, and right government of the Ecclesiasticall Common-wealth, or Church: Illud nature legem, hoc divinam spectat; That respecteth the law of nature, this the law of God. And so may Jus Civile be taken two ways; first, as distinguished from the law of Nations, as in the first division: Secondly, as it is the same with the Secular, and differs from the Ecclesiasticall. But this division of the Schoolmen is obscure. For although the Civill be the same with the Secular, as the Civill is a law, yet the Secular is more generall, and comprehendeth both the Civill, and all other laws not Ecclesiasticall. For of Secular laws in use among Christian Princes, and in Christian Common-wealths, there are three kinds; the Civill, which hath every where a voice, and is in all Christian estates (England excepted) most powerful; the laws of England called Common, and the laws of custome or Provinciall. In Spain, besides the law Civill, they have the customs of Casill, and other Provinces. In France, besides the Civill, the customs of Burgundy, Blois, Berry, Nivernois, and Lodunois, &c. Tous lieux, siens & assis en Lodunois, seront gouvernez selon les costumes du dit pays; All places lying within the precincts of Lodunois, shall be governed according to the customs of that place. There are also in France the customs of Normandy, and these of two kinds; Generall, and Locall: and all purged and reformed by divers Acts of the three Estates. The Charters of confirmation of these ancient customs, before and since their reformation have these words: Nos autem Registrum predictum, usus laudabiles, & consuetudines antiquas, &c. laudamus, approbamus, & autoritate Regia confirmamus; We praise, approve, and by our Kingly authority confirm. The common law of England is also compounded of the ancient customs of the same, and of certain Maxims by those customs of the Realm approved. Upon which customs also are grounded those Courts of Record, of the Chancery, Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other small Courts.

These ancient customs of England have been approved by the Kings thereof from age to age: as that custome by which no man shall be taken, imprisoned, disseised, nor otherwise destroyed, but he must first be put to answer by the Law of the Land, was confirmed by the Statute of Magna Charta. It is by the ancient custom of England, that the eldest sons should inherit without partition. In Germany, France, and elsewhere otherwise, and by partition. In Ireland it is the custome for all lands (that have not been resigned into the Kings hands) that the eldest of the House shall enjoy the inheritance during his owne life: and so the second and third eldest (if there be so many brothers) before the Heire in lineall descent: this is called the custome of Tanishrie. For example, if a Lord of Land have four sons, and the eldest of those four have also a son, the three brothers of the eldest son shall, after the death of their brother, enjoy their fathers Lands before the grand-child: the custome being grounded grounded upon the reason of necessity. For the Irish in former times, having alwaies lived in a subdivided Civill War, not only the greatest against the greatest, but every Baron and Gentleman one against another, were enforced to leave successors of age and ability, to defend their own Territories. Now as in Normandy, Burgundy, and other Provinces of France, there are certain peculiar and petty Customs, besides the great and generall custom of the Land, so are there in England, and in every part thereof. But the greatest bulk of our Laws, as I take it, are the Acts of Parliament: laws propounded and approved by the three estates of the Realm, and confirmed by the King, to the obedience of which all men are therefore bound, because they are Acts of choice, and self-chose.

10 desire. Leges nulla alia causa nortent, quàm quid iudicio populi recepte sunt; The laws do therefore bind the subject, because they are received by the judgement of the subject. Tum demum humane leges habent vim suam, cum fuerint non modo institutæ, sed etiam firmatæ approbatione communitatis; It is then that humane laws have their strenght, when they shall not only be devised, but by the approbation of the people confirmed.

Isidore fasteneth these properties to every Christian Law, that the same be honest, that it be possible, that it be according to Nature, and according to the custome of the Country; also for the time and place, convenient, profitable, and manifest, and without respect of private profit, that it be written for the generall good. He also gives foure effects of the Law, which Modestinus comprehends in two; to wit, obligation, and instigation: the former binds us by fear, to avoid vice; the latter encourageth with hope, to follow vertue. For according to Cicero, Legem oportet esse vitiorum emendatricem, commendatricemque virtutum: it behooveth the Law to be a mender of vices, and a commender of vertue. The part obligatory, or binding us to the observance of things commanded or forbidden, is an effect common to all laws: and it is two-fold; the one constraineth us by fear of our consciences, the other by fear of externall punishment. These two effects the Law performeth, by the exercise of those two powers, to wit, Coactive and Directive.

The second of these two effects remembered by Modestinus, is Instigation, or encouragement to vertue, as Aristotle makes it the end of the law, to make men vertuous. For laws being such as they ought to be, do both by prescribing and forbidding, urge us to well-doing; laying before us the good and the evil, by the one and the other purchased. And this power affirmative commanding good, and power negative forbidding evil, are those into which the law is divided, as touching the matter: and in which David comprehendeth the whole body and substance thereof: saying, Declina a malo, & fac bonum, Decline from evill, and do good.

§. XVI.

That only the Prince is exempt from humane Laws, and in what sort.

40 Now whether the power of the humane Law be without exception of any person, it is doubtfully disputed among those that have written of this subject, as well Divines as Lawyers: and namely, whether Sovereigne Princes be compellable; yea, or no? But whereas there are two powers of the law, as aforesaid; the one Directive, the other Coactive: to the power Directive they ought to be subject, but not to that which constraineth. For as touching violence or punishments, no man is bound to give a pre-judicial judgement against himself; and if equals have not any power over each other, much lesse have inferiours over their superiours, from whom they receive their authority and strenght.

And speaking of the supreme power of laws, simply then is the Prince so much above the laws, as the soul and body united, is above a dead and senselesse carcase. For the King is truly called, Jus vivum, & lex animata: An animate and living law. But this is true, that by giving authority to laws, Princes both add greatnes to themselves, & conserve it; and therefore was it said of Braddon out of Justinian: Merito debet Rex tribuere legi quod Brasili. lex attribuit ei nam lex facit ut ipse sit Rex; Rightfully ought the King to attribute that to the law, which the Law first attributeth to the King; for it is the Law that doth make Kings.

But whereas Braddon ascribeth this power to the humane law, he is therein mistaken. For Kings are made by God, and laws divine; and by humane laws onely, declared to be Kings. As for the places remembered by the Divines and Lawyers, which infer a kinde of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, than the bond of confidence, and profit arising from the examples of vertuous Princes, who are to give an account of their actions to God only.

Phel. 50.
Aq. de Leg.

Tibi soli peccavi, faith David; Against thee only have I sinned: therefore the Prince cannot be said to be subject to the law; Princes non subijciuntur legi. For seeing, according to the Schoolmen, the law humane is but quoddam organum & instrumentum potestatis gubernative: non videtur posse ejus obligatio ad eum se extendere, ad quem ipsa vis potestatis humane non pertinet; sed vis potestatis humane non se extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa residet. Ergo neque lex condita per talem potestatem obligare potest ipsum conditorem. *Omnia enim potentia usura, est principium transmutandi aliud; Seeing humane law (say they) is but a kind of organ or instrument of the power that governeth, it seems that it cannot extend it self to bind of organ or instrument of the power that governeth, it seems that it cannot extend it self to bind in any one whom no humane power can controll, or lay hold of: but the governour himself, in whom the governing power doth reside, is a person that cannot by himself, or by his own power be contralled. And therefore the law which is made by such a power, cannot binde the Law-maker himself: for every active ability, is a cause or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it self resides. And seeing Princes have power to deliver others from the obligation of the Law: ergo etiam potest ipsemet Princeps sive legislator sua se voluntate pro libito ab obligatione legis liberare; Therefore also may a Prince or Law-maker at his own will and pleasure, deliver himself from the bond of the Law. Therefore in the rules of the Law it is thus concluded: *Subditi tenentur leges observare necessitate coactionis. Princeps vero sola voluntate sua, & intuitu boni communis; The subjects are bound to fulfill the Law by necessity of compulsion, but the Prince only by his own will, and regard of the common good.

Greg. de Valentia de Leg.

Now concerning the politick Laws, given by Moses to the Nation of the Israelites, whether they ought to be a President, from which no civill institutions of other people should presume to digresse, I will not presume to determine, but leave it as a question for such men to decide, whose professions give them greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to affirm, That we ought not to seem wiser than God himself, who hath told us, that there are no Laws so righteous, as those which it pleased him to give to his Elect people to be governed by. True it is, that all Nations have their severall qualities, wherein they differ, even from their next borderers, no lesse than in their peculiar languages: which disagreeable conditions to governe aptly, one and the same Law very hardly were able. The Roman civill Laws did indeed contain in order a great part of the then known World, without any notable inconvenience, after such time as once it was received and become familiar: yet was not the administration of it alike in all parts, but yielded much unto the naturall customs of the sundry people which it governed. For whether it be through a long continued perswasion; or (as Astrologers more willingly grant) some influence of the Heavens; or peradventure some temper of the soile and climate, affording matter of provocation to vice (as plenty maketh the Sybarites luxurious: want and opportunity to steal, makes the Arabians to be Theeves) very hard it were to forbid by Law an offence so common with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be distinguished from just and honest. By such rigour was the Kingdom of Congo unhappily diverted from the Christian Religion, which it willingly at the first embraced, but after with great fury rejected, because plurality of Wives was denied unto them, I know not how necessarily, but more contentiously than seasonably. In such cases, me thinks it were not amiss to consider, that the high God himself permitted some things to the Israelites, rather in regard of their naturall disposition (for they were hard-hearted) than because they were consonant unto the ancient rules of the first perfection. So, where even the generall nature of man doth condemn (as many things it doth) for wicked and unjust; there may the Law, given by Moses, worthily be deemed the most exact reformer of the evil, which forsooth man, as neer as may be, to the will and pleasure of his Maker. But where nature or custom hath entertained a vicious, yet not intolerable habit, with so long and so publick approbation, that the vertue opposing it would seem as uncouth, as it were to walk naked in England, or to wear the English fashion of apparrell in Turkey: there may a wife and upright Law-giver, without presumption, omit somewhat that the rigour of Moses Law required; even as the good King Hezekiah did, in a matter meerly Ecclesiasticall, and therefore the lesse capable of dispensation, praying for the people; The good Lord be mercifull unto him, that prepareth his whole heart to seek the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though he be not cleansed according to the purification of the Sanctuary; which Prayer the Lord heard and granted. 2 Chron. 30. 18, 19.

To this effect it is well observed by Master Doctor Willet, that the morall Judicials of Moses do partly binde, and partly are let free. They do not hold affirmatively, that we are tied to the same severity of punishment now, which was inflicted then; but negatively they do hold, that now the punishment of death should not be adjudged, where sentence of death is not given by Moses: Christian Magistrates ruling under Christ the prince of peace, that is, of Clemency and Mercy, may abate of the severity of Moses law, and mitigate the punishment of death, but they cannot add unto it, to make the burden more heave: for to shew more rigour than Moses, becometh not the Gospel.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath been the subject of many learned discourses, neither will I take upon me, to speak any thing definitively in a case which dependeth still in some controversie among worthy Divines. Thus much (as in honour of the Judicall Law, or rather of him that gave it) I may well and truly say, that the defence of it hath alwaies been very plausible. And surely howsoever they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a generall and onely Law: yet shall we hardly find any other ground, whereon the conscience of a Judge may rest, with equall satisfaction in making interpretation, or giving sentence upon doubts arising out of any Law besides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Judge could have been witness, of whom Fortescue, that notable Bulwark of our Laws, doth speak, complaining of a judgement given against a Gentlewoman at Salisbury; who being accused by her own man, without any other proof, for murdering her Husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the man who accused her, within a yeer after being convict for the same offence, confessed that his Mistis was altogether innocent of that cruel fact, whose terrible death he then (though over-late) grievously lamented: but this Judge, faith the same Author, sepius ipse mihi falsus est, quod nunquam in vita sua animum ejus de hoc facto ipse purgaret; He himself often confessed unto me, that he should never, during his life, be able to clear his conscience of that fact. Wherefore that acknowledgement which other Sciences yeeld unto the Metaphysiques, that from thence are drawn propositions, able to prove the principles of Sciences, which out of the Sciences themselves cannot be proved, may justly be granted by all other politike institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more justly, by how much the subject of the Metaphysiques, which is, Ens quatenus Ens; Being as it is being; is infinitely inferiour to the Ens Entium; The being of beings, the onely good, the fountain of truth, whose fear is the beginning of wisdom. To which purpose well faith S. Augustine, Condatur legum temporalium si vir bonus est & sapiens, illam ipsam consulti eternam, de qua nulli anime judicare datum est; The Author of temporal Laws, if he be good and wise, doth therein consult the Law eternall, to determine of which there is no power given to any soul. And as well Prince Edward, in Fortescue his discourse, Nemo potest melius aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quam posuit Dominus; No man can lay a better, or another foundation than the Lord hath laid.

CHAP. V.

The Story of the Israelites from the receiving of the Law, to the death of MOSES.

§. 1.

Of the numbering and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the Wilderness; with a note of the reverence given to the worship of God, in this ordering of their troup.

When Moses had received the Law from God, and published it among the people, and finished the Tabernacle of the Arke and Sanctuary; he mustred all the Tribes and Families of Israel: and having leene what numbers of Men fit to beare Armes, were found in every Tribe, from twentie yeeres of age upwards; he appointed unto them, by direction from the LORD, such Princes and Leaders, as in Worth and Reputation were in everie Tribe most eminent. The number number of the whole Army was 603550. able men for the wars, besides women and children; also, besides the strangers which followed them out of Egypt. This great Army was divided by Moses into four groffe and mighty Battalions, each of which contained the strength of three whole Tribes.

The first of these containing 186400. able men, consisted of three Regiments, which may well, in respect of their numbers, be called Armies; as containing the three whole Tribes of Judah, Issachar and Zabulon. In the Tribe of Judah were 74600. fighting men, led by Nathaniel: in Issachar 54400. led by Nathaniel: in Zabulon 57400. led by Eliab. All these marched under the Standard of the Tribe of Judah, who held the Vaunt-guard, and was the first that moved and marched, being lodged and quartered at their general incamping on the East side of the Army, which was held the first place, and of greatest dignity.

The second Battalion or Army, called in the Scriptures the host of Reuben, had joyned unto it Simeon and Gad, in number 151450. All which marched under the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe of Reuben were 46500. under Elizur: in Simeon 59300. under Shelumiel: in Gad 45650. under Eliasaph: These had the second place, and incamped on the South-side of the Tabernacle.

The third Army marched under the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were joyned the Regiments of Manasse and Benjamin; who joyned together, made in number 108100. able men. These marched in the third place, incamping on the West quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500. under Elisbam: Manasse 32200. under Gamliel: Benjamin 35400. under Abidun.

The fourth and last Army, or Squadron, of the generall Army, containing 157600. able men, marched under the Standard of Dan; to whom were joyned the two Tribes of Nephthali and Asher. And these had the Rere-ward, and moved last, incamping on the North-side. Dan had 62700. under Ahiezer: Asher 41500. under Pagiel: Nephthali 53400. under Ahira.

Besides these Princes of the several Tribes, there were ordained Captains over Thousands, over Hundreds, over Fifties, and over Tens; as it may appear by that mutinie and insurrection against Moses; Num. 16. v. 1 & 2. For there arose up against Moses 250. Captains of the Assembly, famous in the Congregation, and men of renown: of which number were Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Which three principall Mutiners, with those 250. Captains that followed them, were not any of the 12. Princes of the Tribes or generall Colonels before spoken of, as by their names, Num. 1. is made manifest.

The blessing which Israel gave to his children, took place not only in the division of the Land of promise, and other things of more consequence, long after following; but even in sorting them under their severall Standards in the wilderness it was observed. For Judah had the precedency & the greatest Army, which also was wholly compounded of the Sons of Leah, Jacobs wife. Reuben having lost his birth-right, followed in the second place, accompanied with his brother Simeon, who had undergone his Fathers blessings; and with Gad, the son of his Mothers Hand-maid. Joseph, who in temporall blessings had the prerogative of the first born a double portion, was accounted as two Tribes, and divided into two Regiments: the younger (according to Jacobs prophecy) taking place before the elder, he was assisted by Benjamin, his best beloved brother, the other son of Rachel. To Dan, the eldest son of Jacobs Concubines, was given the leading of the fourth Army, according to Jacobs prophecy. He had with him under his Standard none of the Children of Leah, or Rachel, but only the sons of the Hand-maids.

In the middle of these four Armies, was the Tabernacle, or portable Temple of the Congregation carried, surrounded by the Levites. Neer unto which, as the Heathens and Pagans could not approach, by reason of these four powerful Armies which guarded the same: so was it death for any of the children of Israel to come neer it, who were not of the Levites, to whom the charge was committed. So sacred was the moveable Temple of God, and with such reverence guarded and transported, as 20000. persons were dedicated to the service & attendance thereof: of which 8580. had the peculiar charge, according to their severall offices and functions; the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the Armies of the people observed the former order in their incampings: so did the Levites quarter themselves, as in an inner square, on every side of the Tabernacle: the Gershonites on the West, within the Army, and and Standard of Ephraim, over whom Eliasaph commanded, in number 7500. The Family of Cohath on the South-side guided by Elizaphan, within the Army of Reuben, and between him and the Tabernacle, in number 8600. The third company were of the Family of Merari, over whom Zurriel commanded, in number 6200. and these were lodged on the North-side, within the Army of Dan; on the East-side, and next within those Tribes and Forces which Judah led, did Moses and Aaron lodge, and their children, who were the first and immediate Commanders, both of the Ceremonies and of the people; under whom, as the chief of all the other Levitical Families, was Eleazar the son of Aaron, his successour in the high Priest-hood.

10 This was the order of the Army of Israel, and of their incamping and marching; the Tabernacle of God being alway set in the middle & center thereof. The reverend care which Moses the Prophet, and chosen servant of God, had in all that belonged even to the outward and least parts of the Tabernacle, Ark and Sanctuary, witnessed well the inward and most humble zeale born towards God himself. The industry used in the framing thereof, and every, and the least part thereof; the curious workmanship thereon bestowed; the exceeding charge and expence in the provisions; the dutifull observance in the laying up, and preserving the holy Vessels; the solemn removing thereof; the vigilant attendance thereon, and the provident defence of the same, which all Ages have in some degree imitated, is now so forgotten and cast away in this super-fine Age, by those of the Family, by the Anabaptists, Brownists, and other Sectaries, as all cost and care bestowed and had of the Church, wherein God is to be served and worshipped, is accounted a kind of Popery, and as proceeding from an idolatrous disposition: inasmuch as time would soon bring to passe (if it were not resisted) that God would be turned out of Churches into Barns, and from thence again into the Fields and Mountains, & under the hedges; and the offices of the Ministry, robbed of all dignity and respect, be as contemptible as those places; all Order, Discipline, and Church-government, left to newnesse of opinion, and mens fancies: yea, and soon after, as many kinds of Religions would spring up, as there are Parish-Churches within England: every contentious and ignorant person clothing his fancy with the Spirit of God, and his imagination with the gift of Revelation; inasmuch, as when the Truth, which is but one, shall appear to the simple multitude, no lesse variable than contrary to it self, the Faith of men will soon after die away by degrees, and all Religion be held in scorn and contempt. Which distraction gave a great Prince of Germany cause of this answer to those that perwaded him to become a Lutheran; Si me adjungo vobis, tunc condemnor ab aliis: si me alius adjungo, a vobis condemnor; quid fugiam video, sed quid sequar, non habeo: If I adjoin my self to you, I am condemned by others; If I joyn with others, I am condemned by you: what I should avoid I see, but I know not what I should follow.

§. II.

The offerings of the twelve Princes: the Passover of the second year: the departing of Jethro.

40 Now when Moses had taken order for all things necessary, provided for the service of God, written the lawes, numbered his Army, and divided them into the battells and troops before remembered, and appointed them Leaders of all sorts; The twelve Princes or Commanders of the Tribes brought their offerings before the Lord, to wit, six covered Chariots, and twelve Oxen to draw them, therein to transport, as they marched, the parts of the Tabernacle, with all that belonged therunto, the Sanctuary excepted, which for reverence was carried upon the shoulders of the sons of Korah, to whom the charge was committed; and the Chariots, in which was conveyed the other parts of the Tabernacles and Vessels thereto belonging, were delivered to the Levites for that service, namely, to the Sons of Gersham and Merari.

Besides these Chariots, each of these Commanders, Princes, or heads of Tribes, offered unto God, and for his service in the Temple, a Charger of fine silver, weighing 130. shekels; a silver Bowle of 70. shekels, after the shekel of the Sanctuary; and an Incense-Cup of Gold, of ten shekels, which they performed at the same time when the Altar was dedicated unto God by Aaron: and before they marched from Sinai towards Side of the Sanctuary (as it is expounded, Exod. 30. 13.) containeth 20. Gerahs, so a Sanctuary Sicle of Silver is about 7. groats, the common Sicle is but half, i. 4. much, to wit, ten Gerahs: as it is usually expounded; though Villalpandus labours to prove that the common and the Sanctuary Sicle were all one, Num. 5. 5. Num. 10. 11. Exod. 24. 4. Num. 9. 17.

their conquest; besides the beasts which they offered for sacrifice, according to the law Ceremoniall, the weight of all the twelve silver Chargers, and twelve silver Bowls, amounting unto 2400. shekels of silver; and the weight of gold in the Incense-Cups, to amount unto 2400. shekels of silver; and the weight of gold in the Incense-Cups, to amount unto 2400. shekels of silver; which makes of shekels of silver 1200. every shekel of gold valuing ten of silver, so that the whole of gold and silver which they offered at this time, was about four hundred and twenty pound sterling. This done, Moses, as in all the rest, by the Spirit of God conducted, gave order for the celebrating of the Paschever, which they performed on the fourteenth day of the second moneth of the second year: and on the twentieth day of the same, the cloud was lifted up from above the Tabernacle, as a signe of going forward; Moses beginning his march with this invocation to God: 10
Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered; and let them that hate thee, flee before thee. Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered; and let them that hate thee, flee before thee.
 Then all the people of Israel removed from their incamping at the foot of the Mountain Sinai, towards Paran, the Army, or great Squadron of Juda, led by Naasson, taking the Vant-guard, followed by Nathaniel and Eliab, Leaders of the Tribes of Issachar and the Zabulon: after whom the rest marched, as in the figure exprest. And because the passage through so many deserts and mountains, was exceeding difficult: Moses leaving nothing un-forethought, which might serve for the advancement of his enterprise, he instantly intreated his Father in Law, whom in the tenth of Numbers he calleth Hobab, to accompany them in their journey towards Canaan; promising him such part and profit of the enterprise, as God should bestow on them: for this man, as he was of 20 great understanding and judgement (as appeared by the counsell he gave to Moses for the appointing of Judges over the people) so was he a perfect guide in all those parts, himself inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian, or Madian: and (as it seemeth) a man of great years and experience; for he was then the Priest or Prince of Midian, when Moses fled first out of Egypt, and married his Daughter, which was 42. years before this request made. And though Moses himself had lived 40. years in these parts of Arabia, through which he was now to travel: yet the better to assure his passage, and to great a multitude of souls, which could not be so few as a million, it was necessary to use many guides, and many conductors. To this request of Moses, it may seem by the places, Exod. 18. 27. and Num. 10. 30. that Jethro, otherwise called Hobab, yielded 30 not: for it is evident, that he went back from Moses into his own Country. But because it appeareth by other places of Scripture, that the posterity of this Hobab was mingled with the Israelites, it is most likely that this his return to his own Country, was rather to fetch away his Family, and to take his leave of his own Country, by setting things in order, than to abide there.

The voyage from Horeb to Kades: the Mutinies by the way: and the cause of their turning back to the Red Sea.

AFTER this dismissal of Hobab, Israel began to march towards the Desarts of Paran: 40
 And after three daies wandering, they late down at the Sepulchres of lust, afterward called Taberah or Incesso: by reason that God consumed with fire those Mutinies and Murmurers which rose up in this remove, which happened about the 23. day of the same month. And from this 23. day of the second month, of the second year, they rested & fed themselves with quails (which it pleased God by a Sea-wind to cast upon them) to the 24. day of the third month: to wit, all the month of Siman, or June: whereof surfeiting there died great numbers: from whence in the following moneth, called Thar, 50
Moses, answering to our July, they went on to Hazereth, where Miriam the sister of Moses was stricken with the leprosie, which continued upon her seven daies, after whose recovery Israel removed toward the border of Idumaea, and incamped at Rithma, neer Kades 50
Barna, from whence Moses sent the twelve discoverers into the Territory of Canaan, both to inform themselves of the fertility and strength of the Country; as also to take knowledge of the Waies, Passages, Rivers, Fords, and Mountains. For Arad King of the Canaanites surprized divers companies of the Israelites, by lying in ambush neer those waies, through which the discoverers of Kades, the wrath of God was turned past. Now, after the return of the discoverers of Kades, the wrath of God was turned against Israel; whose ingratitude & rebellion after his so many benefits, so many remissions, so many miracles wrought, was such, as they esteemed their deliverance from the

the Egyptian slavery, his feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible wilderness (for so Moses calleth it) with the victory which he gave them against the powerfull Amalekites, to be no other than the effects of his hatred, thinking that he led them on and preserved them, but to bring them, their wives, and children to be slaughtered, and given for a prey and spoyle to the Amorites or Canaanites. For it was reported unto them, by the searchers of the Land, that the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many strong Towers and Castles; that many of the people were Cynlike, (for they confest that they saw the sons of Anac there) who were men of fearfull stature, and so far over-topped the Israelites, as they appeared to them, and to themselves, but as Grahhoppers in their respect. Now, as this mutiny exceeded all the rest, wherein they both accused God, and consulted to choose them a Captaine (or as they call it now adays, an Elcho) to carry them back again into Egypt; so did God punish the same in a greater measure, than any of the former. For he extinguished every soul of the whole multitude (Josua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promises, persuaded the people to enter Canaan, being then neer it; and at the mountain foot of Idumaea, which is but narrow; laying before them the fertility thereof, and assuring them of victory. But as men, whom the passion of fear had bereaved both of reason and common sense, they threatned to stone these encouragers to death; accounting them as men either desperate in themselves, or betrayers of the lives, goods, and children of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God resisted these wicked purposes, and interposing the fear of his bright glory before the unadvised fury of the multitude, and the innocency and constancy of his servants, preserved them thereby from their violence; threatening an intire destruction, of the whole Nation, by sending among them a consuming and mercilese pestilence. For this was the tenth insurrection and rebellion, which they had made, since God delivered them from the slavery of the Egyptians. But Moses (the mildest or meekest of all men) prayed unto God to remember his infinite mercies; alledging, that this so severe a judgment, how deservedly soever inflicted, would increase the pride of the Heathen Nations, and give them occasion to vaunt, that the God of Israel, failing in power to perform his promises, suffered them to perish in these barren and fruitlesse Desarts. Yet as God is no lesse just than mercifull, as God 30 is slow to anger, so is his wrath a consuming fire; the same being once kindled by the violent breath of mans ingratitude; and therefore, as with a hand less heave than hoped for, he scourged this inquiry; so by the measure of his glory (evermore jealous of neglect and derision) he suffered not the wicked to passe unpunished; reserving his compassion for the innocent: whom, because they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, he was pleased to preserve, and in them to perform his promises, which have never been frustrate.

§. III.

Of their unwillingnesse to return: with the punishment thereof, and of divers accidents in the return.

NOW when Moses had revealed the purposes of God to the people, and made them know his heave displeasure towards them, they began to bewaile themselves, though overlate: the times of grace & mens repentance, having also their appointment. And then when God had left them to themselves, and was no more among them, after they had so often plaid and dallied with his mercifull sufferings, they would needs amend their former disobedience by a second contempt, and make offer to enter the Land contrary againe to the advice of Moses, who assured them that God was not 50 among them; and that the Ark of his covenant should not move, but by his direction, who could not erre; and that the enemies sword, which God had hitherto bended and rebated, was now left no lesse sharp than death; and in the hands of the Amalekites and Canaanites, no lesse cruell. But as men from whom God hath with-drawn his grace, do alwaies follow those counsels which carry them to their own destructions: so the Hobren, after they had forsaken the opportunity by God and their Conductors offered, and might then have entered Judea before their enemies were prepared and joyne'd; did afterward, contrary to Gods commandment, undertake the enterprise of themselves, and ran head-long and without advice into the mountains of Idumaea. There the the Canaanites and the Amalekites being joyned, and attending their advantage, set on them, brake them, and of their numbers slaughtered the greatest part: and following their victory and pursuit, consumed them all the way of their flight, even unto Hormab: the Amalekites in revenge of their former losse, and overthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites to prevent their displantation and destruction threatened. Of which powerful assembly of those two Nations (assisted in all likelihood with the neighbour kings, joined together for their common safety) it pleased God to forewarn Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For he commanded him to return by those painfull passages of the Deserts, through which they had formerly travelled, till they found the banks of the red Sea again: in which retreat before they came back 10 to passe over Jordan, there were consumed 38. yeeres; and the whole number of the 600. and odd thousand, which came out of Egypt (Moses, Josua, and Caleb excepted, were dead in the Wilderness, the stubborn and carelesse generations were wholly worn out, and the promised Land bestowed on their children; which were increased to 600000. and more. For besides the double fault, both of refusing to enter the Land upon the return of their discoverers, and the presumption then to attempt it, when they were countermanded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatry of worshipping Moloch, and the Host of Heaven. For although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doth the Martyr Stephen; as also that the Israelites worshipped the Sun and Moon in after-times, it is proved out of sundry other places.

Numb. 33.

Now after the broken Companies were returned to the Camp at Cades, Moses according to the commandment received from God, departed towards the South from whence he came, to recover the shoars of the Red Sea. And so from Cades or Rithma, he removed to Remmonparez, so called of abundance of Pomegranates there found, and divided among them. From whence he went on to Libnah, taking that name of the Frankincense there found. From Libnah he crost the Valley, and late down at Refsa, near the foot of the mountain. And after he had rested there, he bended towards the West, and incamped at Ceclatus; where one of the Hebrews, for gathering broken wood on the Sabbath, was stoned to death. After which, Moses alwaies keeping the Valley, between two great ledges of mountains, (those which bound the Desert of Sin, and those 10 of Pharan) crost the same from Ceclatus, and marched Eastward to the mountain of Sap-her, or Sepher: this making the twentieth mansion. From thence he passed on to Hiradus; then to Muceloth; and then to Thibab, and so to Thura or Thare; the foure and twentieth mansion. Where Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutiny of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram; who for their contempt of God and his Ministers, were some of them swallowed up alive, and by the Earth, opening her mouth, devoured; others, even two hundred and fifty which offered incense with Korah, were consumed with fire from Heaven; and 14700. of their party, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest marvels and judgements of God, that hath been shewed in all the time of Moses his government, or before. For among so grata a multitude, those lay-men, who would have usurped Ecclesiastical authority, were suddenly swallowed up alive into the Earth, with their Families and goods; even while they fought to overthrow the Order, Discipline, and Power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliously contending against the High Priest & Magistrate, to whom God had committed the government both of his Church, and Common-weale of his people. And the better to assure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirm them, it pleased him in this place also to approve by miracle the former election of his servant Aaron, by the 12. Rods given in by the Heads of the 12. Tribes; of which Moses received one of every Head, and Prince of his Tribe: which being all withered and dried Wands, and on every rod the name of the Prince of the 15 Tribe written, and Aaron on that of Levi, it pleased God, that the rod of Aaron received by his power a vegetable spirit, and having lain in the Tabernacle of the Congregation, before the Ark one night, had on it both Buds, Blossoms, and ripe Almonds.

From Tharab the whole Army removed to Methraza; and thence to Ejmonas; and thence to Moferoth, (or Mafurit, after S. Hierome) and from Moferoth to Benejacan; and so to Gadgad, which Hierome calleth Gadgada; thence to Jetabata, the thirtieth Mansions; where from certain fountains of water gathered in one, Adrichomius maketh a River, which falleth into the Red Sea, between Madian and Afongaber.

Now

Now although it be very probable, that at Afongaber, where Solomon furnished his Fleets for the East India, there was store of fresh water; and though Hierodotus maketh 10 mention of a great River in Arabia the stonie, which he calleth Corys, from whence (saith he) the inhabitants convey water in pipes of leather to other places, by which device the King of Arabia relieved the Army of Cambyses: yet is Adrichomius greatly deceived, as many times he is, in finding these Springs at Gadgad, or Jetabata, being the nine and twentieth or thirtieth Mansion. For it was at Pumon, that those Springs are spoken of, which in Deuteronomy the tenth, and the seventh Verse, is also called Jetabata, or Joibath, a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the River Zared, the next adjoining. And that these Springs should fall into the Red Sea at Afongaber, or Eloth, I cannot beleeve, for the way thither is very long. And this I finde in Belonius, that there are divers Torrents of fresh water in those sandy parts of Arabia: which though they continue their course for a few miles, yet they are drunk up by the hot and thirsty sand, before they can recover the banks of the Red Sea.

From Jetabata, Moses directed his journey towards the Red Sea, and incamped at Hebrona, and from thence to Efongaber: which City in Josephus time had the name of Berenice; and in Hieromes, Esfia. From thence, keeping the Sea, and Eloth on his right hand, he turned towards the North, as he was by God commanded: Ef- 10 ongabere being the farthest place towards the South-East, that Moses travelled in that passage.

It seemeth that Efongaber, or Afongaber, Eloth and Madian, were not at this time in the possession of the Kings of Edom. For it is said, That the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron in the mount Hor, near the coast of the Land of Edom; so as the Mount Hor was at this time in the South border of Idumaea. And if Efongaber, and the other places near the Red Sea, had at this present been subject unto the Idumeans, Moses would also have demanded a free passage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumeans obtained those places: for it is said: And they arose out of Midian, and came to Paran, and took men with them; which were those companies that followed young Adam of 10 Idumaea into Egypt, when he fled from Joab. Likewise it is said of Solomon, that he made a Navie of ships in Efongaber, besides Eloth, in the Land of Edom.

Of Moses arrivall at Zin Kades: and of the accidents while that they abode there.

From Efongaber he turned again towards the North, and pitched in the Wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesb: or in Beroth, of the children of Jacans, where they late down 40 in the first month of the fortieth year, after they left Egypt. For at the next Mansion Aaron died in the first day of the fifth month of the fortieth year: the nine and thirtieth year taking end at Efongaber. And at this City of Cades (for so it was thought to be) or near it, died Miriam, or Mary, Moses sister, whose Sepulchre was to be seen in Saint Hieromes time, as himself avoweth. From hence ere they departed to the mountain Hor, all the people murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scarcity of water. For neither the punishments by fire from Heaven; by being devoured and swallowed up by the earth; by the sudden pestilence, which often seized them; nor any miracle formerly shewing, either the love or wrath of God, could prevail with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and satisfied in every of 50 their appetites: but in stead of seeking for help and relief at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and casting ungratefully on Moses all their misadventures; yea, though they well knew that their own fathers had left their bodies in the Deserts, and that they were now entred into the fortieth year, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in the sight of the Land promised, they again as obstinately tempted God as in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of God are without beginning ; so his mercies being without end, he commanded Moses to strike a Rock adjoining with his rod ; and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselves and their cattell were satisfied. Nevertheless, because God perceived a kinde of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron at this place ; therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised , whereto perchance their worldly desires might invite them. But it pleased him to end the travells of Aaron at the Mountain Hor, being the next, and the four and thirtieth Station. At which Mountain of Hor, Aaron was despoiled of the garments of his Priest-hood, and the same put on Eleazar his son, as God had commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar descended the Mountain ; but God received Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more seen.

Nem. 33.

Of this Mountain called Hor, otherwise Mosera, as in Deuteronomy 10. Verse 6. those Horites took name which the Idumæans had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mosera, which was the seven and twentieth Mansion ; and Mosera, which they write Moseroth for difference, which was the four and thirtieth Mansion, and is also called Hor, to be two distinct places : because Moses in passing from Cadeshbarne towards Eziongaber, incamped at Mosera, after he departed from Hesmona, and before he came to Benjaacan. And this Mosera, which is also called Hor, he came unto after he left Cades, where Miriam, Moses sister died ; the first being the seven and twentieth, and the second being the four and thirtieth Mansion. But for Hor, which is also called Mosera, it should have been written, Hor juxta Mosera ; Hor neer Mosera : for it is but one root of a Mountain, divided into divers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are : Whereof the West part Moses calleth Mosera, and the East part Horeb. By the West part Moses encamped, as he past towards the Red Sea on his left hand ; by the East part, as he went back again North-wards towards Moab : as in the description of Moses his passage through Arabia, the Reader may perceive.

Now it was from Cades, before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, that Moses sent messengers to the Prince of Idumæa, praying him that he might pass with the people of Israel through his Territory into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the nearest way of all other from the city of Kadesh, where Moses then encamped ; whereas otherwise, taking his journey by the Rivers of Zared, Arnon, and Jordan, he might have run into many hazzards in the passage of those Rivers, the far way about, and the many powerfull Kings, which commanded in those Regions. Now the better to persuade the Prince of Idumæa hereunto, Moses remembered him, that he was of the same race and family with Israel : calling him by the name of brother, because both the Edomites and Israelites were the sons of one father, to wit, Isaac ; inferring thereby that he had more reason to favour and respect them, than he had to assist the Canaanites ; against whom Esaü his Ancestor had made war, and driven out the Horites (who were of their ancient races descended of Cham) out of the Region of Seir, calling it by his own name Edom, or Edumæa. He also making a short repetition of Gods blessings bestowed on them, and of his purposes and promises ; assured Edom, or the King thereof, that he would no way offend his people, or waste his Country, but that he would restrain his Army within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high wayes, paying money for whatsoever he used, yea, even for the water, which themselves or their cattell should drink. For Moses was commanded by God, not to provoke the children of Esaü. But the King of Edumæa knowing the strength of his own Country, the same being near Canaan, rampir'd with high and sharp mountains : and withall suspecting, as a naturall wife man, that 600000. strangers being once entred his Country, it would rest in their wills to give him law, resolutely refused them passage, and delivered this answer to the Messengers : That, if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and resist them by all possible means. And not knowing whether such a denial might satisfie or exasperate, he gathered the strength of his Country together, and shewed himself prepared to defend their passage. For, as it is written ; Then Edom came out against him (to wit, Moses) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Moses considering, that the end of his enterprize was not the conquest of Seir or Edumæa, and that the Land promised was that of Canaan : like unto himself who was of naturall understanding the greatest of any man, and the skillfullest man of war that the world world had, he refused to adventure the Army of Israel against a Nation, which being overcome, gave but a passage to invade others ; and which, by reason of the fear of their mountainous Country, could not but have endangered, or (at least) greatly enfeebled the strength of Israel, and rendred them lesse able, if not altogether powerlesse, to have conquered the rest.

§. V I.

Of their compassing Idumæa, and travelling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

HE therefore leaving the way of Idumæa, turned himself towards the East, and marched towards the Desarts of Moab. Which when Arad King of the Canaanites understood, and that Moses had blanced the way of Idumæa ; and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom, which Israel aimed at, he thought it safest, rather to find his enemies in his neighbours Country, than to be found by them in his own : which he might have done with a far greater hope of victory, had Moses been enforced first to have made his way by the Sword through Idumæa, and thereby, though victorious, greatly have lessened his numbers. But although it fell out otherwise than Arad hoped for, yet being resolved to make triall, what courage the Israelites brought with them out of Egypt, before they came nearer his own home ; leading the strength of his Nation to the edge of the Desert, he set upon some part of the Army ; which, for the multitude occupied a great space, and for the many herds of cattell that they drave with them, could not encamp so neer together, but that some quarter or other was evermore subject to surprise. By which advantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance unexpected, he slew some few of the Israelites, and carried with him many prisoners.

Now it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predecessour, which joyned his forces with the Amalekites, and gave an overthrow to those mutinous Israelites, which without direction from God by Moses, would have entred Canaan from Cadeshbarne. For it seemeth that the greatest number of that Army were of the Canaanites, because in the first of Deuteronomy 44. the Amorites are named alone without the Amalekites, and are said to have beaten the Israelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the same that had a victory over Israel, neer Cadeshbarne ; or if it were his Predecessour that then prevailed ; this man finding that Moses was returned from the Red Sea, and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was first to be invaded, and in danger of being conquered, not knowing of Moses purpose to compass Moab, determined while he was yet in the Desert, to trie the quarrell. And whereas it followeth in the third Verse of the twelfth Chapter of Numbers, that the Israelites utterly destroyed the Canaanites and their Cities, they are much mistaken that think, that this destruction was presently performed by the Israelites. But it is to be understood, to have been done in the future, to wit, in the time of Joshua. For had Moses at this time entred Canaan in the pursuit of Arad, he would not have fallen back again into the Desarts of Zared and Arnon, and have fetcht a wearisome and needlesse compasse, by the rivers of Zared and Arnon.

Neither is their conjecture to be valued at any thing, which affirm, that Arad did not inhabit any part of Canaan it self, but that his Territory lay without it, and neer the Mountain Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt : which South part of Canaan was the North part of Edom.

Again, Horma (so far as the Israelites after their victory pursued the Canaanites) is so seated in the South of Judea. There is also a City of that name in Simeon. But there is no such place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutiny which followed presently after the repetition of this victory, it were enough to prove, that the same was obtained in the future, and in Joshua his time, and not at the instant of Arads assault. For had the Israelites at this time sackt the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day have complained for want of water and bread. For where there are great Cities, there is also water and bread. But it was in the time of Joshua, that the Israelites took their revenge, and after they had past Jordan : Joshua then governing them ; who in the twelfth Chapter and fourteenth Verse, nameth this Arad by the name of his City so called; and with him the King of Horma: to which place the Israelites pursued the Canaanites. And he nameth them amongst those Kings, which he vanquished, and put to death.

Now after this assault and surprize by Arad, Moses finding that all entrance on that side was defended, he led the people Eastward to compasse Idumea and the Dead Sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the Plaines of Moab, at that time in the possession of the Amorites. But the Israelites, to whom the very name of a Desert was terrible, began again to rebell against their Leader; till God by a multitude of fiery Serpents, (thatis, by the biting of Serpents, whose venom inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error, and afterward, according to his plentiful grace, cured them¹⁰ againe by their beholding an artificiall Serpent, by his Commandment set up.

From the Mount Hor, Moses leaving the ordinary way which lyeth between the Red Sea, and Cælojyria, encamped at Salmona: and thence he removed to Phunon, where he erected the Brazen Serpent; making these journeys by the edge of Idumea, but without it. For Phunon was sometime a principall City of the Edomites. Now where it is written in Numbers 21. Verse 4. That from Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieved the people, it was not thereby meant that the Israelites turned back towards the Red Sea; neither did they march (according to Fonsæca) per viam que habet à latere mare rubrum; By the way that sided the Red Sea, but indeed they crost, and went athwart the common way from Galaad, Tracontis, and the Countries of Moab, to the Red Sea, that²⁰ is, to Esfongaber, Eloth, and Midian: which way, as it lay North and South, so Israel to shun the border of Edom, and to take the utmost East part of Moab, crost the common way towards the East, and then they turned againe towards the North, as before.

From Phunon he went to Oboth; where they entred the Territory of Moab, adjoining to the Land of Suph a Country bordering on the Dead Sea; and from thence to Abarim, the eight and thirtieth Mansion, that is, where the Mountains so called take beginning, and are as yet but small Mountrures of Hills, on the East border of Moab; from thence they recovered Dibon Gad, or the River of Zared, which riseth in the mountains of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not far from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And having past that River, they lodged at Dibon Gad,³⁰ and from thence they kept the way to Diblatbaim, one of the Cities of Moab; which Hieremie the Prophet Chap. 48. Verse 22. calleth the House of Diblatbaim, the same which afterward was destroyed among the rest by Nabuchadnezzar. From thence they came to the River of Arnon, and encamped in the mountains of Abarim: though in the 22. of Numbers, Moses doth not remember Helmondiblatbaim, but speaketh of his remove from the River of Zared, immediately to the other side of Arnon; calling Arnon the border of Moab, between them and the Amorites: speaking, as he found the state of the Country at that time. For Arnon was not anciently the border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites, by Sehon King of the Amorites: even from the Predecessour of Balac Peer then reigning. From Diblatbaim, Moses sent messengers to Sehon King of the Amorites, to desire a passage through his Countrie: which though he knew would be denied him, yet he desired to give a reason to the neighbour Nations of the war he undertook. And though Edom had refused him as Sehon did, yet he had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moses also in sending messengers to Sehon, observed the same precept which he left to his posterity and successours, for a law of the war; namely, in Deut. 20. 10. in these words; When thou comest neer unto a City to fight against it, thou shalt offer it peace, which if it do accept of and open unto thee, then let all the people found therein be tributaries unto thee, and serve thee; but if it refuse, &c. thou shalt smite all the males thereof with the edge of the sword. Which ordinance all Commanders of Armies have observed to this day, or ought to have done.⁵⁰

Of the Book of the battels of the Lord mentioned in this Story, and of other Books mentioned in Scripture, which are lost.

Now concerning the War between Israel and Sehon, Moses seemeth to refer a great part of this Story to that Book intituled, Liber bellorum Domini; The book of Gods battels: and therefore passeth over many encounters, and other things memorable with with greater brevity in this place. His words after the Geneva Translation are these: Wherefore it shall be spoken in the book, of the battels of the Lord, what things he did in the Red Sea, and in the Rivers of Arnon. The Vulgar copie differeth not in sense from this: But the Greek Septuagint vary. For the Greek writes it to this effect; For thus it is said in the book: The war of the Lord hath burnt (or inflamed) Zoob, and the brooks of Arnon. Junius for the Red Sea, which is in the Genevan and Vulgar Edition, names the Region of Num. 21. * Suph, a Countrey bordering the Dead Sea towards the East, as he conjectureth. The Text he readeth thus. Idcirco dici solent in recessione bellorum Jehovæ, contra Vahebun cœ more, clia, in Region: Suph: & contra Flumina, Flumina Arnonis; 7 therefore it is spoken in repeating of 10. l. 2. and of the force of the word Sa-hal-fo ch. 12. l. 1. 3. 10 the battels of Jehovah, against Vaheb in the Countrey of Suph: and against the Rivers, the Rivers of Arnon. In which words hee understandeth, that amongst the wars which the Lord disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous memorie in the mouth of most men, concerning the war of Sehon against Vaheb, the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Countrey neer Arnon, out of the possession of the Moabites. For this Vaheb was the immediate predecessour of Balac, who lived with Moses: though it be written that this Balac was the son of Zippor, and not of Vaheb. 1 Chron. 12. It seems (as it is plain in the succession of the Edomites) that these Kingdoms were elective, and not successive. And as Junius in this translation understandeth no speciall Book of the battels of the Lord: so others, as Vatablus in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any speciall Book be meant; and if any, whether it be not a prediction of wars in future ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the book of Judges. Syracides, cap. 46. tells us plainly, that those battels of the Lord were fought by Joshua: Who was there (saith he) before him like to him? for he fought the battels of the Lord. But seeing the Histories of the Scripture elsewhere often palle over matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other books written of the same matter at large: therefore it seemeth probable, that such a book as this there was; wherein the severall victories by Israel obtained, and also victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the same should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other 30 Volumes, filled with divine discourse, have perished in the long race of time, or have been destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magistrate. For the books of Henoah, howsoever they have been in later ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembered in an Epistle of Thaddæus, and cited by Origen æi appen, and by Tertullian.

That work also of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formation, which others bestow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The Books remembered by Joshua, cap. 10. v. 13. and in the second of Samuel, c. 1. v. 18. called the Book of Jasher, or Juslorum, is also lost; wherein the stay of the Sun and Moon in the middle of the Heavens is recorded, and how they stood still till Israel had avenged themselves of their enemies: out of which also David took the precept of teaching the children of Juda, to exercise their bowes against their enemies.

Some think this to be the book of eternal Predestination, in which the just are written, according unto the sixty and ninth Psalme, v. 28. where it is said: Let them be put out of the Book of Life, neither let them be written with the righteous. Hierome thinks, that David by this Book understood those of Samuel; Rabbi Solomon, that the books of the Law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the just Abraham, of Isaac, Jacob, and Moses are written. Others, that it was the book of Exodus. Others, as Theodore, that it was a Commentary upon Joshua, by an unknown Author.

The book of Chozai, concerning Manasse, remembered in the second of Chron. cap. 33. v. 18. & 19. Of this book, also lost, Hierome conceives, that the Prophet Esay was the Author.

The same mischance came as well to the Story of Solomon, written by Abia Silonites, who met with Jeroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdom of Israel from the son of Solomon: As to the books of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of Isaiah the Seer, remembered in the second of Chron. c. 9. v. 29. With these have the books of She-maiah and of Isido, remembered in the second of Chron. c. 12. v. 15. perished: and that of Jehuth the son of Hanani, of the acts of Jehoshaphat, cited in the second of Chron. cap. 20. v. 34. Also that book of Solomon which the Hebrews write Hafcirim, of 5000. verses, 1 Chron. 12.

of which that part called Canticum Canticorum, onely remaineth, 1 Kings 4. 32. and with this divers others of Solomon's works have perished, as his Book of the natures of Trees, Plants, Beasts, Fishes, &c. 1 Kings 4. 33. with the rest remembered by Origen, Josephus, Hierome, Cedrenus, Cicero, Africanus, Picinus, Mirandula, and others.

Of these and other Books many were consumed with the same fire, wherewith Nebuchadnezzar burnt the Temple of Hierusalem. But let us return thither where we left.

§. VIII.

Of Moses his sparing the issue of Lot; and of the Giants in those parts; and of Schon 18 and Og.

Deut. 2. 5, 10,
11, 12.

When Moses had past Arnon, he incamped on the other side thereof at Abarim, opposite to the City of Nibo; leaving the City of Midian on the left hand, and attempting nothing upon the Moabites on that side. For Moab did at this time inhabit on the South-side of Arnon, having lost all his ancient and best Territory, which was now in the possession of Schon the Amorite. For Moses was commanded by God not to molest Moab, neither to provoke them to battaile, God having given that Land to the children of Lot; the same which was anciently possessed by the Emims, who were men of great stature, and comparable to those Giants called Anakims, or the sons of Anac.

Jos. 15. 5, 13,
14, 15.

God also commanded Moses to spare the Ammoniter, because they likewise were descended of Lot: who had expelled from thence those Giants, which the Ammonites called Zamzummims. For it seemeth that all that part, especially to the East of Jordan, even to the Desert of Arabia, as well on the West, as on the East-side of the Mountains of Gilead, was inhabited by Giants. And in the plantation of the Land promised, the Israelites did not at any time passe those Mountains to the East of Bajan, but left their Country to them, as in the description following is made manifest. We find also, that as there were many Giants both before and after the flood: so these Nations, which anciently inhabited both the border of Canaan, and the Land it self, had among them many Families of Giant-like men. For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which sometimes was called the City of Arbah, which Arbah in Josua is called the father of the Anakims; and the greatest man of the Anakims. There had also bin Giants in the Land of the Moabites, called Emims: and their chiefe City was Aroer or Ar, neere the River of Arnon. To the Giants of the Rephaims, the Ammonites gave the name of Zamzummims; which were of the same ancient Canaanites: and their chiefe City was Rabba, afterward Philadelphia. They were also called Zuzims, which is as much to say, as Viri robusti, horrendique Gigantes; Strong men, and fearfull Giants, who inhabited other Cities of Ham, or Hom, in the same Province, and not far to the North of Aroer.

Deut. 1. 8.

Now Moses having past Arnon, and being incamped at Abarim; and having (as before) sent to Schon, as he had done to Edom, to pray a passage through his Country, was denied it. For Schon being made proud by his former conquest upon the Moabites; which Nation the Amorites esteemed but as strangers and usurpers, (themselves being of the sons of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refused to grant Israel any entrance that way; and withall, prepared to encounter Moses with as much speed as he could, because Moses encamped in the Countrey of his new conquests, to wit, the Plains of Moab, the two and fortieth and last Mansion: which Moses waded with the multitude of his people and cattell. Towards him therefore halting himself, they encountered each other at Jabaz: where Schon with his children and people were broken and discomfited: and the victory so pursued by Moses, as few or none of the Amorites escaped. Hee also slaughtered all the Women and Children of the Amorites, which he found in Effsebon, and all the other Cities, Villages, or Fields; they being of the race of Canaan, as those of Bajan also were, and descended of Emorens, or Amorens: for Moses calleth the Basanites also Amorites. And although Israel might now have taken a ready way and passage into Judea, being at this time, and after this victory at the banks of Jordan: yet hee knew it to be perillous to leave so great a part of that Nation of the Amorites on his back, as inhabited all the Region of Bajan or Tracoonitis: and therefore he led on his Army to invade Og: a person of exceeding strength and stature, and the onely man of mark remaining of the ancient Giants of those parts, and who at that time had 60. Cities walled and defended: lying between the Mountain of Hermom (which Mountain, saith Moses, the Sidonians call Sbirion, and the Amorites, Sbenir) and the River of Jordan. And it befell unto the King of Bajan (who attended Moses coming at Edrei) as it did unto Schon: for he and his sons perished, and all his Cities were taken and posselt. After this, Moses with-drawing himself back again to the Mountains of Abarim, left the prosecution of that war unto Jair the son of Manasse: who conquering the East parts of Bajan, to wit, the Kingdom of Argob, even unto the Nations of the Geshuri and Machati, 60. walled Cities, called the same after his own name Havoth Jair: of all which conquests afterward the half Tribe of Manasse possessed the North part as far as Edrei, but the East part that belonged to Schon the Amorite, with the Mountains of Gilead adjoining, was given to Reuben, and unto Gad.

Of the troubles about the Madianites, and of Moses his death.

After these victories, and while Israel sojourned in the valley of Moab, the Madianites and Moabites (over both which Nations it seemeth that Balaam King of the Moabites then commanded in chief) sought, according to the advice of Balaam, both by alluring the Hebrews to the love of their daughters, and by perswading them to honour and serve their Idols, to divide them both in Love and Religion among themselves: thereby the better both to defend their own interest against them, as also to beat them out of Moab, and the Countries adjoining. The Israelites as they had ever been inclined, so were they now easily perswaded to these evill courses, and thereby drew on themselves the plague of pestilence, whereof there perished 24000. persons: besides which punishment of God, the most of the offenders among the Hebrews were by his commandment put to the Sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the son of Eleazar had pierced the bodies of Zimri, a Prince of the Simeonites, together with Cosbi, a Daughter of one of the chief of the Midianites, the plague ceased, and Gods wrath was appeased. For such was the love and kindnesse of his all-powerfulnesse, respecting the ardent zeal of Phineas in prosecuting of Zimri (who being a chief among the Hebrews, became an Idolater) as he forgave the rest of Israel, and stayed his hand for his sake.

In this valley it was that Moses caused the people to be numbred the third time: and there remained of able men fit to bear arms. 601730. of which as his last enterprise, he appointed 20000. to be chosen out, to invade the Cities of Midian, who, together with the Moabites, practised with Balaam to curse Israel: and after that, sought to allure them (as before remembered) from the worship of the true God, to the service of Beth-Peor: and to the rest of their barbarous Idolatry. Over which Companies of the five Princes of the Midianites, which were, or had lately been, the vassals of Schon, as appeareth by Josuah. These five Princes of the Midianites slain by Eleazar, were at this time but the vassals of Schon the Amorite, to wit, Evi, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Rera, the Dukes of Schon, saith Josuah. He slew also the men, male-children, and women: saving such as had not yet used the company of men, but those they saved, and dispersed them among the children of Israel to serve them.

And Moses having now lived 120. yeers, making both his own weaknesse of body known to the people, and his inability to travail: and also that he was forewarned of his end by the Spirit of God, from whom he received a new commandment to ascend the Mountains of Abarim, and thereon to render up his life: He hastned to settle the government in Josua: whom he perswaded with most lively arguments to prosecute the conquest begun, assuring him of Gods favour and assistance therein. And so having spent these his latter daies after the Conquest of Og, and Schon King of the Amorites, in the repetition and exposition of the Law, (or an iteration of the Law, according to Saint Augustine) using both arguments, prayers, and threats unto the people, which he often repeated unto them; thereby to confirm them in knowledge, love, fear, and service, of the all-powerfull God: He blessed the twelve Tribes, that of Simeon excepted, with severall and most comfortable blessings: praising the greatnesse and goodness ness of him, unto whom in his prayers he commended them: He also commanded the Priests to lay up the Book of the Law, by the side of the Ark of God: The last that he indited, was that Prophetick Song, beginning: Hearken ye Heavens, and I will speak, and let the Earth bear the words of my mouth: and being called by God from the labours and sorrows of this life, unto that rest which never afterward hath disquieted, he was buried in the Land of Moab, over against Beth-Peor: but no man knoweth of his Sepulchre to this day; which happened in the year of the World 2554.

Observations out of the Story of Moses, how God disposeth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest resistances, to the effecting of his purpose.

NOW let us a little, for instruction, look back to the occasions of sundry of the great events, which have been mentioned in this Story of the life of Moses, for (excepting Gods miracles, his promise, and fore-choice of this people) he wrought in all things else by the medium of mens affections, and naturall appetites. And so we shall finde that the fear which Pharaoh had of the increase of the Hebrews, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next naturall cause of the sorrows and losse, which befell himself, and the Egyptian Nation: which numbers when he fought by cruell and ungodly policies to cut off and lessen, as when he commanded all the male children of the Hebrews to be slain, God (whose providence cannot be resisted, nor his purposes prevented by all the foolish and salvage craft of mortall men) moved compassion in the heart of Pharaoh's own daughter, to preserve that child, which afterward became the most wise, and of all men the most gentle and mild, the most excellently learned in all Divine and Humane knowledge, to be the conductor and deliverer of his oppressed brethren, and the overthrow of Pharaoh, and all the flower of his Nation; even then, when he fought by the strength of his men of War, of his Horse, and Chariots, to tread them under, and bury them in the dust. The grief which Moses conceived of the injuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrews in his own presence, moved him to take revenge of the Egyptian that offered it: the ingratitude of one of his own Nation, by threatening him to discover the slaughter of the Egyptian, moved him to flee into Madian: the contention between the Shepherds of that place, and Jethro's Daughters, made him known to their Father; who not onely entertained him, but married him to one of those Sisters: and in that solitary life of keeping of his Father-in-Laws sheep, far from the presse of the World, contenting himself (though bred as a Kings Son) with the lot of a poor Hearde-man, God found him out in that Desert, wherein he first suffered him to live many yeers, the better to know the waies and passages through which he purposed that he should conduct his people, toward the Land promised: and therein appearing unto him, he made him know his will and divine pleasure for his return into Egypt. The like may be said of all things else, which Moses afterward by Gods direction performed in the Story of Israel before remembred. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may seem unto men as falling out by chance, and of no consequence, but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by: yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many yeers after, when the occasions are either not considered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their coming out of Egypt; and of the men of renown in other Nations, about the times of Moles and Josua, with the sum of the History of Josua.

How the Nations with whom the Israelites were to have War, were divers waies, as it were, prepared to be their enemies.

IN like manner if we look to the quality of the Nations, with whom the Israelites, after their coming out of Egypt, had to do, either in the Wildernesse, or afterward, we shall finde them long before-hand, by the disposing providence of God, as it were prepared for enmity: partly in respect that they were most of them of the issue of Canaan, or at least of Ham; and the rest (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Israelites) were mingled with them by mutual marriages: whereas the Israelites still continued strangers, and separate from them: and so partly in this respect, and partly by ancient injuries or enmities, and partly by reason of diversity in Religion, were these Nations, as it were prepared to be enemies to the Israelites: and so to serve for such purposes as God had reserved them for. To make these things more manifest, we must understand that this part of Syria, bounded by the mountains of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the same mountains continued as far as the Springs of Arnon on the East: by the way of Egypt, and the Red Sea, on the South: and by the Mediterran Sea on the West: was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one springing from the sons of Cham, the other from Sem: but those of Sem, were but as strangers therein for a long time, and came thither, in effect, but with one Family, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greatest part, were the Canaanites, the ancient Lords and possessors of those Territories, by proesse of time divided into severall Families and names: whereof some of them were of eminent stature and strength, as the Anakims, Zamzumanims, or Zuzim, Emims, Horites, and others. These (as men most valiant and able commonly do) did inhabit the utter borders and Mountains of their Countries: the rest were the Zidonians, Jebusites, Amorites, Hevites, Hetites, and others, who took name after the sons of Canaan, and after whom the Country in generall was still called.

As for the Hebrews which descended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another Family, and strangers in that Country, especially the Israelites: and this was some cause that the Canaanites did not affect them, or indure them, no more than the Philistims did, who descended also of Cham by Mizraim. For though Abraham himself being a stranger, was highly esteemed and honoured among them; especially by the Amorites of Moab, and inhabiting the West part of Jordan: yet now even they which descended from Abraham, or from his kindred, abode and multiplied in those parts, were alienated in affections from the Israelites, as holding them strangers and intruders: making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the rest of the issue of Cham, with whom they daily contracted affinity, than of their old pedigree from Abraham.

True it is, that these Nations descended of Abraham, or of his kindred, who had linked themselves, and marched with the Canaanites and others, had so far posselt themselves of the borders of those Regions, as they began to be equal in strength to the bordering Canaanites, if not superiour. For of Lot came those two great Families of the Moabites, and Ammonites: of Eshan the Idumeans: of Madian the Madianites: of Ismael the eldest son of Abraham, came the Ismaelites, with whom are joynd, as of the same Nation, the Amalekites; whom though the more common opinion thinketh to have been a Tribe of Edom, because Esau had a grand-child of that name, yet manifest reason convinceth it to have been otherwise. For the Israelites were forbidden to provoke the Edomites, or do them any wrong; whereas contrariwise Amalek was cursed, and endless war decreed against him: but hereof more elsewhere. Chap. 8. §. 3. Of Ismaels eldest eldest son Naboth sprung the Arabians of Petrea, called Nabathæi. Now even as Abraham besought God to bless Ismael, so it pleased him both to promise and perform it. For of him those twelve Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land between Havilah upon Tygris, and Sur which is the West part of the Desart of Arabia Petrea. Yet howsoever the strength of these later named Nations, which descended from Abraham, were great; it is not unlikely, but that some reason which moved them not to favour the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, was in respect of fear: because all Princes and States do not willingly permit any stranger or powerful Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these Families before named, were not so united in and among themselves, but that they had their jealousies of each other, and contended for dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselves, whether they stood apart or united, they were taught by the care of their own preservation, to join themselves together against Israel: though they did it nothing so maliciously and resolutely as the Canaanites did. For the Edumæans only denied the Hebrews a passage, which the Moabites durst not deny; because their Country lay more open; and because themselves had lately been beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites: and as for the Ammonites, their Country lay altogether out of the way, and the strength of Sehon and Og, Kings of the Amorites, was interjacent: and besides that, the border of the Ammonites was strong, by reason of the mountains which divided it from Basan. Again, that which moved the Moabites in their own reason not much to interrupt Israel, in the conquest of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his confederate, was, that the Moabites might hope, after such time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselves might recover again their own inheritance: to wit, the Vallies and Plains lying between the mountains of Arabia and Jordan: But as soon as Sehon was slain, and that the King of Moab, Balaac, perceived that Moses allotted that Valley to the Tribes of Gad and Reuben, he began to practise with Balaam against Israel, and by the daughters of Midian, as aforesaid, to allure them to Idolatry: and thus at the length the Moabites, by special occasion, were more and more stirred up to enmity against Israel. And as for divers of the rest that were descended from Abraham's kindred, we may note, how in the beginning, between the Authours of their Pedigrees, God permitted some enmities to be, as it were, presages of future quarrels, which in the posterity might be the easier incensed by the memory of old grudges: and withall, by some disdain from the elder in nature to the younger. For the Ismaelites being descended from the eldest son of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest son of Isaac, Jacob, being but a second son, of a second brother; those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses, being naturall men, might scorn to give place, much lesse to subject themselves to their inferiours, as they took it: and for a more aggravation, the issues of Esau, Princes of Idumæa, might keep in record, that their Parent was bought out of his birth-right by Jacob's taking his advantage, and that he was deceived of his fathers blessing also by him: and that Jacob, after reconciliation, came not unto him as he promised, into Seir or Idumæa.

* It seemeth also that Hur, the Son of Nahor, and Bar his Brother, planted themselves in the East side of Arnon, about Eden: where they finde the Land of Hur, in which Job dwelt as one of the issue of Ham, the Son of Noah, and Ejba, his friend which is called a Bacchan. See hereafter chap. 10. Exod. 17. 15. Deut. 11. 5.

Gen. 17.

Gen. 25.

Gen. 27.

Gen. 33-14.

Gen. 36.

So also in the posterity of Ismael, it might remain as a seed or pretence of enmity, that their fore-father was by the infatigation of Sara, cast out into the Desart, with his mother Hagar; and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angel to relieve them. Ismael also had an Egyptian both to his mother and to his wife: and Amalec was also an Horite by his mother: which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Edumæans also, or Edomites, were by their Maternall line descended of the Canaanites. For Esau took two wives of that Nation: one of them was Adah, the daughter of Eloam, the Hittite; and the other Aholibamah, the grand-child of Zibeon, the Hevite, Lord of Seir, before the same was conquered by Esau, and called after his name, Edom, or Idumæa.

Lastly, it appeareth that all those Families of the Ismaelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in proceesse of time corrupted, & drawn from the knowledge and worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conversation of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those wives of the Canaanites which they had married: onely a few of the Kenites and those Madianites, which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, whereof Jethro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and ever-living God.

of the Kings of the Canaanites and Madianites, mentioned in the ancient Wars of the Israelites.

OF the Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham, (for Melchizedek may be thought to be of a better Pedigree) we find four named by Moses: and one and thirty remembered by Joshua, though few of these named, otherwise than by the Cities over which they commanded: to which each of them had a small Territory adjoining, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a generall consideration are to be understood for all those Nations, descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Jebusites, Amorites, Gergesites, Hevites, &c. and so here we understand this name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Country of their habitation, the holy Land, or the Land of promise: for God hath appointed that the seven principle Families should be rooted out, and that his own people should inherit their Lands and Cities. But if we consider of the name and Nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Jordan, on the East, and by the Mediterranean Sea on the West: in which narrow Country, and in the choicest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paternall name chiefly inhabited.

The first King of these Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamor or Hemer, of the Gen. 34. Hevites, whom Siméon and Levi slew, together with his son Sichem, in revenge of their sisters ravishment.

Arad was the second King which the Scriptures have remembered, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Edom and the dead Sea; the same which surprised Israel, as they encamped in the Wilderness in the edge of Edumæa. Nam. 21. 1.

The third named was Sehon King of Elfebon, who before Moses arrivall had beaten the Moabites out of the West part of Arabia Petrea, or Nabathæa, and thrust them out from Arnon into the Desarts, the same whom Moses overthrew in the plains of Moab: at which time he took Elfebon, and all the Cities of the Amorites. Jos. 3. Jos. 16. Jos. 18. Jos. 24. Jos. 25.

Presently after which victory, Og was also slain by Israel, who commanded the North part of that Valley between the Mountains Tracon, or Galaad, and Jordan, who was also a King of the Amorites. Nam. 21. 35.

The fifth was Adonizedek King of the Jebusites, and of Hierusalem, with whom Joshua nameth four other Kings.

Hephai, King of Hebron.

Pirani, King of Jarmuth.

Japhia, King of Lachis: and Debir, King of Eglon, who were all Amorites overthrowne in battell; and hanged by Joshua 10. Jos. 10. Jos. 11. Jos. 12.

Joshua, after this overthrow Joshua nameth Jabin, King of Hazor, and Jahab, King of Madon: whom he also slaughtered, and took his Cities: and this Jabin seemed to have some dominion over the rest; for it is said in the Text, For Hazor be-fore times was the head of all those Kingdoms. Jos. 11. Jos. 12.

After these Adonizedek that notorious Tyrant is named: who confest that he had cut off the thumbs of the hands and feet of seventy Kings, inforcing them to gather crumbs under his Table: who, after Juda and Siméon had used the same execution upon himself, acknowledged it to be a just revenge of God: this King was carried to Hierusalem where he died. 1. Sam. 31. Jos. 10. Jos. 11. Jos. 12.

The last King named is Jabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Joshua. For at such time as he employed Sisara against Israel, whom he opprest twenty years, after the death of Ehud, he inhabited Hazor. This Jabin, Barac (encouraged by Jad. 4. Deborah) overthrew; and his Captaine Sisara had by Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, a nail driven into his head while he slept in her Tent: Jabin himself perishing afterward in that war. Jud. 4. Jos. 11. Jos. 12.

The Madianites had also their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Moabites: and they held a corner of Land in Nabathæa: to the South-east of the dead Sea. They descended from Madian Abraham's son, by Cethura. Raguel surnamed Gethegleus or Jethro, saith Josephus, called Jethro in Exodus, Kenis in the first of Judges, the son of Dathan, the grand-child of Jexanis, or Jokhsam, the great grand-child of Abraham by Cethura. Ex. 3. Jos. 13. Jos. 14.

Cedron 34. thura, was Priest or Prince of the Madianites by the Red Sea: whose Daughter or Niece, Moses married, and of whom I have spoken elsewhere more at large. This Jethro, if he were not the same with Hobab, must be his father: and this Hobab had seven daughters. He guided Moses in the Wilderness, and became one of the Israelites: of him descended the Kenites, so called of his father Raguel's surname, of which Kenites was Heber, which had peace with Jabin the second, even now remembered.

At such time as Saul invaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Kenites to Israel, gave them warning to separate themselves: and yet the Kenites had strong seats, and lived in the mountains of the Desarts.

The Kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I find so named, were these:

1. Homer the Hevite of Sichem
2. Arad of the South parts
3. Sebon of Essebon
4. Og of Basam
5. Adonizedek the Jebusite, king of Hiersusalem
6. Hobam of Hebron
7. Piram of Jarmuth
8. Japia of Lachis
9. Debir of Eglon
10. Jabin of Hazor
11. Jobab of Modon
12. Adonibezek of Bezek, and
13. Jabin the second King of Hazor.

Of the Madianites these:

* Evi or Evos.

Rekam or Reken who built Petra the Metropolis of Petraea, so called by the Greeks: and by Esay. cap. 16. v. 1. and Selah, which is as much as Petra: and so also it is called 2 Reg. 14. 7. where it is also called Joktheel.

- Zur*

Reba
* Oreb

Zebab Zalmunna.

After the death of Barac, Judge of Israel, the four last named of these Madianite Kings, vexed Israel seven years: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them, to wit, Oreb and Zeb, were taken and slain by the Ephraimites, at the passage of Jordan, as in the 6, 7, and 8. of Judges it is written at large. Afterward in the pursuit of the rest, Gideon himself laid hands upon Zebab and Salmuna, or Zalmunna, and executed them, being prisoners; in which expedition of Gideon there perished 120000. of the Madianites and their confederates. Of the Dumians, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will speak hereafter in the description of their Territories.

§. III.

Of the Amalekites and Ismaelites.

OF the kings of the Amalekites and Ismaelites, I find few that are named; and so though of the Ismaelites there were more in number than of the rest (for they were multiplied into a greater Nation, according unto the promise of God made unto Abraham) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Madianites were numbered among them, were more renowned in Moses time than the rest of the Ismaelites. So also were they when Saul governed Israel. For Saul pursued them from Sw unto Havilah, to wit, over a great part of Arabia Petraea, and the Desart. The reason to me seemeth to be this: That the twelve Princes which came of Ismael, were content to leave those barren Desarts of Arabia Petraea, called Sw, Paran, and Sin, to the issue of Abraham by Cethura, that that joynd with them (for so seem the Amalekites to have been, and so were the Ismaelites;) themselves taking possession of a better soil in Arabia the Happy, and about the Mountains of Galaad in Arabia Petraea: For Nabaioth the eldest of those twelve Princes planted that part of Arabia Petraea; which was very fruitfull, though adjoining to the Desart in which Moses wandered, afterward called Nabatheae: the same which neighbourth Judea on the East-side. They also peopled a Province in Arabia the Happy, whereof the people were in after-times called Napathae (B) changed into (P.)

Kedar, the second of Ismaels sons, gave his own name to the East-part of Basan, or Batanea, which was afterward posselt by Manasse, so much thereof as lay within the 10 mountains Traconi, or Gilead. Which Nation Lampridius calleth Kedarens, and Pliny, Cedraens.

Abdeel sat down in the Desart Arabia, neer the Mountains which divide it from the Happy: and gave name to the Adubens, which Ptolomy calleth Agubens.

Misham was the Parent of the Masamancuses, neer the Mountain Zawath, in the same Arabia the Happy.

The Raabens were of Mishma: who joynd to the Orebens, neer the Arabian gulf, where Ptolomy setteth Zagmas.

Of Duma were the Dumians, between the Adubens and Raabens: where the City Dumeth sometimes stood.

Of Massa the Masani, and of Hadar, or Chadar, the Atbritae, who bordered the Napathians in the same happy Arabia.

Thema begat the Themaneans, among the Arabian Mountains, where also the City of Thema is seated.

Of Jetur the Ithureans, or Camathens: of whom Tobu was King in Dauids time. Plin. l. 5. c. 28.

Of Naphri the Nabeian Arabians, inhabiting Syria Zoba: over whom Adadexer commanded, while David ruled Israel.

Cadma, the last and twelfth of Ismaels sons, was the Ancestor of the Cadmonians: who were afterward called Asite, because they worshipped the Fire with the Babylonians. Jann.

The Amalekites gave their Kings the name of Agag, as the Egyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the ancient Syrians, Adad to theirs, and the Arabian Nabatheans, Aras, as names of Honour.

The Amalekites were the first that fought with Moses after he past the Red Sea: when of all times they flourished most, and yet were vanquished. Exod. 17.

Afterward they joynd with the Canaanites, and beat the Israelites neer Cadesbarne. Num. 14.

After the government of Othniel, they joynd them with the Moabites: after Eurac with the Madianites: and invaded Israel. God commanded that as soon as Israel had rest, they should root out the name of the Amalekites: which Saul executed in part, when he waisted them from the border of Egypt, to the border of Caldea: from Havilah to Shur.

In Dauids time they took Siklag in Simeon: but David followed them, and surprised them, recovering his prisoners and spoils. And yet, after David became King, they again vexed him, but to their own losse. 1 Sam. 31.

In Ezekias time, as many of them as joynd to Edumea, were waisted and displanted 2 Sam. 9. 12. by the children of Simeon.

§. IIII.

Of the inslavation of Civility in Europe about these times, and of Prometheus and Atlas.

THEre lived at this time, and in the same age together with Moses, many men exceeding famous, as well in bodily strength, as in all sorts of learning. And as the World was but even now enriched with the written Law of the living God, so did Art and Civility (bred and fostered far off in the East, and in Egypt) begin at this time to discover a passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece, neighbouring Asia and Judea. For if Pelasgus, besides his bodily strength, was chosen King of Acadia, because he taught those people to erect them simple Cottages, to defend them from rain and storm: and learned them withall to make a kinde of Meale, and bread of Acorns, who before lived for the most part, by Herbs and Roots: we may thereby judge how poor and wretched those times were, and how fallly those

Nations

Nations have vaunted of those their antiquities, accompanied not onely with civil learning, but with all other kinds of knowledge. And it was in this age of the World, as both Eusebius and S. Augustine have observed, that Prometheus flourished: Quem propterea ferunt de Iusto formasse homines, quia optimus sapientie doctor fuisse perhibetur; Of whom it is reported that he formed men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of wisdom: and so Theophrastus expoundeth the invention of fire ascribed to Prometheus, Ad inveniendam sapientiam pertinere; To have reference to wise inventions: and Aeschylus affirmeth, That by the stealing of Jupiter's fire was meant, that the knowledge of Prometheus reached to the Stars, and other celestiall bodies. Again, it is written of him, that he had the art so to use this fire, as thereby he gave life to the Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meaning, that before his birth and being, those people among whom he lived, had nothing else worthy of men, but externall form and figure. By that fiction of Prometheus, being bound on the top of the Hill Caucassus, his entrails the while devoured by an Eagle, was meant the inward care and restless desire he had to investigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of heavenly bodies; for so it is said: Ideo altissimus ascendisse Caucasum, ut sereno caelo quim longissime astra, signorum obitus & ortus spectaret; That he ascended Caucassus, to the end that he might in a cleer skie discern a far off the settings and risings of the Stars: though Diodorus Siculus expounds it otherwife, and others diversly.

Of this Man's knowledge Aeschylus gives this testimony.

*Ast ageant omnia
Ut fors ferat: donec ipse repperi
Signorum obitus, ortuque qui mortalibus
Sunt utiles: & multitudinem artium
Isti repperi: componere inde literas;
Matremque Musarum auxi ego Memoriam
Perutilem cunctis, &c.*

But Fortune govern'd all their works, till when I first found out how Stars did set and rise:
A profitable art to mortall men:
And others of like use I did devise:
As letters to compose in learned wife
I first did teach: and first did amplify
The Mother of the Muses, Memoria.

Africanus makes Prometheus far more ancient, and but 94. yeers after Ogyges. Porphyrus sayes, that he lived at once with Inachus, who lived with Isaac.

There lived also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the sons of Jupiter, of whom though it be said, that they were born before Moses dayes, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date: yet the advantage of their long lives gave them a part of other ages among men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these sons of Jupiter, Aesculus findes two other, to wit, Oceanus and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gave name to the Evening, and so to the evening Star. Also besides this Atlas of Lybia, or Mauritania, there were others which bare the same name: but of the Lybian, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountains which crosse Africa, to the South of Morocco, Sus, and Hea, with the Sea adjoining, took name, which memory Plato in Critias bestowes on Atlas, the son of Neptunus.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan questions affirmeth, that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by those names to expresse divine knowledge. Nec vero Atlas sustinere caelum, nec Prometheus affixus Caucasus, nec stellatus Cepheus cum uxorē tradere, nisi divina cognitio nomen eorum ad erroneam fabulā traduxisset; Neither should Atlas be said to bear up heaven, nor Prometheus to be fastened to Caucassus, nor Cepheus with his wife to be starified, unless their divine knowledge had raised upon their names these erroneous fables.

Orpheus sometimes exprest Time by Prometheus, sometime he took him for Saturnus, as, Rhea conjux alma Promethen. But that the Story of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction:

a fiction: and that he lived about this time, the most approved Historians and Antiquaries, and among them Eusebius and S. Augustine have not doubted: For the great judgement which Atlas had in Astronomy, saith S. Augustine, were his daughters called by the names of constellations, Pleides and Hyades. Others attribute unto him the finding out of the Moons course, of which Archas the son of Orchomeus challengeth the invention. Of this Archas, Arcadia in Peloponnesus took name; and therefore did the Arcadians vaunt that they were more ancient than the Moon: Et Luna gens prior illa fuit: Ovid. de f. 55. which is to be understood, saith Natalis Comar, before there had been any observation of the Moons course: or of her working in inferior bodies. And though there be that bestow the finding out thereof upon Endymion: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Isaacus Tzetzes, a curious searcher of antiquities, gave it Atlas of Libya: who besides his gifts of minde, was a man of unequalled and incomparable strength: from whom Thales the Milesius, as it is said, had the ground of his Philosophy.

§. V.

Of Deucalion and Phaëton.

And in this age of the World, and while Moses yet lived, Deucalion reigned in Thessaly, Crotopus then ruling the Argives. This Deucalion was the son of Prometheus, saith Herodotus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gave him Pandora for mother; the rest Clymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odyssey, makes Deucalion the son of Minos: but he must needs have meant some other Deucalion; for else either Ulysses was mistaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For Ulysses, after his return from Troy, feigned himself to be the brother of Idomeneus, who was son to this later Deucalion, the son of Minos: but this Minos lived but one age before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus served in that war) and this Deucalion the son of Prometheus, who lived at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Deucalions time happened that great inundation in Thessaly: by which in effect every soul in those parts perished, but Deucalion, Pyrrha his wife, and some few others. It is affirmed, that at the time of this flood in Thessaly, those people exceeded in all kinde of wickednesse and villany: and as the impiety of men is the forcible attractive of Gods vengeance, so did all that Nation for their foul sins perish by waters: as in the time of Noah the corruption and cruelty of all mankind drew on them that generall destruction by the flood universall. Onely Deucalion, and Pyrrha his wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to be lovers of Vertue, of Justice, and of Religion. Of whom Ovid:

*Non illo melior quisquam, nec amantior equi
Vir fuit: aut illa reverentior ulla deorum.*

No man was better, nor more just than hee:
Nor any woman godlier than shee.

It is also affirmed, that Prometheus fore-told his son Deucalion of this over-flowing, and advised him to provide for his safety: who hereupon prepared himself a kinde of Vessell, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calls Ciborium; and others Larnax. And because to these circumstances, they afterward adde the lending out of the Dove, to discover the waters fall and decrease, I should verily thinke that Story had been but an imitation of Noahs flood devised by the Greeks, did not the times so much differ, and S. Augustine with others of the Fathers and reverent Writers approve this Story of Deucalion. Among other his children, Deucalion had these two of note; Hellen, of whom Greece had first the name of Hellas; and Melanbo, on whom Neptune is said to have begot Delphus, which gave name to Delphos, so renowned among the Heathen for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

And that which was no lesse strange and marvellous than this flood, was that great burning and conflagration which about this time also hapned under Phaëton; not only in Ethiopia, but in Libya, a Region in Italy, and about Cuma, and the Mountains of Pyrenaeus: of both which the Greeks, after their manner, have invented many strange fables.

§. VI.

Of Hermes Trismegistus.

But of all other which this age brought forth among the Heathen, Mercurius was the most famous and renowned; the same which was also called Trismegistus, or Ter Maximus; and of the Greeks, Hermes.

Many there were of this name; and how to distinguish, and set them in their own times, both S. Augustine and Lactantius finde it difficult. For that Mercury which was esteemed the god of Theeves, the god of Wrestlers, of Merchants, and Sea-men, and the god of Eloquence (though all by one name confounded) was not the same with that Mercury, of whose many works some fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clement Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certain of the Greeks reckon five Mercuries. Of which, two were famous in Egypt, and there worshipped; one, the son of Nilus, whose name the Egyptians feared to utter, as the Jews did their Tetragrammaton; the other that Mercury, which flew Argus in Greece, and flying into Egypt, is said to have delivered literature to the Egyptians, and to have given them laws. But Diodorus affirmeth, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought learning and letters out of Egypt into Greece: which Plato also confirmeth, saying; That letters were not found out by that Mercury which flew Argus, but by that ancient Mercury, otherwise Thevet; whom Philobylus writeth Taautus; the Egyptians, Thoth; the Alexandrines, Thot; and the Greeks, (as before) Hermes. And to this Taautus, Sanconiathos, who lived about the war of Troy, gives the invention of letters. But S. Augustine making two Mercuries, which were both Egyptians, calls neither of them the son of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to have slain Argus. For he findes this Mercury the slayer of Argus, to be the grand-child of that Atlas, which lived while Moses was yet young. And yet L. Vives upon S. Augustine seems to understand them to be the same with those, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the rest have remembered. But that conjecture of theirs, that any Grecian Mercury brought letters into Egypt, hath no ground. For it is manifest, (if there be any truth in prophane antiquity) that all the knowledge which the Greeks had, was transported out of Egypt or Phœnicia, and not out of Greece, nor by any Grecian into Egypt. For they all confesse, that Cadmus brought letters first into Bœotia, either out of Egypt, or out of Phœnicia: it being true, that between Mercurius, that lived at once with Moses and Cadmus, there were these descents cast; Crotopus King of the Argives, with whom Moses lived, and in whose time about his tenth year Moses died; after Crotopus, Sthenelus, who reigned eleven years; after him Danaus fifty years; after him Linceus: in whose time, and after him in the time of Minos King of Crete, this Cadmus arrived in Bœotia. And therefore it cannot be true that any Mercurius about Moses his time, flying out of Greece for the laughter of Argus, brought literature out of Greece into Egypt. Neither did either of those two Mercuries of Egypt, whom Saint Augustine remembereth, the one the grand-father, the other the Nephew or grand-child, come out of Greece. Eupolemus and Artapanus note, that Moses found out letters, and taught the use of them to the Jews: of whom the Phœnicians their neighbours received them; and the Greeks of the Phœnicians by Cadmus. But this invention was also ascribed to Moses, for the reason before remembered; that is, because the Jews and the Phœnicians had them first from him. For every Nation gave unto those men the honour of first Inventors, from whom they received the profit. Ficinus makes that Mercury, upon part of whose works he commenteth, to have been four descents after Moses; which he hath out of Virgil, who calls Atlas, that lived with Moses, the maternall grand-father of the first famous Mercury, whom others, as Diodorus, call the Counsellor and Instructor of that renowned Isis, wife of Osirin. But Ficinus giveth no reason for his opinion herein. But that the elder Mercury instructed Isis, Diodorus Siculus affirmeth, and that such an inscription was found on a pillar erected on the Tomb of Isis. Lod. Vives upon the six and twentieth Chapter of the eighth Book of Saint Augustine, de Civitate Dei, conceiveth, that this Mercury, whose works are extant, was not the first which was entituled Ter Maximus, but his Nephew or Grand-child, * Sanconiathos, an ancient Phœnician, who lived shortly after Moses, hath other fancies of this Mercury affirming that he was the Scribe of Saturn, and called by the Phœnicians, Taautus; and by the Egyptians, Thoth, or or Thoyt. It may be, that the many years which he is said to have lived, to wit, three hundred years, gave occasion to some Writers to finde him in one time, and to others in other times. But by those who have collected the grounds of the Egyptian Philosophy and Divinity, he is found more ancient than Moses: because the Inventor of the Egyptian Wisdom, wherein it is said, that Moses was excellently learned.

It is true, that although this Mercury or Hermes doth in his Divinity differ in many particulars from the Scriptures, especially in the approving of Images, which Moses of all things most detested: yet whosoever shall reade him with an even judgement, will rather resolve, that these works which are now extant, were by the Greeks and Egyptians Priests corrupted, and those fooleries inserted, than that ever they were by the hand of Hermes written, or by his heart and spirit devised. For there is no man of understanding, and master of his own wits, that hath affirmed in one and the same Tract, those things which are directly contrary in doctrine, and in nature: For out of doubt (if Moses excepted) there was never any man of those elder times that hath attributed more, and in a file more reverend and divine unto Almighty God, than he hath done. And therefore if those his two Treatises now among us; the one converted by Apuleius, the other by that learned Ficinus, had been found in all things like themselves: I think it had not been perillous to have thought with Eupolemus, that this Hermes was Moses himself; and that the Egyptian Theologie hereafter written, was devised by the first, & more ancient Mercury, which others have thought to have been Joseph, the son of Jacob: whom, after the exposition of Pharaohs dreams, they called Sapientissime, which is as much to say, as Abconditorum repertor; A finder out of hidden things. But these are over-venturous opinions. For what this man was, it is known to God. Envie and aged time hath partly defaced, and partly worn out the certain knowledge of him: of whom, whosoever he were, Lactantius writeth in this sort: Hic scripsit libros, & quidem multos, ad cognitionem divinarum rerum pertinentes, in quibus manifestum summi ac singularis Dei asserit, isdemque nominibus appellat, quibus nos, Deum & Patrem; He hath written many books belonging to, or expressing the knowledge of divine things, in which he affirmeth the Majesty of the most High, and one God, calling him by the same names of God and Father, which we do. The same Father also feareth not to number him among the Syblis and Prophets. And so contrary are these his acknowledgements to those Idolatrous fictions of the Egyptians and Grecians: as for my self I am perswaded, that whatsoever is found in him contrary thereunto, was by corruption infected. For thus much himself confesseth: Deus omnium Dominus, & Pater, fons & vita, potentia & lux, & mens, & spiritus; & omnia in ipso, & sub ipso sunt. Verbum enim ex ejus esse prodicens, perfectissimum existens, & generator, & opifex, &c. God (saith he) the Lord and Father of all things, the jointain and life, and power, and light, and minde, and spirit: and all things are in him, and under him. For his Word out of himself proceeding, most perfect, and generative, and operative, falling upon fruitfull nature, made it also fruitfull and producing. And he wastherefore (saith Syndes) called Ter Maximus, quia de Trinitate loquitur est, in Trinitate unum esse Deum ajcens; Because he spake of the Trinity, affirming that there is one God in Trinity. Hic ruinam (saith Ficinus) prevēdit price Religioni, hic ortum novæ fidei, hic adventum Christi, hic futurum judicium, resurrectionem sancti, beatorum gloriam, supplicia peccatorum; This Mercury foresaw the ruine of the old or superstitious Religion, and the birth of the new faith, and of the coming of Christ, the future judgement, the resurrection, the glory of the blessed, and the torment or affliction of the wicked or damned.

To this I will only adde his two last speeches reported by Calcidius the Platonist, and by Volterran out of Syndes. Haecenus, fili, pulvis à patria, vixi peregrinus & exul, nunc incolumini repeto. Cumque post paulum à vobis corporis vinculis absolutus discessero, videte me me quasi mortuum ingeatis: nam ad illam optimam beatamque Civitatem regredior, ad quam universi cives mortis conditione venturi sunt. Ibi namque solus Deus est summus Princeps, qui cives suos replet suavitatis mirifica: ad quam hæc, quam multi vitam existimant, mors est potius dicenda quam vita; Hitherto, O son, being driven from my country, I have lived a stranger and banished man: but now I am repaired homeward again in safety. And when I shall after a few dayes (or in a short time) by being loosed from these bonds of flesh and blood, depart from you, see that you do not bewail me as a man dead; for I do but return to that best and blessed City, to which all her citizens (by the condition of death) shall repair. Therein is the only God, the most high and chiefe Prince, who filleth or feedeth his citizens with sweetnesse more than marvellous: in regard whereof, this being, which others call a life, is rather to be accounted a death than a life. The other, and that which seemeth to be his last, is thus converted by others, agreeing in sense, but not in words: with Suydas: O celum, magni Dei sapiens opus, teque O vox Patris quam ille primam emisit, quando universum constituit mundum, adjuro per unigenitum ejus I crbum, & Spiritum, cuncta comprehendentem, Misereamini mei: I adjuro thee O heaven, thou wisest work of the great God, and thee O voice of the Father, which he first uttered, when he framed the whole world, by his onely begotten Word, and Spirit, comprehending all things. Have mercy upon me.

But Suydas hath his invocation in these words: Obtestor te celum, magni Dei sapiens opus, obtestor te vocem Patris, quam loquutus est primum cum omnem mundum firmavit, obtestor te per unigenitum sermonem omni continentem, propitius, propitius esto: I beseech thee O heaven, wisest work of the great God, I beseech thee O voice of the Father, which he spake first when he established all the world, I beseech thee by the onely begotten Word containing all things, be favourable, be favourable.

§. VII.

Of Jannes and Jambres, and some other that lived about those times.

There were also in this age both Æsculapius, which after his death became the god of the Physicians, being the brother of Mercurius, as Protes thinks in his Commentary upon Augustine, de Civitate Dei, lib. 8. and also those two notorious Sorcerers, Jannes and Jambres, who in that impious art excelled all that ever had been heard of to this day: and yet Moses himself doth not charge them with any familiarity with Devils, or ill Spirits: words indeed that seldom came out of his mouth: however by the Septuagint they are called Sophistes, or Venefici, and Incantatores: Sophists, Poysoners, and Incantators: by Hierome, Sapientes, & malefici: Wise men, and evil doers: and so by Vatablus, who also useth the word Magi. The Greek it self seems to attribute somewhat of what they did to natural Magick: calling them μαγιστράς, workers by drugs. The Genevian Sorcerers and Incantors: Junius, Sapientes, Prestigiatōres, & Magi. Magici: 30 Ans and Wife men here by him are taken in one sense: and Prestigiators are such as dazzle mens eyes, and make them seem to see what they see not: as false colours, and false shapes. But as some vertues and some vices are so nicely distinguished, and so resembling each other, as they are often confounded; and the one taken for the other: (Religion and Superstition having one face and countenance) so did the works and workings of Moses, and of Pharao's Sorcerers appear in outward shew, and to the beholders of common capacities, to be one and the same art and gift of knowledge. For the Devil changeth himself into an Angel of light: and imitateth in all he can the waies and workings of the most High. And yet on the contrary every work which surmounteth the wisdom of most men, is not to be condemned, as performed by the help or ministry of ill Spirits. For the properties and powers which God hath given to natural things, are such, as where he also bestoweth the knowledge to understand their hidden and best vertues, many things by them are brought to pass, which seem altogether impossible, and above nature or art: which two speculations of works of nature, and of miracle, the Cabalists distinguished by these names: Opus de Beresith, & opus de meccana: the one they call, Sapientiam naturæ; The Wisdom of nature: the other, Sapientiam divinitatis; The Wisdom of divinity: the one Jacob practised in breeding the pious Lambs in Assyriopotamia; the other Moses exercised in his miracles wrought in Egypt, having received from God the knowledge of the one in the highest perfection, to wit, the knowledge of nature: of the other so far as it pleased God to proportion him, both which he used to his glory that gave them: as summing to himself nothing at all, either in the least or most. Also S. Augustine noteth, that from the time that Moses left Egypt, to the death of Joshua, divers other famous men lived in the World, who after their deaths, for their eminent vertues and inventions, were qumbrd among the gods: as Dionysius, otherwise Liber Pater, who taught the Grecians the use of the Vine in Attica: at which time also there were instituted Musical plays, to Apollon Delphinus: thereby to regain his favour, who brought barrenness and scarcity upon that part of Greece, because they resisted not the attempts of Danaus, who spoiled his Temple, and set it on fire: so did Eriobonius in Liby tute the like games to Minerva: wherein the Victor was rewarded with a present of Oyl, in memory of her that first prest it out of the Olive.

In this age also Xanthus ravished Esop, and begat on her Radamantus, Sarpedon and Minos, which three are also given to Jupiter by other Historians. To these S. Augustine Lib. de Civ. addeth Hercules: the same to whom the twelve labours are ascribed, native of Tyrinthia, a City of Peloponnesus: (or as others say, onely nursed and brought up there) who came into Italy, and destroyed many Monsters there; being neither that Hercules, which Eu 10 ebius surnameth Delphinus, famous in Phœnicia; nor that Hercules, according to Philostrophus, which came to Gades, whom he calleth an Egyptian: Manifestum sit, non Thebanum Hercules, which Ægyptium ad Gades pervenisse, & ibi finem statuisse terræ (saith Philostrophus): It is manifest, that it was the Egyptian Hercules, and not the Theban, which travelled as far as the straits of Gades, and there determined the bounds of the earth. In this time also while Moses wandered in the Deserts, Dardanus built Dardania.

But whosoever they were, or how worthy soever they were that lived in the dayes and age of Moses, there was never any man, that was no more than man, by whom it pleased God to work greater things; whom he favoured more, to whom (according to the appearing of an infinite God) he so often appeared; never any man more familiar and conversant with Angels; never any more learned both in Divine and Humane knowledge; never a greater Prophet in Israel. He was the first that received and delivered the Law of God entire; the first that left to posterity by letters, the truth and power of one infinite God; his creating out of nothing the World Universal, and all the creatures therein; that taught the detestation of Idolatry, and the punishment, vengeance, and eradication, which followed.

Syracides calleth Moses the beloved of God and men, whose remembrance is blessed. He made him (saith the same Author) like to the glorious Saints, and magnified him by the fear of his enemies, made him glorious in the sight of Kings, shewed him his glory, caused him to hear his voice, sanctified him with faithfulness and meekness, and chose him out of all men.

He is remembered among prophane Authors; as by Clearchus the Peripatetic; by Ale 30 gassenes, and Nimænius the Pythagorian. The long lives which the Patriarchs enjoyed before the flood, remembered by Moses, Esaius, Hieronymus, Ægyptius, Hecateus, Elamius, Acquifianus, Ephorus, and Alexander the Historian, confirm. The universall flood which God revealed unto Moses, Berosus, Nicolas Damascenus, and others have testified. The building of the Tower of Babel, and confusion of tongues, Alydenus, Esaius, and Sy 40 billia have approved. Berosus also honoureth Abraham. Hecateus wrote a book of him. Damascenus before cited, speaketh of Abrahams passage from Damascus into Canaan, agreeing with the books of Moses. Empelemon writeth the very fame of Abraham, which Moses did. For beginning with the building of Babel, and the overthrow thereof by divine power, he saith that Abraham, born in the tenth generation, in the City called Camerina, or Orien, excelled all men in wisdom: and by whom the Astrologic of the Caldeans was invented. Is justitia pietateque sua (saith Eu 50 ebius out of the same Author) se Deo gratus fuit, ut divino precepto in Phœniciam venerit, ibique habitaverit For his justice and piety he was so pleasing unto God, as by his commandment he came into Phœnicia, and dwelt there. Likewise Diodorus Siculus in his second Book & fifth Chapter, speaketh reverently of Moses: There are many other among prophane Authors, which do confirm the books of Moses, as Eu 60 ebius hath gathered in the ninth of his Preparation to the Gospel, Chapter the third and fourth, to whom I refer the Reader. Lastly, I cannot but for some things in it commend this notable testimony of Sirabo, who writeth of Moses in these words: Moses enim affirmavit, docebatque Egyptios non rectè sentire, qui bestiarum & pecorum imagines Deo tribuerunt: Itemque Aios & Grecos, qui diis hominum figuram assignerunt: id verò solum esse Deum, quod nos, & terram & mare continet, quod celum, & mundum, & rerum omnium naturam appellamus: cuius profecto imaginem, nemo sane mentis, alienius eorum rerum, quæ penes nos sunt, similem audeat effingere. Proinde (omni simulachrorum officio repudiata) dignum ei Templum ac Delubrum constitendum, ac sine aliqua figura colendum: Moses affirmed and taught, that the Egyptians thought amiss, which attributed unto God the images of beasts and cattell: Also that the Africans and Greeks greatly erred, in giving unto their gods the shapes of men: whereas that only is God indeed, which containeth both us, the earth and sea, which we call heaven, the world, and the nature of all things, whose im 15 age, double doubtlesse, no wise man will dare to fashion out unto the likeness of those things, which are amongst us. That therefore (all devising of Idols cast aside) a worthy Temple and place of prayer was to be erected unto him, and he to be worshipped without any figure at all therein.

A. 7. 23.

Now concerning the Egyptian wisdom, for which the Martyr Stephen commended Moses, saying, That Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in his works and words; the same is corrected (how truly I know not) by Diodorus, Diogenes, Lactius, Iamblicus, Philo Judæus, and Eusebius Cæsariensis, and divided into four parts, viz. Mathematicall, Naturall, Divine, and Morall.

In the Mathematicall part, which is distinguish'd into Geometrie, Astronomie, Arithmetick, and Musick, the ancient Egyptians exceed all others. For Geometrie which is by interpretation measuring of grounds, was usefull unto them: because it consisting of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands and Territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yearly overflowed and confounded, so as no man could know what in right belonged unto him.

For the second part, to wit, Astronomie, the site of the Country being a levell and spacious Plain, free and cleer from the clouds, yielded them delight with ease, in observing and contemplating the risings, fallings, and motions of the Stars.

Arithmetick also, which is the knowledge of numbers, they studied; because without it, in Geometrie and Astronomie, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musick they made no other account, nor desired farther knowledge, than seemed to them sufficient to serve and magnifie their gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Naturall part of this Wisdom, which handleth the principles, causes, elements, and operations of naturall things, differs little from Peripateticall Philosophie; teaching, that Materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt bodies & living creatures have their being; that Heaven is round like a Globe; that all Stars have a certain soverain heat, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that rains proceed and be from mutations in the ayre; that the Planets have their proper souls, &c.

The Divine part of this wisdom, which is called Theologie, teacheth and believeth that the world had a beginning, and shall perish; that men had their first originall in 30 Egypt; partly by means of the temperatenesse of that Country, where neither Winter with cold, nor Summer with heat, are offensive; and partly through the fertility, that Nilus giveth in those places: That the soul is immortal, and hath transmigration from body to body; That God is one, the Father and Prince of all gods, and that from this God, other gods are, as the Sun and Moon, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and divers Images, because the true similitudes of the gods is not known; that many of the gods have been in the estate of mortall men, and after death, for their virtues and benefits bestowed on mankind, have been Deified; that those beasts, whose Images and Forms the Kings did carry in their Arms, when they obtained victory, were adored for gods: because under those Ensignes they prevailed over their enemies. Moreover the Egyptian Divines had a peculiar kinde of writing, mysticall and secret, wherein the highest points of their Religion and worship of God, which was to be concealed from the vulgar sort, were obscured.

Clem. Strom. l. 5.

Clemens distributeth the whole sum of this later Egyptian learning into three severall sorts, viz. Epistolar, which is used in writing common Epistles; Sacerdotal, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacred, which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kinds: the one proper, which it expressed by letters Alphabetically in obscure and figurative words; as for example, where it is written: The Ibis by the Horner participateth the beauty of the Hawke; which is read thus: The Moon doth by the Sun borrow part 50 of the light of God: because Light is an Image of Divine beauty; the other symbolically, or by figures, which is threefold, viz. Imitative, Tropically, and Aenymaticall: Imitative, which designeth things by characters, like to the things signified, as by a Circle, the Sun; and by the Horns of the Moon, the Moon it self: Tropically or transferent, which applies the divers forms and figures of naturall bodies or creatures, to signifie the dignities, fortunes, conditions, virtues, vices, affections, & actions of their gods, and of men. So with the Egyptian Divines, the Image of an Hawke signifieth God, the figure of the Horner signifieth the Sun, the picture of the Bird Ibis signifieth the Moon: by by the form of a Man, Prudence and Skillfullnesse: by a Lion, Fortitude: by a Horse, Liberty: by a Crocodile, Impudency: by a Fish, Hatred is to be understood: Aenymaticall is a composition or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which sense, the monstrous Image of a Lions body having a Mans head, was graven on their Temples & Altars, to signifie, that to men all divine things are Aenymaticall and obscure. So the Image of the Sun set on the head of a Crocodile, which liveth aswell in the Waters, as on Land expresth that the Sun nourisheth Meteors in the Aire, aswell from the Waters, as from the Earth. So a Scepter, at the top whereof is made an Eye, and an Eare, signifieth God, Hearing, Seeing, and governing all things. The Scythians are thought to have bin delighted with this kind of writing. For Phericides Syrius reporteth, That when Darius 10 sending letters, threatned Idanthura, King of the Scythians, with ruine and destruction of his Kingdom, unless he would acknowledge subjection: Idanthura returned to him a Mouse, a Frog, a Bird, a Dart, and a Plough-share: which Orotopagas, Tribune of the Souldiers, interpreted to signifie, that by the Mouse, their dwellings: by the Frog, their waters: by the Bird, their ayre: by the Dart, their weapons: by the Plough, their Lands were signified to be ready to be delivered to Darius, as their Sovereigne Lord. But Xyphodres made another construction, viz. that the King meant, That except Darius with his men did hasten away, as a Bird through the ayre, or creep into holes as a Mouse, or run into the waters which they had passed as a Frog, they should not escape his arms, but either be slain, or, being made Captives, till his grounds. The same History is with little difference reported by Herodotus.

The fourth and last part, which is Morall and Politick, doth contain especially the Laws, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Trismegistus, or Tot Maximus devised: who in his Books or Dialogues of Pimander and Alephius, hath written for many things of God, worthy of admiration; aswell (saith Sextus Senensis) of the Trinity, and of the coming of Christ, as of the last and fearful day of Judgement: that (as saith the same Author, the opinion being also ancient) he is not onely to be accounted a Philosopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

Iamblicus in his Books of Mysteries of the Egyptians, taking two very ancient Histories for their Authors, to wit, Seleucus and Menemus, affirmeth, that this Mercury was not onely the Inventor of the Egyptian Philosophy, but of all other learning, called the Wisdom of the Egyptians, before remembered: and that he wrote of that subject 36525 Books, or Pages. Of which there were numbered, of Fiery Spirits, one hundred Books; of Aëreall Spirits as many, and of Spirits Celestiall a thousand; which because they were out of the Egyptians language converted by certain learned Philosophers into naturall Greek, they seemed to have been first written in that Tongue. Clemens Alexan. Clem. Strom. l. 5. drinus writeth, that among the Books of Hermes, to wit, of the Wisdom of the Egyptians, there were extant in his time 36. Of Physick, six Books; of the orders of Priests, ten; and of Astrology, four.

§. VIII.

A Brief of the History of Josua; and of the space between him and Othoniel: and of the remainders of the Canaanites; with a note of some Contemporaries to Josua: and of the breach of Faith.

AFTER the death of Moses, and in the one and fortieth yeer of the Egression, in the first moneth called Nisan, or March, Josua, the son of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the Spirit of wisdom, took on him the government of Israel: God giving him comfort, and encouraging him to passe the River of Jordan, and to possesse 50 and divide among the Israelites the Land promised.

The beginning of Josua's rule, Saint Amyntas dates with the reign of Amyntas, the Lib. 18. de C. 18. the nineteenth King in Assyria; with Corax the sixteenth King in Sicily, when Darius governed the Argives; and Eridonius, Athens. vii. Dec. 11.

Josua imitating in all things his Predecessor, sent over Jordan certain discoverers to Jof. 2. 1. view the seat and strength of Jerico, the next City unto him on the other side of the River, which he was to passe over. Which discoverers being saved, and sent back by Rahab a woman of ill fame, because she kept a Tavern or Victualling-house, made Josua know, that the inhabitants of Jerico, and those of the Country about it, hearing of the 74. 2. 11. approach

Jfs. 2. 11. approach of Israel, had lost courage. Whereupon the day after the return of the Spies, which was the sixth day of the one and fortieth year after the Egression, Joshua removed from Sittim in the plains of Moab, and drew down his Army to the banks of the River Jordan; and gave them commandment to put themselves in order to follow the Ark of God, when the Levites took it up, and moved towards the River, giving them withal this forcible encouragement, That they should thereby assure themselves of his favour and presence, who is Lord of all the world, when the River of Jordan should be cut off and divided, and the waters coming from above should stand still in a heap, whereby those below towards the Dead Sea wanting supply, they might passe over into the land of Canaan with dry feet.

Jfs. 1. 12. He also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the half Tribe of Manasse, to prepare themselves (according to their Covenant made with Moses) to march in the head of the rest, and, as we call it in this age, to lead in the Vaunt-guard, which through all the Deserts of Arabia, from the Mount Sinai to this place, those of the Tribe of Juda had performed. For these Tribes being already provided of their habitations, and Country and Cities of the Amorites, by the help of the rest, conquered for them: it agreed with justice and equality, that Reuben, Gad, and the half of Manasse should also assist their brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their enemies possession.

On the banks of Jordan they rested themselves from the sixth day to the ninth; and on the tenth day of the first month Nisan, or March, they past over to the other side, taking with them twelve stones from the dry ground in the midst of the River: which, for a memory of that miracle by God wrought, they set up at Gilgal, on the East side of the city of Jerico, where they incamped the first night. At which place Joshua gave commandment, that all born in the last fortieth year in the Deserts should be circumcised, which ceremony to that day had been omitted. Of the neglect whereof S. Augustine giveth for cause, The peoples contempt of their superiours. Thomas excuseth it in this sort, That the Israelites knew not the certain time of their removing from one place to another: Damascen, That it was not needfull by circumcision to distinguish them from other Nations, at such time as they lived by themselves, and a-part from all Nations.

On the fourteenth day of the same month, the children of Israel celebrated the Passover now the third time; first, at their leaving Egypt; secondly, at Mount Sinai; and now at Gilgal. After which, being desirous to taste of the fruits of the Country, and having, as it were, surfeited on Mam, they parched of the Corn of the Land, being not yet fully ripe, and ate thereof.

And as Moses began to distribute those Regions beyond Jordan, to wit, the Lands of the Amorites which Og of Basan, and Sehon held, so did Joshua perform the rest; and after a view and partition made of the Territories, he gave to each Tribe his portion by lot. But this partition and distribution was not done at once, but at three severall times; first, by Moses to Gad, Reuben, and the half Tribe of Manasse, of the Lands over Jordan; secondly, by Joshua, to the Tribe of Juda, Ephraim, and the other half Tribe of Manasse; about the fifth year of his government; proved in the 14. of Joshua v. 10. and a third division was made to the other seven Tribes at Shilo, where Joshua seated the Tabernacle of the Congregation.

The victories of Joshua against the Kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly set down in his own books, as I shall not need to lengthen this part by their repetition. In whose Story I chiefly note these particulars. First, how in the beginning of the war, those little kings, or regnals of the Canaanites, had not so much understanding, as to unite themselves together against the Israelites; but according to the custom of those estates, from whose Governours God hath taken away all wisdom and foresight, they left those of their own Nation, which were next the invaders, to themselves, and to their own defences, so hoping that the fire kindled somewhat far off, might again have been quenched, ere it could spread it self so far as their own Territories and Cities. But after such time as Jerico and Ai were entred, and the Kings, People, and Cities consumed; five of those 31. Kings (all which at length perished in that war) joyned themselves together, first attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendered themselves to Joshua. Only five (the rest looking on to the successe) namely, the King of the Jebusites, in Jebus, or Hiersusalem, the Kings of Hebron, Jarmoth, Lachis, and Eglon, addrest themselves for resistance: whose Army being by Joshua surprized and broken, themselves despairing to escape by flight, flight, and hopelesse of mercy by submission, creeping into a Cave under ground, were thence by Joshua drawne forth and hanged. In the prosecution of which victory he also took Makkedah, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the relief whereof Horam King of Gezar hastened, and perished. After which Joshua posselt himself of Eglon, Hebron, and Debir, destroying the Cities with their Princes.

In the end, and when the South Countries were posselt, the Cities thereof conquered, and their Kings and People made dust: the rest of the Canaanites, guided by the over-late counsels of necessity, united themselves, to make one gross strength and body of an Army: which Jabin, King of Hazor, practised and gathered together, by Joshua discovered, as the same rested neer the Lake of Merom, he used such diligence, as he came on them unawares; and obtaining absolute victory over them, he prosecuted the same to the utmost effect. And, besides the slaughter of the defendants, he entred their Cities, which he burnt Hazor onely, reserving the rest for Israel to inhabit and enjoy.

Secondly, I note, that Joshua shewed himself a skilfull man of War, for that in those ancient times he used the stratagem of an ambush in taking of Ai; and in that he broke the Armies of the first five Kings of the Amorites, which attempted Gibeon by surprize. For he marched all night from his camp at Gilgal, and set on them early the next day; when he overthrew Jabin and his confederates. After which, making the best profit of his victory, he assaulted the great City of Hazor.

Thirdly, the miracles which God wrought during this war, were exceeding admirable; as the stay of the River Jordan at the Springs, so as the Army of Israel past it with a drie foot; the fall of Jerico by the sound of the Horns; the showers of Haile-stones, which fell upon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, whereby more of them perished than by the sword of Israel: again, the arrest of the Sun in the firmament, whereby the day was so much the more lightened, as the Israelites had time to execute all those which fled after the overthrow: a wonder of wonders, and a work onely proper to the all-powerfull God.

Fourthly, out of the passage between Joshua and the Gibeonites, the Doctrine of keeping Faith is so plainly and excellently taught, as it taketh away all evasion, it admitteth no intrusion, nor leaveth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidiousnes, and horrible deceit of this later age, called Equivocation. For, notwithstanding that these Gibeonites were a people of the Hevites, expressly and by name, by the commandment of God to be rooted out, &c. notwithstanding that they were liars, and deceivers, and counterfeits, and that they did over-reach, and, as it were, deride Joshua, and the Princes of Israel, by feigning to be sent as Embassadors from a far Country, in which travell their cloths were worn, their bread mouldie, which they avowed to have been warm for newnesse when they first set out; their barrels and bottles of wine broken; their shoes patch; and their sacks rent and ragged: Yet Joshua having sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel, he durst not, though urged by the multitude of the people, to lay violent hands on them; but he spared both their lives, and the Cities of their inheritance.

Now if ever man had warrant to break faith, and to retract his promise made, Joshua had it. For first, the commandment which he received from God to root out this Nation among the rest, preceded by far the peace which he had granted them. Secondly, he might justly have put these men to the sword, and have sackt their Cities, if there be any evasion from a promise made, whereof the living God is called to witness. For it was not to the Gibeonites he gave peace, because he knew them to be a people hated of God. He told them, that if they were of the Hevites, it was not in his power to make a league with them. But it was to a strange people that he gave faith, and to a Nation which came from far, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Israel had done in Egypt and over Jordan, sought for peace and protection from his people. Thirdly, the accord, which Israel made with these crafty Canaanites, was without warrant. For it is written in the same place, That the Israelites accepted their tale, that is, believed what they had said, and counselled not with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, these men who were known Idolaters, and served those Puppets of the Heathen, men of an apish Religion, as all Worshipers of Images are, could not challenge the witness of the true God, in whom they believed not. I say therefore, that if ever man might have served himself by any evasion or distinction, Joshua might justly have done it. For he needed not in this case the help of Equivocation or Mental Reservation. For what he sware, he sware in good Faith; but he sware nothing, nor made any promise at all to the Gibonites. And yet, to the end that the faithlesse subtilty of man should borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promises he made in the Name of God, were made to the living God, and not to the dying man, he held them firm and inviolable, notwithstanding that they, to whom he had sworn it, were worshippers of the Devil.

For it is not, as faithlesse men take it, that he which sweareth to a Man, to a Society, to a State, or to a King, and sweareth by the Name of the living Lord, and in his presence, That this promise (if it be broken) is broken to a man, to a Society, to a State, or to a Prince; but the promise in the Name of God made, is broken to God. It is God that we therein neglect: we therein professe that we fear him not, and that we set him at naught, and despise him. If he that without reservation of honour, giveth a lie in the presence of the King, or of his Superiour, doth, in point of Honour, give the lie to the King himself, or to his Superiour; how much more doth he break Faith with God, that giveth Faith in the presence of God, promisseth in his Name, and makes him a witness of the Covenant made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearful thing for a Son to break the Promise, Will, or Deed of the Father; for a State, or Kingdom, to break those Contracts which have been made in former times, and confirmed by publick faith. For though it were 400. years after Josua, that Saul, even out of devotion, slaughtered some of those people descended of the Gibonites: yet God, who forgat not what the Predecessors and Fore-fathers of Saul and the Israelites had sworn in his Name, afflicted the whole Nation with a consuming famine; and could not be appeased, till seven of Sauls sons were delivered to the Gibonites grieved, and by them hanged up.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the help of a ridiculous distinction, or by a God-mocking equivocation, to swear one thing by the Name of the living God, and to reserve in silence a contrary intent: the life of man, the estates of men, the faith of Subjects to Kings, of Servants to their Masters, of Vassals to their Lords, of Wives to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and of all trials of right, will not only be made uncertain, but all the chains whereby free-men are tied in the world, be torn asunder. It is by oath (when Kings and Armies cannot passe) that we enter into the Cities of our enemies, and into their Armies: it is by oath that wars take end, which weapons cannot end. And what is it, or ought it to be, that makes an oath thus powerful, but this; That he that sweareth by the Name of God, doth assure others that his words are true, as the Lord of all the World is true, whom he calleth for a Witness, and in whose presence he that taketh the oath hath promised? I am not ignorant of their poor evasions, which play with the severity of Gods Commandments in this kinde: But this indeed is the best answer, That he breaks no faith, that hath none to break. For whosoever hath faith and the fear of God, dares not do it.

The Christians in the Holy Land, when they were at the greatest, and had brought the Caliph of Egypt to pay them tribute, did not only lose it again, but were soon after beaten out of the Holy Land it self: by reason (saith William of Tyre, a reverend Bishop which wrote that Story) that Almerick the fiftieth King after Godfrey brake faith with the Caliph Elhadach, and his Vicegerent. The Soldan Samr, who being suddenly invaded by Almerick, drew in the Turk *Syrac*on to their aid: whose Nephew Seladine, after he had made Egypt his own, beat the Christians out of the Holy Land; neither would the wooden Crosse (the very Crosse, say they, that Christ died on) give them victory over Seladine, when they brought it into the field as their last refuge, seeing they had forsown themselves in his Name that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from the holy Ghost, That he that speaketh lies, shall be destroyed, and that the mouth which uttereth them, slayeth the soul: how much more perillous is it (if any perill be greater than to destroy the soul) to swear a lie? It was Eugenius the Pope, that perswaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungary after his great victory over Amurath the Turk, and when the said King had compelled him to peace, the most advantageous that ever was made for the Christians, to break his Faith, and to provoke the Turk to renew the war. And though the said King was far stronger in the field than ever; yet he lost the battell with 30000. Christians, and his own life. But I will stay my hand: For this volume will not hold the repetition of Gods judgements upon faith-breakers; be it against Infidels, Turks, or Christians of divers Religions. Lamentable it is, that the taking of oaths now-a-days, is rather made a matter of custome, than of conscience.

It is also very remarkable, That it pleased God to leave so many Cities of the Canaanites unconquered by Israel, to scourge and afflict them, by fore-seeing their Idolatry, and as it is said in the Scriptures, To be thorns in their eyes to prove them, and to teach them to make war. For these Cities hereafter named did not only remain in the Canaanites possession all the time of Josua; but soon after his death the children of Dan were beaten out of the plain Countries, and enforced to inhabit the Mountains, and places of hardest access. And those of Juda were not able to be masters of their own Vallies; because as it is written in the Judges, The Canaanites had Chariots of iron, and principall Cities which stood on the Sea-side, adjoining unto Juda, were still held by the remainder of the Anakims, or Philistims: as Azzab, Cath, Asdod; out of one of which Cities came Goliath, remembered in Samuel.

Neither did the children of Manasse over Jordan expell the Geshurites, nor the Maachathites; which inhabited the North parts of Basan, afterward Traconitis.

Nor the Nephthalims possesse themselves of Bethshemish, nor of Behanab; but they enforced those Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did Asher expell the Zidonians, nor those of Acho, or Acon, Ahlab, Achzib, Heblab, Aprike, and Rebob, nor enforced them to tribute.

No more could Zabulon enjoy Kitron, and Nahalol, but received tribute from them. Also the Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among the Ephraims; and among the children of Manasse, on the West of Jordan, the Canaanites held Bethshean, Taanach, Dor, Ableam, and Megaddo; yea, Hiernusalem it self did the Jebusites defend above four hundred years, even till *David*s time.

Now Josua lived one hundred and ten years, eighteen of which he governed Israel, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not expressed in the Scriptures, which causeth divers to conjecture diversly of the continuance. Josephus gives him five and twenty years: Seder Ollam Rabbi the Authors of the Hebrew Chronicle eight and twenty; and Alfius six and twentie: Maimonius cited by Mussius, fourteen: Joannes Lucidus, seventeen: Cajetan, ten: Eusebius giveth him seven and twenty: and so doth S. Augustine: Melancthon, two and thirty: Codoman, five and twenty. But whereas there passed 480. years from the delivery of Israel out of Egypt, unto the building of the Temple, it is necessary that we allow to Josua only eighteen of them; as finding the rest supplied otherwise, which to me seems the most likely, and, as I think, a well approved opinion.

The same necessity of retaining precisely 480. years from the departure out of Egypt unto the building of the Temple, convinceth of error, such as have inserted years between Josua and Orthoniel, of whom Eusebius findes eight years, to which Arius Montanus adhereth; and for which he giveth his reason in his four and twentieth and last Chapters upon Josua: Euning reckons it nine years: Eucholzer and Kenj but one; Codoman, twenty; and Nicephorus no lesse than three and thirty: whereas following the sure direction of these 480. years, there can be no void years found between Josua and Orthoniel, unless they be taken out of those eighteen ascribed unto Josua by the account already specified. The praises and acts of Josua are briefly written in the six and fortieth Chapter of Ecclesiasticus, where among many other things it is said of him, Who was there before him like to him, for he fought the battell of the Lord?

That he wrote the book called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, because it is said in the last Chapter, ver. 26. And Josua wrote these words in the book of the Law of God: which seemeth rather to have been meant by the covenant which Josua made with Israel in Sichem, where they all promised to serve and obey the Lord: which promise Josua caused to be written in the book of the Law: and of this opinion were Cajetan and *Abulen*s: Theodoret doth likewise conceive, that the book of Josua was collected out of an ancient Volume, intituled Liber Justorum, remembered by Josua himself; and others, that it was the work of Samuel: for whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion upon these words of the 26. Verse, And Josua wrote these words, &c. this placeth nothing in it to prove it: for when the people had answered Josua; The Lord our God will we serve, and his voice will we obey, it followeth that Josua made a covenant with the people, and wrote the same in the book of the Law of God.

There lived at once with Josua, Erichonius in Attica, who taught that Nation to yoke beasts together, thereby to till the ground with more ease and speed: And about the same time the fifty Daughters of Danaus (as it is said) slew the fifty Sons of Egyptus, all but Lyncus, who succeeded Danaus, if the tale be true. There lived also with Josua, Phenix, and Cadmus, and neer the end of Josua's life, Jupiter is said to have ravished Europa the daughter of Phenix, (afterward married to Asterius King of Creta) and begat on her Minos, Radamanthus, and Sarpedon. But S. Augustine reports this ravishment to be committed by Xanthus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sons of Jupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was father to Deucalion, and Deucalion to Idomeneus, who was an old man at the war of Troy, and Sarpedon was in person a young or strong man at the same Trojan war. And so doth Nestor reckon up in the Council of the Greeks, Thesus and Perithous for men of Antiquity and of Ages past: Minos being yet more ancient than any of these. But hereof elsewhere.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Tribes of Israel that were planted in the borders of Phœnicia, with sundry Stories depending upon those places.

§. I.

The Proæm to the description of the whole Land of Canaan; with an Exposition of the name of Syria.

THe Story of the Judges ought to follow that of Josua, after whom the Common-wealth of the Jews was governed by Kings, of which so many of them as ruled the ten Tribes, shall be remembered when we come to the description of Samarita: but because the Land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, whereon the greatest part of the Story past, with that which followeth, hath been acted, I think it very pertinent (for the better understanding of both) to make a Geographical description of those Regions: that all things therein performed by the places known, may the better be understood, and conceived. To which purpose (besides the addition of the neighbour Countries) I have bestowed on every Tribe his proper portion: and do shew what Cities & Places of strength were by the Jews obtained: and what numbers it pleased God to leave unconquered; by whom he might correct and scourge them, when ungratefull for his many graces, they at sundry times forgot or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored those deaf and dead Idols of the Heathen. Divina bonitas (saith Augustine) idcirco maxime irascitur in hoc seculo, ne irascatur in futuro: & misericorditer temporalium adhibet severitatem, ne eternam justè inferat ultionem: The divine goodness is especially therefore angry in this world, that it may not be angry in the world to come, and doth mercifully use temporal severity, that it may not justly bring upon us eternall vengeance.

To the Cities herein described, I have added a short Story of the beginnings and ends of divers Kingdoms and Common-wealths: and to help my self herein, I have perused divers of the best Authors upon this subject: among whom, because I find no great disagreement in many particulars, I have rather in such cases adventured to follow my mine own reason, than to borrow any one of their old patterns.

And because Canaan, with Palestina of the Philistines, and the Lands of Og and Schon Kings of Basan, and the Arabian Amorites, were but small Provinces of Syria: it shall be necessary, first to divide and bound the generall; and so to descend to this particular, now called the Holy Land.

Syria, now Soria, according to the largest description, and as it was anciently taken, embraced all those Regions from the Euxine Sea, to the Red Sea: and therefore were the Cappadocians, which look into Pontus, called Leucosyrians, or white Syrians. But taking it shorter, shorter, and from the coast of Cilicia, which is the North border, unto Idumæa towards the South, Tigris towards the Sun-rising, and the Mediterran Sea Westward: it then containeth besides Babylonia, Chaldea, Arabia the Desert, and Arabia Petraea, that Region also which the Greeks call Mesopotamia, the Hebrews, Syria, of the two Rivers, to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, for so Aran Nabairajim is expounded: also Padan Aram: that is, Juguth Syria, because the two Rivers go along in it as it were in a yoke.

Edessa, sometime Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria taken largely, there were many small Provinces, as Celestria, which the Latines call Syria Cœsa, because it lay in that fruitfull Valley between the Mountains of Lybanus, and Antilibanus, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others, were seated. Then Damascena, or Syria Libanica, taking name of the City Damascus, and the Mountains of Lybanus, the Regall seat of the Adades, the first Kings of Syria. Adjoining to it was the Province of Sophene, or Syria Soba, Choba, or Zobai: over which Adadexer commanded in Solomon's time. Then Phœnicia, and the people Syrphœnicians: and lastly, Syria Palestina bordering Egypt: of which Ptolomy maketh Judea also a part: and to that Province which Moses calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Mela giveth the name of Syrea Judea.

§. II.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan, and of the promises touching this Land.

BUT that Land which was anciently Canaan, taketh a part of Phœnicia, and stretcheth from behinde Lybanus to the great Deserts between Idumæa and Egypt: bounded by the Mid-Land Sea on the West, and the Mountains of Hermon, Galiad, and Armon towards the East: the same Hills which Strabo calleth Tracont, or Tracontite, and Ptolomy, Hippus. The name of Canaan it had from Canaan the son of Cham: Et lingua appellata fuit Canaan; The language was also called Canaan, saith Montanus: and after Hebrew of the Hebrews: who took name from Heber, the son of Sale, according to Saint Augustine. But Arias Montanus not so well allowing of this derivation, makes it a common name to all those of Noah's sons, which past over Euphrates towards the West Sea. For the word Heber, saith he, is as much as transiens, or transmittens, of going, or passing over. And because the children of Abraham had for a long time no certain abiding: therefore, as he thinks, they were by the Egyptians called Hebræi, as it were passengers, which is also the opinion of C. Sigonius, and of Eusebius long before them both. It had also the name of Judea from Juda; and then afterwards intituled the Holy Land, because therein our Saviour Christ was born, and buried. Now this part of Syria was again divided into four; namely, into Edom, (otherwise Seir, or Edumæa) Galilee, Samarita, and Judea. Galilee is double, the superiour called Gentium, and the inferiour: and that Galilee and Judea are distinguished, it is plain in the Evangelists, though both of them belong to Phœnicia.

C. 1. 1. 1.

Now besides these Provinces of Phœnicia, and Palestina (both which the River of Jordan boundeth; saving that Phœnicia stretcheth a little more Easterly towards Damascus) that part also to the East of Jordan, and within the Mountains of Hermon, Gilead, and Armon, otherwise Tracont, fell to the possession of half Manasse, Gad, and Reuben, and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan also: as well because anciently possessed by the Amorites, as for that they were conquered and enjoyed by the Israelites: which Eastermost parts are again divided into Basan, or Basanæa, into Gilead, Mosh, Midian, Ammon, and the Territories of the Macbati, Geshuri, Argobe, Hur. They are known to the latter Geographers by the name of Arabia in generall: and by the names of Tracontite, Pieria, Basanæa, &c. of which I will speak in their proper places.

But where Moses describeth the Land of Canaan in the tenth of Genesis, he maketh no mention of the later Provinces, which fell to Manasse, Gad, and Reuben, for these be his words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou comest to Gerar untill Azabab (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Countrey North and South: then it followeth in the Text; And as thou goest unto Sodome and Gomorab, and Admah, and Seboim, even unto Lasha: by which words Moses setteth down the breadth, to wit, from the Dead Sea to the Mediterran. But in Deuteronomy it seemeth to be far more large: For it is therein written; All the places wherein the so. of your feet shall tread, shall be yours: Deut. 1. 24.

your coast shall be from the wilderness, and from Libanon, and from the river Perab, unto the uttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Countrey North and South, this description agreeth with the former: onely Libanon is put for Zidon; and the Wilderness for Gerar and Azzab, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, if Perab be taken for Euphrates: then the Land promised stretcheth it self both over Arabia Petraea, and the Desert, as far as the border of Babylon: which the Israelites never posselt; nor at any time did so much as invade or attempt. And therefore Vadianus doth conceive, that by the River Perab was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates: taking light from this place of Joshua: Behold, I have divided unto you by lot these Nations, that remain to be an inheritance according to your Tribes: from Jordan with all the Nations that I have destroyed, even unto the great Sea Westward.

And though it be true, that David greatly enlarged the Territory of the Holy Land: yet as Vadianus well noteth, if Perab in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was it put per gentes in amicitiam receptas. For David did not at any time enter so far to the East as Assyria, or Babylonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countries give advantage to those that would make any irreligious cavill, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites unperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his worship and service, it pleased him not onely to inclose them within that Territory, which was for so many people exceeding narrow; but therein and elsewhere to subject them unto those Idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish gods themselves also served and obeyed. And sure the promise by which the Hebrews claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the lasting enjoying thereof, to wit, as long as the heavens were above the earth, was tied to those conditions, both in the Verses preceding, and subsequent; which the Israelites never performed. And therefore they could not hope for other than all mankind could or can expect; who knew that all sorts of comforts from the mercifull goodness of God looked for, as well in this life as after it, are no longer to be attended, than while we persevere in his love, service, and obedience. So in the eighth Verse of the eleventh of Deuteronomy, the keeping of Gods Commandments was a condition joyned to the prosperity of Israel. For therein it is written; Therefore shall ye keep all the Commandments which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and go in, and possess the Land, whither ye go to possess it. Also that you may prolong your dayes in the Land which the Lord swore unto your fathers, &c.

The like condition was also annexed to the enjoying of the Land conquered, and the possession thereof, so long as the heavens were above the earth. For if ye keep diligently, saith he, all these commandments, which I command you to do, that is, to love the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all these Nations before you, and ye shall possess great Nations, and mightier than you. And here, though it be manifest, that by reason of the breach of Gods Commandments, and their falling away from the worship of his all-powerfull Majestie, to the Idolatry of the Heathen, the conditionall promises of God were absolutely void, as depending upon obedience unperformed: yet I cannot mislike that exposition of Melancthon: For, saith he, Offendit promissionem precipiam non esse de hoc politico Regno: He sheweth that his chief promise is not of a civil Kingdom. To which agrees that answer which S. Hierome made to a certain Heretick in his Epistle ad Dardanium, who accused S. Hierome, that he overthrew the reputation of the Jews Story, and brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an Allegorie, and ad illam duntaxat vivendum terram que in celis est; (that is) Onely to that Land of the living which is in heaven. Quoniam tota Judeorum Regio adeo angusta sit ambitu, ut vix longitudinem habeat 160. milliarum, latitudinem vero 40. & in his etiam regiones, loca, urbes, & opida sint plurima, nunquam a Judæis occupata, sed tantum divina policitationis promissas: Because the whole Countrey of the Jews is so narrow in compasse, that it scarce hath 160. miles in length, and 40. miles in breadth, and in these are countries, places, cities, and many towns, which the Jews never posselt, but were onely granted by divine promise. In like manner the same Father speaketh upon Esay, touching the blessings promised unto Hierusalem, where he hath these words: De quo discimus Hierusalem nequaquam in Palestine regione petendam, qua totius Provincie deterrima est: & Jacosus montibus asperatur, & penuriam patitur sitis: ita ut celestibus natur pluvius, & raritatem fontium cisternarum extructione soletur: sed in Dei manibus, ad quam dicitur, sedinaverunt structores intus: From whence, saith he, we learn, that Hierusalem is not to be sought in that region of Palestine, which which is the worst of the whole Province, and ragged with craggie mountains, and suffereth the penury of thirst: so as it preserveth rain water, and supplieth the scarcity of Wells: by building of cisterns; but this Hierusalem is in Gods hands, to which it is said, Thy builders have hastened: so far S. Hierome; where also to prevent mistaking, he thus expoundeth himself: Neque hoc dico in suggillationem terre Judeæ, ut hereticus Sycophanta mentitur: aut quo anseram historiam veritatem, que fundamentum est intelligentie spiritualis: sed ut decimum supercilium Judeorum, qui Synagoga angustias latitudinis Ecclesie præferunt: Si enim occidentem tantum sequuntur literam, & non spiritum vivificantem, ostendant terram promissionis laetæ & melle manantem; Neither (saith he) say I this to disgrace the land of Judea, as the hereticall Sycophant doth belie me: or to take away the truth of the history, which is the foundation of spiritual understanding: but to beat down the pride of the Jews, which enlarge the straits of the Synagogue farther than the breadth of the Church: For if they follow onely the killing letter, and not the quickening spirit, let them shew the Land of promise, flowing with milk and honey.

By this it may also be gathered, howsoever it be unlikely (seeing the West-bound in the place, Deut. 11. 24. had his truth in the literal sense, that Euphrates or Perath, which is made the East-bound, should be taken onely in a spiritual sense) yet nevertheless that Hieroms opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perath were not to be understood for Euphrates, and that the promise it self was never so large: much lesse the plantation and conquest of Israel.

And now for a more particular description of this Holy Land, because Asfer, Nephtalim, and Zabulon held the Northernmost part, and were seated in Phœnicia, I will begin with these three, taking Asfer for the first: of which Tribe yet before I speak, I must admonish the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes to be mentioned, that he remember that many names, by reason of the divers fancies of Translators, are diversely expressed, so that to the unskilfull they may seem divers, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diversity (as by those learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is, partly because the ancient Editions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old Translators imagined other vowels than now the Hebrew Editions have; and partly, because the Ancient expressed or omitted divers consonants, otherwise than the later do think fit.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF ASHER.

||. I.

The bounds of the Tribe of Asfer.

The Asferites descended of Asfer the son of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, were increased while they abode in Egypt, to the number of 41 500. and odde persons, all men above twenty yeers of age, and able to bear arms, at the time when they were mulctured by Moser at Mount Sinai: all which number perishing in the Deserts, there remained of their issues, besides women and children, 53400. bodies fit for the wars, which past the river of Arnon into the Plains of Moab, & after the conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phœnicia, from Zidon & the fields of Libanus, unto Ptolomæ Acron alongst the Sea-coast, containing thirty English miles, or thereabout: and from the Mid-land Sea to the East border some twelve miles: though Antoninus Ant. Jiv. makes it somewhat larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitful, abounding in wine, oyl, and wheat, besides the Balsamum, with other pleasant and profitable commodities: according to that Prophecy, Asfer pinguis panis: Concerning Asfer, his bread shall be fat: And he shall give pleasures for a King.

Gen. 40.

||. II. of Zidon.

The first City seated on the North border of the Territory of Asfer, was Zidon, which Joshua calleth the great Zidon, both for strength and magnitude. The Greeks and Curtius make Agenor the founder thereof: and Jusfine derives the name from Jusfine. 1. 18. the the abundance of fish found on those shores : whereof it hath been called Zidona. But that it was far more ancient, Moses, Jehozabab, and Josephus witnesseth, the same being founded by Zidon the eldest of Canaan's sons : and so strong it was in Josua's time, as neither did himself attempt it, neither could the Assyrians, or any of their successours master it : but it continued all the time of the Judges and Kings, even unto the coming of Christ : a City interchangeably governed, by their own Princes or other Magistrates : though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets, Ejay, Hieremie, Ezechiel, and Zacharie, it was often afflicted, both by the enemies sword, and by the pestilence.

Zidon is seated on the very wash of the Phœnician Sea, which is a part of the Mediterranean or Mid-land Sea. It hath to the North the City of Berythus, and the River Leontis : and to the South Sarepta, or Sarphat, which standeth between it and Tyre : the distance between which two great and famous Cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is 14. thousand paces, saith Seiglerus : but Vadianus makes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth Wesf. jacobus in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo : which two hundred furlongs make five and twenty miles. This difference of distance as well between these two known Cities, as all the rest, make it over-difficult to devise any new scale to the Map and Description of the holy Land.

What Kings it had till Agænor's time there is no memory : the story which Zeno the Philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time confuted and lost. It seemeth to be more ancient than Tyre ; which was also built by the Zidonians. For as Strabo noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memory of Tyre, because it was but a member of Zidon ; and a City subject to the Kings thereof : though it be true that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacie, and became far more renowned, opulent, and strong : From Zidon had Solomon and Zorobabel their principall workmen, both in Timber and Stone, for the building of the Temple. For as it flourished in all sorts of learning, so did it in all other Mechanicall Arts or Trades : the Prophet Zachary calling them the wise Zidonians. The City was both by nature and art exceeding strong, having a Castle or Citadell on the North-side, standing upon an unaccessibill Rock, and compassed by the Sea, which after the Citizens became Christians, was held, and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order : and another Castle it hath on the South-side by the Port of Egypt, which the Templers guarded. It also sent many other Colonies beside that of Tyre, into places remote : as unto Thebes, and Sephrya, Cities of Egiptia in Greece. Strabo and Pliny give the Zidonians the invention of * Glasse, which they used to make of those sands which are taken out of the river Belus, falling into the Mediterranean Sea, neer Pholomais, or Acon : and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of those cleer Glasses which they make at Murano : of which S. Hierome and Pliny : Zidon insignis artifex vitri : Zidon vitrariorum officinis nobiliss : Zidon a famous Glasse-maker, or a skilfull worker in Glasse-bowles.

They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Baal and Astarte : which Idols though common to the other of the issue of Canaan (as Pindus gathers out of 1 Sam. 31. 10. and Judg. 10. 6.) yet especially & peculiarly were accounted the gods of the Zidonians : as appears 1 Reg. 11. 5. in the story of Solomon's Idolatry : where Astarte is called the god of the Zidonians : and 1 Reg. 16. 33. in the story of Achab, the chief worshipper of Baal, where it is said, that he marrying Jezabel the daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshipped their Baal. Divers Baals and divers Astartes in their Idolatries they acknowledged : as it appears by the plurall names of Baalim & Astartoth, 1 Sam. 12. 10. & elsewhere : for even the name Astartoth, as I am informed by a skilfull Hebræian, is plural ; the singular being Astarte : whence Judg. 2. 13. the Sig. Imagines reads idolatriam tunc adorantibus : They worshipped the Astartes. The occasion of this their multiplying of their Baals and Astartes, may be diversly understood : either in respect of the diversity of the forms of the Images, or of the worship in divers places, or of the stories depending upon them : which (as tables use to be) were doubtless in divers cities divers. Augustine quæst. 19. in Judg. thinks Baal and Astarte to be Jupiter and Juno. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrans) call Juno by such a name as Astarte. Tully, lib. 2. de Nat. Deorum, making divers Goddesses of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to be Astarte : whom he makes to be born of Tyrus and Syria, and to have been the wife of Adonis : as also Macrobius 2. Saturn. cap. 21. sayes, that Adonis was with great veneration commonly worshipped of the Assyrians : and Hierome upon Ezek. 8. 44. notes that Thammuz (whom there the Idolatrous women are noted to bewail) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may seem that in the worship of Astarte or Venus, they did bewail her husband Adonis : as also the Grecians did in their songs of Adonis : Mourne for Adonis the fair, dearie Adonis the fair. Howbeit others in that place of Ezek. 28. 13. Thammuz, to be the mourning for Osiris in the sacrifice of Isis : whose losse of her Husband Osiris, was as famous in the Egyptian Idolatry, as with the Grecians, Venus losse of Adonis. And to this agreeth that that Plutarch hath, de Iside & Osiride : that Osiris with the Egyptians is called Amunus : which word may seem to be the same with Ezekiel's Thammuz. But howsoever these Zidonians were thus anciently fostered with the milk of Idolatry : yet they were more apt to receive the Doctrine of the Gospel of Christ after his Ascension, than the Jews : who had been taught by Moses and the Prophets so many yeers, whereof our Saviour in Matthew and Luke : Woe be to thee Corazin, &c. for if the great works which were done in thee, had been done in Tyrus and Zidon, they had repented long agoe, &c. but I say unto you, it shall be easier for Tyrus and Zidon, at the day of judgement, than for you.

It received a Christian Bishop with the first : who was afterward of the Diocesse of Tyre. But in the yeer of our Redemption 636. it fell into the hands of the Saracens, and continued in their possession till Baldwinus the first, then King of Hierusalem : in the year 1111. by the help of the Danes and Norwaises, who came with a Fleet to visit the Holy Land, and took Port at Joppa, it was again recovered, the commandment thereof being given to Eustace Gromer, a Noble man of that Country. And again in the year 1250. it was reedified and strengthened by Lodowick the French King : while he spent four yeer in the War of the Holy Land. Lastly, in the year 1289. it was reconquered by the Saracens : and is now in possession of the Turk, and hath the name of Zai.

Niger Possellus.

§. III.

Of Sarepta, with a brief History of Tyre in the same Coast.

Sarepta, or after the Hebrew, Sarphat, is the next City Southward from Zidon, between it and the River called Naar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a City very famous for the excellent Wine growing neer it : of which Sidonius :

Vina mihi non sunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna, Neque Sareptano palmite missa bibos.

I have no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine,
Nor any for the drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This City had also a Bishop, of the Diocesse of Tyre : after it came to the Saracens and Turks, as the rest : and is now called Saphet, saith Possellus.

Not far from Sarepta was situate that sometime famous City of Tyre, whose fleets of ships commanded, and gave the law over all the Mediterranean Sea, and the borders thereof : during which time of greatnesse and power, the Tyrans erected Urica, Leptis, and Carthage in Africa, of which Virgil. Urbs antiqua fuit, Tyrii temere Coloni, Carthago. Virgil. 1. And Carthage was therefore called Punica quasi Phœnicum, a Colonie of the Phœnicians. In Spain they founded Gades, now Caliz. In Italie, Nola : in Asia the lesse, Dromos Plin. 5. c. 19. Marcell. 1. 22. Achille, which City the Scholiast of Apollonius placeth neer the River Phyllis, in Bythinia.

It had anciently the name of Zor, or Tzor : and so it is written in Josua the 19. taking name from the situation ; because built on a high Rock, sharp at one end. The Latines, as it seems, knew it by the name of Sarra : for Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, O. Gellus. 1. 4. c. 5. sturni Sarraenum, by which name Juvenal and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it upon a high hill, whereof many ruines remain to this day ; the place being still known by the name of the ancient Tyre : and because it was a Colonie of the Zidonians, the Prophet Ejay calleth it the Daughter of Zidon ; which Tyro, as alio confirmeth, though Berosus by affinity of name makes Thiras the son of Japhet to be the Parent thereof: and though no doubt it was very ancient (for so much the Prophet Ezai also witnesseth, Is not this your glorious Citie, whose antiquity is of ancient daies &c.) yet, that Thiras the son of Japhet set himself in the bosome of the Canaanites who built Zidon, and peopled all that Region, I see nothing to persuade me.

But that new Tyre in after-times so renowned, seemeth to be the work of Agenor: and of this opinion was Curtius: and Josephus and Eusebius make this City elder than Solomon's Temple 240. years: Cedrenus 361. who also addeth, that Tyrus the wife of Agenor, gave it her name: but of Agenor I will speak more at large in the story of their Kings.

For strength and for the commodity of the harbour, and the better to receive Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Island 700. paces from the Continent; and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the midst of the Seas, as some read, or as others, in the inner-moat part of the Sea, whence he called it Scimita at the entry of the Sea, as also the same Prophet calleth it, The Mart of the people for many Isles: and Ejaj, a Mart of the Nations: and so proud, wealthy, and magnificent was this City, as the Prophet Ejaj calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the World.

It excelled both in learning, and in manu-facture: especially in the making and dyeing of Purple, and Scarlet-cloth: which, faith Julius Pollux, was first found out by Hercules Dog, who passing along the Sea-coast, and eating of the Fish Conchilis or Purpura, the hair of his lips became of that colour. It worshipped the Idols that Zidon did: saving that Hercules became their Patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrians presented him with a Crown of gold, and other gifts, desiring to remain his friends and allies, answered them, that he had vowed a sacrifice to Hercules, the Defender of their City, and the Ancestor of the Macedonian Kings: and must therefore enter it. Whereupon they sent him word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountain of old Tyre: where he might perform that ceremony. But this availed not: for Alexander was not so superstitious, as ambitious; he desired to enter the Town, which being denied, he, as one whom no perill could fear, nor labour weary, gathered together as many ships as he could, and brought from Libanus so great a number of Cedars, and so many weighty stones from the old City of Tyre adjoining, as, notwithstanding that his materials were often waisted away with the strength of the Sea and the Tides, yet he never rested, till he had made a foot-passage from the Continent to the Island: and having once approached their walls, he over-topt them with Turrets of wood, and other frames: from whence (having filled the body of force with the violent moving spirit of resolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the Sword that resisted; after which, he caused 2000. more to be hung up in a rank all along the Sea-shore: which execution upon cold blood he performed (as some Authors affirm) upon the skulls of those slaves which had formerly slain all their Masters, taking their Wives, Children, Riches, and power of Government to themselves. This victory of Alexander over the Tyrians, Josephus remembreth: and how Sanaballat revolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000. Souldiers: who was the last Satrapa or Provincial Governour, which Darius seated in Samaria: the same who having married his Daughter to Manassé, brother to Jaddus the high Priest of Hierusalem, obtained of Alexander, that a Temple might be built on the Mountain Garizim over Samaria: that the forces of the Jews being divided, Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The honour of which Priesthood he bestowed on his son in law Manassé, whom the Jews oppugned, for that he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander besieged Gaza, Sanaballat, whom Gul. Tyris called Sanabula, died.

Long before this desolation of Tyre by the cruelty of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanasser the Assyrian King: when the growing pride of the Assyrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the rest of Syria, became envious of the beauty, riches, and power of that city. He besieged it both on the Land-side, and with three-score ships of war held the Port: to the end that neither any victuals nor any supply of men might enter it: but the Tyrians with twelve sail scattered that fleet, and took 500. prisoners of the Assyrians: notwithstanding, the Assyrian continued his resolution, and lay before before it by his Lieutenants five years, but with ill successe. And this siege Menander Ephesus, cited by Josephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as he found the Story among the Annals of the Tyrians (which the said Menander converted into Greek) adding, that Eldene, whom Tyrians called Helisaeus, was then King of Tyre, having governed the same six and twenty years. Soon after this repulse of Salmanasser, and about 200. years before the victory of Alexander, Nabuchodonosor, at such time as he destroyed Hierusalem with the Temple, came before this City: who indeed gave to Alexander the example of that despairfull work, of joyning it to the Continent. For Nabuchodonosor had formerly done it: though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the strength of the Sea, the same cawley and passage was again broken down, and demolished.

Against Nabuchodonosor, for many years, the Tyrians defended themselves: for so long did those Babylonians continue before it, as every head was made bald, and every shoul- der made bare, faith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Ejaj had manifestly foretold the destruction of this proud place. In the end, and after thirteen years siege or more, the Tyrians despoiled of all their hopes, and remembering over-late the predictions and threatenings of Gods Prophets, having prepared a convenient number of ships, abandoned their City, transporting with themselves the ablest of all that remained: and with their wives, children, and portable riches, sayled thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritime Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: so as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to satisfie so many labours and perils, or any person upon whom to avenge themselves for the losse of so many bodies in that War: It pleased God in recompence thereof (who strengthened this resolution, as in a work of his own) to make Nabuchodonosor victorious over the Egyptians: and gave him that Kingdom and the spoile thereof, as it were, in wages for his Army. Whereupon Saint Hierome noteth, that God leaveth not the good deeds of the Heathen unrewarded: who though they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action, to attain unto that eternal happinesse reserved for his Servants and Saints: yet such is the boundlesse goodness of God, as he often repayeth them with many worldly gifts and temporal blessings.

Now of this enterprise of Nabuchodonosor against Tyre, prophane Historians have not bin silent. For both Diocles, and Philostratus, (as Josephus citeth them) the one in his second Book, the other in his Phenician Histories remember it.

After these two great Vastations by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon, this City of Tyre, repaired and recovered it self again: and continued in great glory about 300. years, even to the coming of our Saviour Christ: and after him flourished in the Christian Faith near 600. years: the Archbishop whereof gave place to none but to the Patriarch of Hierusalem only, who within his own Diocesse had fourteen great Cities, with their Bishops and Suffragans: namely Caipha, otherwise Porphiria, Acon, or Plolomais, Sarepta, Zidon, Casarea Philippi, Berytus, Eyblus, Botrys, Tripolis, Orthosia, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus, (or Tortosa) and Maraclea. But in the year 636. it was with the rest of that beautiful Region of Phenicia and Palestina, subjected to the cruell and faithlesse Saracens: under the burthen and yoke of whose tyranny it suffered, with the other Palestine Cities, 488. years.

In the year 1112. it was attempted by Baldwine King of Hierusalem: but in vain: yet in the year 1124. by Guaremonde, Patriarch of Hierusalem, Vicegerent to Baldwine the second, with the assistance of the Venetians, and their fleet of Gallies, it was again recovered, and subjected to the Kings of Hierusalem, and so it remained 165. years.

Finally, in the year 1189. Saladine having first taken Hierusalem, removed his whole Army, and fate down before Tyre: drawing his fleet of Ships and Gallies from Alexandria into the Port, this City as then only remaining in the Christian power.

The Citizens finding themselves reduced into great famine, and many other miseries, they at once with certain rafters of timber, fiered, burnt, and brake the Saracens fleet, and sallied out resolutely upon his Army, slew so great numbers of them, and followed their victory with such fury, as that the Saracens forsaking their Trenches and Tents, removed in great disorder and dishonour. Two years after which victory the body of that famous Frederick Barbarossa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Christians enemies over a River unfordable, perished by the weight of his armour therein) was brought and interred in the Cathedral Church of Tyre, near unto that glorious Sepulchre of Origen, garnished and graven with guilt pillars of Marble, 940. years before before therein buried: but in the year 1289. the Saracens again attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth subject to the Turks.

||. IV.

Of Ptolomais or Acon.

The third City alongst the coast of the Sea, which the Asserites could not obtain, on the South bound of Affer was Acho, which was the ancient name thereof after Hierome, though other good Authours affirm, that it took name from Acon the brother 10 of Ptolomie. Plinie calleth it Acc: and otherwise the Colonie of Claudius. It had also the name of Coth, or Cod, and by Zeiglerus it is called Hatipos.

But lastly, it was intituled Ptolomais, after the name of one of the Egyptian Ptolomies: which City also, as it is 1 Mac. 11. another of the Ptolomies, infideliously wrested from his son in law Alexander, which called himself the son of Antiochus Epiphanes: the same Alexander having married Cleopatra, daughter of the said Ptolomie, not long before. Therein also was Jonathan Machabees treacherously surpris'd and slain, as it is 1 Mac. 12. 48. by the perfidioufnesse of Tryphon, whom soon after Antiochus pursued, as it is in the Story ensuing: and, by like reason, about the same time was the afore said Alexander in the war against Demetrius, one of the sons of Antiochus the great, with whom Ptolomie joyn'd, overthrownd and treacherously murdered by Zabdiel the Arabian: to whom he fled for succour: and his head presented unto his father in law Ptolomie: who 10 enjoyed not the glory of his victory and treason above three daies, for God struck him by death.

For the beauty and strength of this City, this Alexander made it his regall seat; two parts of the same being invironed by the Sea, and the Port, for safety and capacity, not inferior to any other in all that Tract. This City is distant from Hierusalem some four and thirty miles: four miles to the North from the Mountain Carmel, and as much to the South from Castrum Lamberti: from Tyre, Antonius maketh it two and thirty Italian miles. In the middle of the City there was a Tower of great strength, sometime the 30 Temple of Bel-zebub: and therefore called the Castle of Flies, on the top whereof there was maintained a perpetuall light, like unto that called Pharus in Egypt: to give comfort in the night to those Ships which came neer and sought that part. It had in it a Bishop's seat of the Diocesse of Tyre, after it became Christian: but in the year 636. (a fatal year to the Christians in those parts) it was forced and taken by Haomarus the Saracen. In the year 1104. it was regained by Baldwine the first, by the help of the Gallies of Genoa: to whom a third of the Revenue was given in recompence. Again, in the year of our Lord God, one thousand one hundred fourscore and seven, Saladine King of Egypt and Syria, became Lord thereof. In the year of Christ, one thousand one hundred ninety and one, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France, it was repossessed and redelivered to the Christians. Lastly, in the year 1291. it was by the force of the Saracens besieged with an Army of 150000. entred, sackt, and utterly demolished: though in some sort afterward reedified, and it is now Turkish.

||. V.

Of the Castle of Saint George.

Five miles from Ptolomais towards the East, is the Castle of Saint George seated, in which he was born: the Valley adjoining bearing the same name. And though for the credit of Saint Georges killing the Dragon, I leave every man to his own belief: yet I cannot but think, that if the Kings of England had not some probable record of that his memorable act, among many others: it was strange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Successors royally have continued, should have born his name, seeing the World had not that scarcity of Saints in those daies, as that the English were driven to make such an erection upon a fable, or person feigned. The place is described by Adrichomius in his description of Affer, to have been in the fields of Libanus, between the River Adonis, and Zidon: his own words are these:

these: *Hoc loco qui ab incolis Cappadocia appellatur, non longe à Beryto, memorant inclytum christi Attilitem D. Georgium, Regis filiam ab immanissimo Dracone asseruisse: eamque matris bestia parenti restituisse. In cuius rei memoriam Ecclesia postmodum iust edificata; In this place, which by the Inhabitants is called Cappadocia, not far from Berytus, men say that the famous Knight of Christ, Saint George, did rescue the Kings Daughter from a huge Dragon: and having killed the beast, delivered the virgin to her Parent. In memory of which deed a Church was after built there: Thustar Adrichomius. His Authours he citeth Lodovicus Roman, Patric Navigationum l. 1. c. 3. and Bridenbach itin. 5. The Valley under this Castle sometime called Affer, was afterward called the Valley of Saint George. If this authority suffice not, we may rather make the Story allegoricall, figuring the victory of Christ, than except of George the Arrian Bishop, mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.*

||. VI.

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

Between Ptolomais and Tyre alongst the Seacoast, was the strong City of Acziba, or Achazib, which S. Hierome called Achzib, and Iosephus Ecdippor, Plinie Ecdippa, one of those which defended it self against the Asserites. Belforrest findes Acziba and Sandalium, or the Castle of Alexander to be one, but I know not whence he had it.

10 The twelve Searchers of the Land which Moses sent from Cadesbarn, travelled as far to the North as Reob, or Rechob, in the Tribe of Affer, which Rechob, as also Berothe, which by Ezechiel, cap. 47. ver. 16. is placed in these North borders, belonged in David's time to the King Hadarbezer, as it may be gathered out of the second of Samuel chap. 8. ver. 8. and cap. 10. ver. 6. and it defended it self against the Asserites, as Lidon, Tyre, Achzib, Ptolomais, Alab, Helbah, and Aphek did.

This Aphek it was, whose wall falling down, slew seven and twenty thousand of Ben-hadads Souldiers, after that a hundred thousand had been slaughtered by the Israelites, under the conduct of Abah. Here Junius finds that the Philistines encamped a little before the battell at Gilboa, though in his note upon the first of Samuel the 9. & 1. he takes 30 Aphek there mentioned (at which battell the Ark was taken) to have been in Juda. Of which Jos. 15. and 53. and in the second of Kings 13. 17. he reads, Fortiter, for, in Aphek, where others convert it, Percutienti Syros in Aphek.

The next place along the coast is Sandalium, first called Schandulium of Schander, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Marcedon built it when he besieged Tyre: and set it on a point of Land which extendeth it self into the Sea, between Acziba and Tyre: which Castle Baldwine the first rebuilt and fortified; in the year of Christ 1157. when he undertook the recovery of Tyre.

Not much above a mile from this Castle, there ariseth that most plentiful Spring of water, which Solomon remembreth, called the Well of living Water: from whence not 40 onely all the fields and plains about Tyre are made fruitful by large pipes hence drawn: but the same Spring, which hath not above a bow-shot of ground to travail till it recover the Sea, driveth six great Mills in that short passage, saith Brochard.

Within the Land, and to the East of Acziba, and Sandalium, standeth Hofa: and beyond it, under the Mountains of Tyre, the City of Achsaph, or Axib, or after S. Hierome, Acisap, a City of great strength, whole King, amongst the rest, was slain by Sejua, at the waters of Merom.

Of Thoron, Giscala, and some other places.

Farther into the Land, towards Jordan, was seated the Castle of Thoron, which Huzo of Sancto Ademare built on the Easter-most hills of Tyre, in the year 1107. thereby to restrain the excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians: the place adjoining being very fruitfull, and exceeding pleasant. From this Castle the Lords of Thoron, famous in the story of the Wars for the recovery of the Holy Land, derive their names, and take their Nobility. It had in it a curious Chappell, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, in which Humphrey of Thoron, Constable to Baldwine the 3. King of Hierusalem, lieth buried: There were five Castles besides this within the Territory of Affer: where, whereof four are seated almost of equall distance from each other: to wit, Castrum Lamperit, Montfort, Indim (Or Saron) Castrum Regium and Belfort: the first neer the Sea under the Hills of Saron, the next three, to wit, Indim, Montfort, and Regium, stand more within the Land, and belonged to the Brotherhood and fellowship of the Teutonici, or Dutch Knights (by which they defended themselves, and gave succour to other Christians at such time as the Saracens possessed the best part of the upper Galilee) the chief of which Order was in Ptolomy's Acon. The first fortresse was for beauty and strength called Belfort, seated in the high ground upon the River Naar, neer the City Rama: of which in this Tribe Jos. 19. 29. for which the Vulgar reads Horma: making the article a part of the word, and mistaking the vowels: from the siege of this Castle of Belfort,¹⁰ the great Saladine King of Syria and Egypt, was by the Christians Army raised, and with great losse and dishonour repulsed.

To the East of Belfort, is the strong City of Alab (Or Achlab) which S. Hierome calleth Chalab, one of those that defended themselves against Affer, as Roob (Or Rechob) not far thence did.

Towards the South from Roob they place Gabala (which Herod furnished the Ascalonite rebuilt) making it of the Territory of Chabul, Quod Syrorum lingua dispicere significat (saith Weissenburg) so called, because Hiram of Tyre was ill pleased with those twenty Cities, seated hereabout, which Solomon presented unto him in recompence of those provisions sent him for the building of the Temple. Others think this Chabul (Or Cabul)¹⁰ containing a circuit of those twenty Cities given to Hiram, to have been without the compass of the holy Land, though bordering Affer on the North side: as it is said, 1 Reg. 9. 11. That they were in Regione limitis: that is, in limite Regionis, in the border of the country: for it was not lawful, say they, to give to strangers any part of the possessions allotted to the Israelites: howsoever, that after Hiram had refused them, they were permitted by the Israelites, it appears, 2 Chron. 8. 14. And it seems they were conquered by David from the Syri Rechobee, whose City Roob, or Rechob, was in these parts.

Cap. 26.

Almost of equall distance from the Castle of Thoron, they place the Cities of Giscala, and Gadara: of which Gadara is rather to be placed over Jordan: Giscala was made famous by John the son of Levi, who from a mean estate gathering together four hundred¹⁰ Thieves, greatly troubled all the upper Galilee, at such time as the Romans attempted the conquest of Judea: by whose practice Josephus, who then commanded in the upper Galilee, was greatly endangered: whereof himself hath written at large, in his second Book of those Wars. This John betraying, in all he could, the City of Giscala (whereof he was native) to the Roman State: and finding a resistance in the City, gave opportunity, during the contention, to the Tyrians and Gadarims, to surprize it: who at the same time forc't it, and burnt it to the ground: but being by Josephus authority rebuilt, it was afterward rendred to Titus by composition. They finde also the Cities of Cus Major, and  Cades* (Or Cadesa) of the first was that Syro-phenician, whose Daughter Christ delivered of the evil spirit. Neer the other, they say, it was that Jonathan M¹⁰ chabeb overthrew the Army of Demetrius.

There are others also besides these, as Ammon, or Chammon, of which Jos. 19. 28. where also we read of Nehiel, Rama, Alamelec, and Beiron: the Cities of Alcath, or Chelcath, Habdon, and Rechob, and Misheal, which we have already mentioned, were by the Afferites given to the Levites. Of others held by the Canaanites, mention is made, Judg. 1. 30. to which out of Josua we may adde Ebron, Amhad, and others, on which no story dependeth; and therefore I will not pester the description with them.

Of the Rivers and Mountains of Affer.

The Rivers to the North of Affer, are Adonis, afterward Canis, to which Zeigler joyneth Lycus; Ptolomy, Leontis: both which fall into the Sea neer Berytus: which River of Leontis, Montanus draws neer unto Zidon: finding his head northwithstanding where Ptolomy doth, between Zidon and Tyre. It hath also a River called Fons hortorum Libani, which Adrichome out of Brochard intituleth Eleuthernus: for which he also citeth Pliny, and the first of Maachabees the eleventh Chapter: but neither of those authorities prove Eleuthernus to be in Affer: for this River falleth into the Sea at the Isle of Ara-
10 bus: not far from Balanea, witnesse Ptolomy: and therefore Pineius calleth it Valania, and Postellus, Velana; which River boundeth Phenicia on the North-side: to which Strabo also agreeth: but this principall River of Affer, Arias Montanus calleth Cabatus. Christianus Choro out of the mouth and papers of Peter Laicstan (which Laicstan in this our age both viewed and described the Holy Land) calleth the main River Fons hortorum Libani: and one of the streams which runneth into it from the North-side, Naar, and another from the South-west, Chabul: of the city adjoining of the same name: for Eleuthernus it cannot be. There is also another River described by Adrichome, named Jephthael, which I finde in no other Author, and for which he citeth Jos. 19. but the word
10 Jephthael, which is added there to Jephthael, is not taken for a River, but for a Valley: and for the River of Belus, remembered by Josephus and Tacitus, which is also called Pagidas, saith Pliny: out of the felds of this River are made the best Glasse, which sometimes the Libanites practised: and now the Venetians at Murina. Arias Montanus makes Belus to be a branch of Chechemin, which it cannot be: for Belus is known to flow from out the Lake Cendevia, as all Cosmographers, both Ancient and Modern, and the later Travel-
10 lers into these parts witnesse. It is true that the River of Chifon taketh water from Chechemin, but not in that fashion which Montanus hath described it: neither doth it finde the Sea at Ptolomais Acon, according to Montanus: but farther to the South between Caiphas and Sicaminum, witnesse Zeigler, Adrichomius, and Schrot.

Besides these Rivers there are divers famous Springs and Fountains, as that of living waters adjoining to Tyre: and Maserephot, or after S. Hierome, Maserephotmaim, which Well filled by the flood of the Sea adjoining, (they say) the Inhabitants by seething the water make salt thereof, as at Nantwiche.

The Mountains which bound Affer on the North, are those of Anti-libanus, which with Libanus bound Celestysia: two great ledges of Hills, which from the Sea of Phenicia and Syria, extend themselves far into the Land East-ward, 400. stadia, or furlongs, according to Strabo: for that length he giveth to the Valley of Celestysia, which those Mountains inclose: but Pliny gives them 1500. furlongs in length from the West, where they begin at Thapsiphon, or Dei facies, neer Tripolis to the Mountains of Arabia beyond Damascus: where Anti-Libanus turneth towards the South. These ledges where they begin to part Tracontis and Bajan, from the Desert Arabia, are called Hermion: which Moses also nameth Sion, the Phenicians, Syrians, and the Amorites, Samir; neither is this any one Mountain apart, but a continuation of Hills: which running farther Southerly, is in the Scriptures called Galaad, or Gilead: the same being still a part of Libanus, as the Prophet Hieremy proveth: Galaad is mibi caput Libani: noting, that this Galaad is the highest of those Hills of Libanus. Strabo knows them by the name of Tracontis: and Ptolomy by Hippus. Arias Montanus calleth these Mountains bordering Affer; Libanus, for Anti- 10 libanus, contrary to all other Cosmographers, but he giveth no reason of his opinion.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops, because (according to Tacitus) the highest of them are covered with snow all the Summer: the Hebrew word Libanus, (saith Weissenburg) signifieth whitenesse. Others call them by that name of the Frankincence which those Trees yeeld: because Libanus is also the Greek word for that Gum.

Niger out of Aphrodisens affirmeth, that on Libanus there falleth a kinde of honey dew, which is by the Sun congealed into hard Sugar, which the Inhabitants call Sacchar, from whence came the Latine word Saccarum.

The rest of the Mountains of Affer, are those Hills above Tyre, and the Hills of Saron, both exceeding fruitful: but those are but of a low stature, compared with Libanus: for from Nebo, or the Mountain of Abarim in Reuben, Moses beheld Libanus threescore miles distant.

§. IV.

THE TRIBE OF NEPH TALIM.

10

Of the bounds of Nephthalim, and of Heliopolis, and Abila.

THE next portion of the Land of Canaan bordering Affer, was the upper Galilee: the greatest part whereof fell to the lot of Nephthalim, the son of Jacob by Billa, the hand-maid of Rachel: who while they abode in Egypt, were increased to the number of 53400. persons, able men to bear arms, numbered at Mount Sinai: all which leaving their bodies in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their sons, 45400. beside 20 Infants, Women, and Children, under twenty years of age. The Land of Nephthalim took beginning on the North part, from the Fountains of Jordan, and the Hill of Libanus adjoining, as far South as the Sea of Galilee, bounded on the West by Affer, and on the East and South-East by Jordan.

On the North-side of Libanus, and adjoining to this Territory of Nephthalim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) also inhabit, in which Tract, and under Libanus, was the city of Heliopolis: which the height of the Mountains adjoining shadowed from the Sun the better part of the day. Possallus calls it Balbec; Niger, Marbech; and Leonclavius, Beallebecca.

Of this name of Heliopolis, there are two great cities in Egypt: the first called On, by the Hebrews, and the Chaldean Paraphrast; otherwise Bethfemes, or after the Latine, Solis oppidum, or Domus Solis: The City of the Sun: into which, saith Ulpian, Severus the Roman Emperour sent a Colonia: the other Gestelius nameth Dealmarach: and of this name Stephanus also findeth a city in Thrace, and Glycas in Phrygia.

There is also in the same Valley adjoining to Nephthalim, Chalcis, and Abila. Chalcis, of whom the region towards Palmyrena hath the name of Chalcidica, over which Herod Agrippa, and Bernice the Queen commanded.

Abila also gave name to the region adjoining, of which Lysanius the son of Herod the elder, became Tetrarch or Governour: whereof Protolmy gave it the addition of Lysani, and called it Abila Lysanii. Volaterran names it Apila, of which he notes, that one Dionysius, a famous Sophister was native, who by Volaterran is intituled Apuleius, not Athensius. After that this city of Abila or Apila, had received the Christian Faith, Priscillianus became the Bishop thereof: slain afterward by our Brittish Maximian at Treuer. For distinction of this city (if it be not the same, as it may be thought to be the same) it is to be remembered, that in the Tribe of Manasse, joyning upon the bounds of the Tribe of Nephthalim, there is another city of the same name, saving that it is written with an (R) for an (N) and called Abela, remembered in the 20. chapter of the second of Sammel. The same Josephus calls Abelmachea, and Hierome, Bethmachas. In the place of Sammel, for distinction sake, it is written Abel Beth-Mabaca, (for belike it was the Town of Mabaca the wife of Macir, the son of Manasse, the father of Gilead) in the Chronicles it is called Abel-Majim. This city Joab besieged, because Seba the son of Bichri, who rebelled against David, fled thierinto for succour: but a certain wife woman of the city persuading the people to cast Seba his head over the wall, Joab retired his Army. The same city was afterward taken by the King of Damascus, Benadad: and after a while by Teglatphalasar.

The word Abel may be expounded, either to signifie bewailing, or a plain ground; and therefore no marvell that many Towns (with some addition for distinction sake) were thus called: for even of bewailing, many places took name; as Bochim, Judg. 2. 4. and

Of Hazor.

IN the Tribe of Nephthalim was that famous City of Jabin, in Josua's time called Azor, * (or after the Chaldean Paraphrast, Hazor) by Josephus, Azora; by Junius, * Chatzor. * Of two other Cities of this name in Jude, see ch. 9. sect. 1.
Of a fourth in Benjamin, see that which follows in this place: of a fifth in this Tribe of Nephthalim, called Hazor, see ch. 19. 27. whereto we may add Chasfar-Hazor, in the uttermost North-east of Manasse, over Jerusalem, and lastly, Chasfar-Shubel, another City of Simeon, fil 19. 3. c 1 Kings 9. d Hieron. loc. Hebr. l. 4. out of Nehem. 11. 33. as it seems.

Of Casarea Philippi.

THERE was also on the border, and within the Territory of Nephthalim, that renowned city of Lais, or Lajisch, as Junius writes it, or Leichen; which city the children of Dan (being straitened in their Territory under Juda) invaded and mastered; and gave it the name of their own Parent Dan: and by that name it is written in Genes. 14. at which place Abraham surprized Chedorlaomer and his confederates, and followed his victory as far as Sebah, formerly remembered in the division of Syria, otherwise called Sophena. And after the possession of the Danites, it had the joynt name of Leichen-Dan. Weissenburg writes it Lacks, the Geneva, Lajsch; Josephus, Dana; Benjamin, Balina; Breidenbach, Belena: but the now Inhabitants know it by the name of Belina to this day: Julg. 18.
witness Neubrigenis, Tyrius, Volaterranus, Brochard the Monk, and Postellus: who also taketh this city to be the same, which in Matth. 15. 39. in the Vulgar is called Magedan, for which the Greek Text hath Magdala in that place, and in S. Mark, speaking of the same story, Dalmanntha. At such time as the children of Dan obtained this place, it seemeth that it was either a free city, of the alliance and confederacy of the Zidonians, or else subject unto the Kings thereof; for it is written Judges 18. And there was none to Verse 28.
help, because Lais was far from Zidon: and they had no business with other men: for it was above thirty English miles from the Mediterranean Sea, and from Zidon.
Phil. l. 5. c. 15.

In after-times when these regions became subject to the state of Rome, it had the name of Panais, from a Fountain adjoining so called: and therefore Protolmy calls it Casarea Heg. d. l. c. 35. Panie. Hegeffippus calls it Parinium, saith Weissenburg: but he had read it in a corrupt copy; for in Hegeffippus, set out by Badus, it is written Panenum without an (R): and at such time as Philip the son of the elder Herod, brother to Herod, Tetrarch of Galilee, became Governour of Tracoonitis, sometime Basan: this city was by him amplified and fortified; and both to give memory to his own name, and to flatter Tiberius Caesar, he called it * Casarea Philippi: and so it became the Metropolis, and head city of Tracoonitis, and one of the first cities of Decapolis. And being by Agrippa in the succeeding age greatly adorned; by him in honour of Nero, it was called Neronia, or Neroniada. But as the former part Manasse.

nothing remained with that Emperour, but the memory of his impiety: so in S. Hieron's time the Citizens remembered their former Paneas, and so re-called it, with the Territo-ry adjoining by the ancient name. Of this City was that woman whom Christ healed of a bloody issue, by touching the hem of his garment with a constant Faith: who af-terward, as she was a woman of great wealth and ability, being mindfull of Gods good-ness, and no lesse gratefull for the same, as Eusebius and Nicephorus report, caused two Statues to be cast in pure Copper: the one representing Christ, as we see it could be mon-tered: the other made like her self, kneeling at his feet, & holding up her hands towards him. These he mounted upon two great Bases or Pedestals of the same metall, which she placed by a Fountain near her own house: both which (saith Eusebius) remained to in their first perfection, even to his own time: which himself had seen, who lived in the reign of Constantine the Great. But in the year after Christ 363, that Monster Julian A-postata, caused that worthy Monument to be cast down and defaced: setting up the like of his own in the same place: which Image of his was with fire from Heaven broken into fitters: the head, body, and other parts fundered and scattered, to the great admi-ration of the people at that time living. The truth of this accident is also confirmed by Sozomenus Salaminius, in his fifth Book and twentieth Chapter.

This City built by the Danites, was neerer the joyning together of those two Rivers, which arising from the Springs of Jor and Dan, the two apparent Fountains of Jordan, in a foile exceeding fruitfull and pleasant: for, as it is written, Judges 18. it is a place in which doth want nothing that is in the world. In the fields belonging to this City it was which S. Peter acknowledged Christ to be the Son of God: whereupon it was answered, Tu es Petrus, & super hanc Petram, &c. After this City received the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seat: and it ran the same fortune with the rest, for it was after taken and re-taken by the Saracens, and Christians: under Fulch the fourth King of Hierusalem, and after the death of Godfrey of Bullion, the King of Damascus wrested it from the Christians: and shortly after by them again it was recovered. Lastly, now it remaineth with all that part of the World subjected to the Turk.

||. IV.

Of Capernaum, and the Cities of Decapolis.

Among the remarkable Cities within this Tribe, Capernaum is not the least: so of-ten remembered by the Evangelists. This City had the honour of Christs pre-ference three years: who for that time was a Citizen thereof, in which he first preached and taught the doctrine of our salvation: according to that notable Prophecy of Esay 9. The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light: they that dwell in the Land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined.

Capernaum was seated on Jordan, even where it entrench into the Sea of Galilee, in an excellent and rich foile: of whose destruction Christ himself prophesied in these words, And thou Capernaum which art lifted up unto heaven, shalt be brought down to Hell, &c. which shewed the pride and greariness of that City: for it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis, and the Metropolis of Galilee. And although there were some marks of this Cities magnificence in Saint Hieron's time, as himself confesseth; it being then a reasonable Burge or Town: yet those that have since, and long since seen it, as Bro-chard, Breidenbeck, and Saliniac affirm, that it then consisted but of six poor Filther-men houses.

The Region of ten principall Cities, called Decapolitana, or Decapolis, is in this de-scription often mentioned, and in S. Matthew, Mark and Luke also remembered; but I find no agreement between the Cosmographers, what proper limits it had: and so Pliny himself confesseth; for Marins Niger, speaking from others, bounds it on the North by the Mountain Casius in Cafotis: and endeth it to the South at Egypt and Arabia: by which description it embraceth Phenicia, a part of Celsyria, all Palestina, and Judea.

Pliny also makes it large, & for the ten Cities of which it taketh name, he numb'reth four of them to be situated towards Arabia: to wit, first these three, Damascus, Ophor, Raphana, then Philadelphi (which was first called Amana, saith Stephanus, or as I ghesse, Amoma rather, because it was the chief City of the Ammonites, known by the name of Rabbah, before Ptolemy. Philadelphus gave it this later and new name.) Then Scythopolis, sometime sometime Nisa, built (as is said) by Bacchus, in memory of his Nurse, who died therein, anciently known by the name of Bethan, for the sixth he setteth Gadara (not that Gada-ra in Celsyria, which was also called Antioch and Selenia;) but it is Gadara in Basan, which Pliny in this place meaneth, seated on an high hill, neer the River of Hieromaix. This River Ortelius takes to be the River Jacob: which boundeth Gad and Manasse over Jordan: but he mistaketh it; for Hieromaix falleth into the Sea of Galilee, between Hippos and Gerasa, whereas Jacob entrench the same Sea between Ephron and Phamul. For the tenth he nameth Hippos or Hippion, a City so called of a Colony of Horlmen there gar-rison'd by Herod, on the East-side of the Galilean Sea, described hereafter in the Tribe of Manasse over Jordan. For the eighth Pella, which is also called Eutis, and Berenice, seated in the South-border of the Region over Jordan, called Perea. For the ninth Gelasa, which Josephus takes to be Gerasa: and Gerasa is found in Celsyria by Josephus, Hegesippus, and Stephanus: but by Ptolomy (whom I rather follow) in Phenicia. The tenth and last, Pliny nameth Canatha, and so doth Suetonius and Stephanus, which Volaterran calls Camala, but Hegesippus rightly Camala, a City in the Region of Basan over Jordan, so called, because those two Hills on which it is seated, have the shape of a Camell. But the collection of these ten Cities, whereof this Region took name, is better gathered out of Brochard, Breidenbeck, and Saliniac, which make them to be these, Caesarea Philippi, and Asor, be-fore remembered, Cedar, Nephtalim, Sephet, Corazin, Capernaum, Bethsaida, Jotapata, Tibe-rius, and Scythopolis, or Bethan. For all other Authors disagree herein, and give no rea-son for their opinion. One place of the Evangelist S. Matthew makes it manifest, that this Region called Decapolitana, was all that Tract between Zidon, and the Sea of Gali-lee. For thus it is written: And he departed again from the coasts of Tyrus and Zidon, and came unto the Sea of Galilee, through the midst of the coasts of Decapolis: so that it was bounded by Damascus and Libanus on the North: by the Phenician Sea, between Zidon and Ptolomais on the West: by the Hills of Galbo and Bethan on the South: and by the Mountains Tracones, otherwise Hermon, Sanir, and Galaad, on the East: which is from East to West the whole breadth of the Holy Land: and from the North to the South, neer the same distance, which may be each way forty English miles.

||. V.

Of Hamath.

But to look back again towards Libanus, there is seated, neer the foot thereof the City of Hamath or Chamath, of which (as they say) the Country adjoining taketh name: the same which Josephus calleth Amathitis, and Amathensis: Jacobus Zeigler, Iturea. Iturea Regio tenet borealia tribus Nephtali, per montem Libanum usque Trachones. The Country of Iturea, saith he, containeth the North parts of the Tribe of Nephtali, along the Mount Libanus to Trachones. But herein following Strabo, who calls Trachonitis Iturea, he mistakes the seat of this Region: and so doth Metastor. For indeed were Iturea (which Hegesippus calleth Perea, and G. Tyrinus Baccar) the same with Trachonitis, yet Trachonitis lieth between Caesarea Philippi, and the Mountains Trachones: which the Hebrews call Gilead: and this Hamath or Chamath is seated under Caesarea, towards the Sea West-ward. And it seemeth that this mistaking grew by confounding Emath or Hamath the great in Celsyria, beyond the Mountains Trachones, which Hieron upon Amos calls Antiochia, with Hamath or Hamath the lesser in Phenicia, and Nephtalim, which he calleth Epiphania (and not that which is commonly for this Hamath, or in our Translation Hamath, called Emath, which 2 Chron. 8. 3. is set far from the North border of Canaan in Syria Soba) is re-membered in Numbers 34. ver. 8. and Numbers 13. 22. and in Ezek. 47. 16. In the first of which places it bordereth the Land of promise, these being the words: From Mount Hor you shall point (that is, direct or draw a line) until it come to Hamath; then Israel) to note, that it was of old belonging to Juda, though seated in Israel, that is, in the Kingdom of the seems for dis-

thas, rejecting Hieron, rather follows the opinion of Zeigler above mentioned; as indeed it cannot easily be justified that either one or other of these is either Antiochia or Epiphania, howbeit the same City which in Jof. 19. 35. is called Chamath, and placed in Nephtalim, was also called Chamath (whence the word Hamath and Emath, were framed) may be gathered, partly because the other Hamath, a City in S. 3. for distinction is called Chamath-Dur, Tha, as this (as it may seem by Jof. 21. 32.) was Chamath-Dur.

tie of that name.

§. V.

THE TRIBE OF ZABULON.

OF Zabulon, or Zebulon, another of the sons of Jacob by Lea, there were mustered at Mount Sinai, 57,400. able men, besides women, children, and aged unable persons:
all which dying in the Desert, there centred the Holy Land of their issues 65000. fit to bear arms: who inhabited that part of Canaan, from Apher to the River Chifon Southward, and from the Sea of Galilee to the Mediterran, East and West.

The Cities within this Tribe which border Apher, are Scaminum on the Sea shore; of which Joseph. Ant. 13. c. 19. Debbafat, of which Jos. 19. 11. Jekowam, or Jokweham (whose King was slain by Josias; and the City was given to the Levites;) and Gaba, after called the City of Horimen, of a Regiment there garrisoned by Herod. Then the City which beareth the name of Zabulon, or the City of men, exceeding ancient and magnificent, (b) burnt to the ground by Cyrus, Lieutenant of the Roman Army. Adrichomius makes it the birth-City of (c) Elon Judge of Israel, because he is called Zabulonita: not marking that in the same place, he is said to be buried at Ajalon.

To the East of this City of Zabulon is Cateh, of which Jos. 19. 15. on the border of Apher, and beyond it the lesser (d) Cana of Galilee, where Christ converted water into wine:
the native City of Nathaniel, and, as it is thought, of Simon Zelotes. Beyond it begin the Mountains of Zabulon: and then the City of Cethron (in Zeigler, Ghilton) which defended it self against Zabulon. Then Benjabe, which standeth in the partition of the upper and nether Galilee, fortified by Josephus against the Romans. Not far from hence standeth Shimon of Merom, whose King was slain by Josias.

Then Damma, or Dimma, a City of the Levites: then Noa, or rather Neha, of which Jos. 19. 13. Then Doiban, or Doibain, where Joseph found his brethren feeding their flocks:
the same wherein Elizaeus, besieged by the Syrians, struck them all blinde.

Beyond it, towards the East, they imagine (e) Amthar, or Amathar: then Remmon of the Levites. The last of the Cities on the North border of Zabulon is Bethsaida, one of the ten Cities of Decapolis, situate on the Galilean Sea, and watered by the Springs of Capharnaum, the native City of the Apostles, Peter, Andrew, and Philip. Herein Christ did many miracles, but these people being no less incredulous than the Capharnaum ones, others, thers, received the same Curse of threatened miseries, as, Woe be unto thee Bethsaida, &c.

Alongst the West border of Galilee, towards the South from Bethsaida, was the strong Castle of Magdalum, the habitation of Mary Magdalen, not long since standing.

And beyond it the strong and high seated City of Jotapata, fortified by Josephus in the Roman War: but in the end, after a long siege, surprised by Vespasian, who slaughtered many thousand of the Citizens, and held 1200. prisoners, whereof Josephus the Historian was one.

The last and greatest of the Cities on that * Sea, and the Lake of Gennezareth within * The name of the chief 10 Zabulon, was that of Tiberias, from whence afterward the Galilean Sea also changed name, and was called the Sea of the City Tiberias, so named in the honour of Tiberius Cesar; it was one of the ten Cities, and the Metropolis of the Region Decapolitan, and the greatest and last of the lower Galilee. From hence our Saviour called Matthew from the Toll or Custom-house, to be an Apostle; and neer unto it raised the daughter of Tairus from death: it was built (as Josephus reports) by Herod the Tetrarch, the brother of Philip, in the beginning of the reign of Tiberius Cesar, in the most fruitful part of Galilee; but in a ground full of Sepulchres: Quum juxta nostras leges (saith he) ad septem dies insepulchris habetur, qui in talibus locis habitet; Vt veritas by our law he should be seven daies held as unclean, who inhabited in such a place: by which words, and by the whole place of Josephus it appears, that this Tiberias is not (as some have thought) the same as the old Cimereith, which was seated, not in Zabulon, but in Nephthalim.

Neer unto this Tiberias, at Emas, there were hot baths, where Vespasian the Emperour encamped against Tiberias. More into the Land towards the South-west, is Bethu-lia, seated on a very high hill, and of great strength, famous by the story of Holofernes and Judith, such as it is. Neer which standeth Bethleem of Zabulon: and adjoining unto it Capharath, fortified by Josephus against the Romans: and Japha, an exceeding strong place, afterward forced by Titus: who in the entrance, and afterward in fury slew 15000 of the Citizens; and carried away above two thousand prisoners.

On the South side are the Cities of Cariba of the Levites, and Gabara, of which Josephus in his own life, then Jafse, according to Adrichomius (of which Jos. 19. 12.) Josephus thinks that it is not that Japha of which we spake but now out of Josephus. Jadela, of which Jos. 19. 15. Hierome calls it Jadela: under it Westward, Legio, (afterward a Bishops seat) and the City Belma, in ancient times exceeding strong, remembered Judith 7. 3. 1. Chelma, otherwise Chelma. Between Legio and Nazeret is the City Saffa, or Saffra, the birth-city it is called of Zebedee, Alphus, James and John: Then Sephoris, or Sephora, according to Josephus: Sephorum according to Brocard: which afterward, saith Hegesippus and Hierome was called Diocæsarea, the city of Joachim and Anna, the Parents of the Virgin Mary; it was so called by Herod the Tetrarch, and by him, as Josephus speaks, made the head and defence of Galilee: in another place he saith, Orbitum Galilearum maxime Sephoris & Tiberias, &c. in vita sua.

To the South-west of this Sephoris, or Diocæsarea, was that blessed place of Nazareth, the city of Mary the Mother of Christ; in which he himself was conceived: it standeth between Mount Tabor, and the Mediterran Sea. In this city he abode chiefly four and twenty years, and was therefore called a Nazarene, as the Christians afterward were for many years. It was erected into an Archbishoprick in the following age. Neer unto it are the cities Buria (afterward well defended against the Turks) and Nabalal, of which 10 Jos. 19. 15. and Judg. 1. 30. where it is called Nabalol: and Jos. 21. 35. where it is a city of the Levites: neer the Sea, adjoining to the River of Chifonis Sarid, noted in Josias for the uttermost of Zabulon.

In this Territory of Zabulon there are divers small Mountains: but Tabor is the most renowned, by the apparition of Moses and Elias: and by the Transfiguration of Christ in the presence of Peter, James, and John: unto whom Moses and Elias appeared; in memory whereof, on the top of the Mountain, the Emperress Helen built a sumptuous Chappell.

In the chief River of Zabulon is Chifon, which rising out of Tabor, runneth with one stream

stream Eastward to the Sea of Galilee, and with another stream Westward into the great Sea. This River of Chifon where it riseth, and so far as it runneth Southward, is called Chedumim, or Cadumim: and for mine own opinion, I take it to be the same which Ptolomie calleth Chorjeus: though others distinguish them, and set Chorjeus by Cesaria Palestina. There is a second Torrent or Brook that riseth in the Hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Magdalum: and the third is a branch of a river rising out of the Fountains of Capharnaum, which falleth also into the same Sea, and neer Magdalum; which Torrent they call Dothaw, from the name of the city, from which it passeth Eastward to Bethsaida, and so joyning with Jordanis parvus, which runneth from the Valley of Jephthael, which Jesua reckoneth in the bounds of Zabulon: it endeth in to the Sea of Galilee.

§. VI.

THE TRIBE OF ISSACHAR.

The next adjoining Territory to Zabulon, to the South and Southwest, was Issachar, who inhabited a part of the nether Galilee, within Jordan: of whom there were increased in Egypt, as appeared by their musters at mount Sinai, 54400. able and warlike men, who leaving their bodies with the rest in the Desarts, there entered the Holy Land, 64300.

The first city of this Tribe neer the Sea of Galilee, was Tarichea, distant from Tiberin eight English miles, or somewhat more; a city wherein the Jews (by the practice of a certain mutinous upstart, John the son of Levi) took arms against Josephus the Historian, then Governour of both Galilee. This city was first taken by Cassius, and 3000. Jews carried thence captive; and afterward with great difficulty by Vespasian, who entered it by the Sea side, having first beaten the Jews in a Sea-fight upon the Lake or Sea of Galilee: he put to the sword all sorts of people, and of all ages; saving that his fury being quenched with the Rivers of blood running through every street, he reserved the remainder for slaves and bond-men.

Next to Tarichea is placed Ceffion, or Cisbion, of the Levites, and then Issachar, remembered in the first of Kings, c. 4. v. 17. then Aber, or Ebets, Jos. 19. 20. and Remeth, of which Jos. 19. 21. otherwise Ramoth, 1 Chron. 6. 37. or Jarmuth, Jos. 21. 29. this also was a city of the Levites, from whose Territory the Mountains of Gilboa take beginning; and range themselves to the Mediterran Sea, and towards the West as far as the City of Jezreel, between which and Ramoth, are the cities of Bethpbeses, or Bethpaffes, according to Zeigler; and Enadda, or Hen-chadda, neer which Saul slew himself: under those, Apbec, or Apheca, which Adrichomius placeth in Issachar: between which and Suna, he saith, that the Philistims incamped against Israel, and afterward against Saul: a Land thirsty of blood, for herein also, saith he, the Syrians with two and thirty Reguli assisting Benhadad, 40 encountered Achab, and were overthrown and slaughtered: to whom the King of Israel made a most memorable answer, when Benhadad vaunted before the victory: which was, Tell Benhadad, Let not him that girdeth his harness, boast himself as he that putteth it off; meaning, that glory followed after victory, but ought not to precede it. In the year following, in the fields, as they say, adjoining to this city, was the same vain-glorious Syrian utterly broken and discomfited by Achab: and 100000. footmen of the Aramites, or Syrians, slain: before which overthrow the servants and counsellors of Benhadad (in derision of the God of Israel) told him, That the Gods of Israel were Gods of the Mountain: and therefore if they fought with them in the Plains, they should overcome them.

Under Apbec, towards the Sea, they set the city of Esdrelon, in the Plains of Galilee; 50 called also the great field of Esdrelon, and Maggedo: in the border whereof are the ruins of Apbec to be seen, saith Brochard, and Ereidenbach. After these are the cities of Casaloth, of which, 1 Mac. 9. 2. Anem, or Hen-Gannim, of the Levites, and Secsim, or Shabatima, the West border of Issachar, of which Jos. 19. 22. From hence ranging the Sea coast, there is found the Castle of Pilgrims: a strong Castle, invironed with the Sea, sometime the storehouse and Magazine of the Christians, and built by the Earl of Saint Giles, or Tokuse.

From the Castle of Pilgrims, the Sea maketh a great Bay towards the North, and the farthermost farthermost thore beginneth Mount Carmel, not far from the River Chifon, where Elijah assembled all the Prophets and Priests of Baal, and prayed King Achab and the people assembled, to make trial whether the God of Israel, or the Idoll of Baal were to be worshipped, by laying a sacrifice without fire on the Altar: which done, the Priests of Baal prayed, and cut their own flesh after their manner, but the fire kindled not, while Elijah in derision told them that their God was either in pursuit of his enemies, not at leisure, or perchance asleep, &c. but at the prayer of Elijah the fire kindled, notwithstanding the people incensed, slew all those Idolaters on the banks of Chifon adjoining.

At the foot of this Mountain to the North, standeth Caiphas, built, as they say, by Caiphas the high Priest. It is also known by the name of Porcina, and Porphyria, sometime a Suffragane Bishops seat. Returning again from the Sea-coast towards Tiberias, by the banks of Chifon, there are found the city of Hapharaim, or Apraim, and the Castles of Mezra and Saba: of which Brochard and Ereidenbach: and then Naim on the River Chifon: a beautiful city while it stood, in the Gates, whereof Christ raised from death the widows onely son.

Then Seon or Shion, named Jos. 19. between the two Hills of Hermon, in Issachar: beyond it standeth Endor, famous by reason of the Inchantresse that undertook to raise up the body of Samuel at the instigation of Saul.

Beyond it stands Anabarath and Rabbith, named Jos. 19. v. 19, 20. Then Dabarath, as it is named, Jos. 21. 28. or Dobratha, as it is named, 1 Chron. 6. 71. This city (which stretcheth it self over Chifon) was a city of refuge belonging to the Levites.

Next to Dabarath is Arbela situate, neer the Caves of those two Theeves which so * Called Cann greatly molested Galilee in Herods time. It joyneth on one side to the Mountain of Issachar, or Hermon, and on the other to the Valley of Jezreel: which Valley continueth it self from Bethsan, or Scythopolis, the East border of Issachar, even to the Mediterran Sea: for Harabath. two parts whereof are inclosed by the Mountains of Gilboa on the South, and by Hermon and the River Chifon on the North. In these * Plains Gideon overthrew the Madianites, and herein, they think, Saul fought against the Philistims, Achab against the Syrians, and the Tartars against the Saracens.

§. VII.

THE HALF OF THE TRIBE OF MANASSE.

||. I.

Of the bounds of this half Tribe: and of Scythopolis, Salem, Thersa, and others.

The next Tribe which joyneth it self to Issachar towards the South, is the half of Manasse, on the West side of Jordan. Manasses was the first begotten of Joseph, the eleven son of Jacob. His mother was an Egyptian, the daughter of Pnithphar, Priest and Prince of Helipolis: which Manasser, with his brother Ephraim, the grand-children of Jacob, were by adoption numbred amongst the sons of Jacob, and made up the number of the twelve Patriarchs.

Of Manasse there were increased in Egypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 32200. able men: all which being consumed in the Desarts, there entered of their issues, 52700. bearing arms. The Territory which fell on this one half of Manasse, was bound- 50 ed by Jordan on the East, and Dora upon the Mediterran Sea on the West, Jezreel on the North, and Machmata is the South border.

The first and principal City which stood in this Territory was Bethsan, sometime Nysa, saith Pliny, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurse there buried, of the same name, which Solinus confirms. Afterward when the Syrians invaded Asa the lesse, and pierc'd into the South, to the uttermost of Calasyria, they built this City a-new, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the City of Scythians, given by the Greeks.

These barbarous Northren people constrained the Jews to fight against their own Nation

Nation and kindred, by whose hands when they had obtained victory, they themselves set on the Jews which served them; and slew them all. Stephanus makes it the utmost towards the South of Celestria: and Strabo joynes it to Galilee. It is seated between Jordan and the Hills of Gilboe, in aulone ad montes acrabatene, saith Zeigler. But I finde it in the East part of the Valley of Israell near Jordan: after that Jordan strengtheneth it self again into a River, leaving the Sea, or Lake Genezareth. Notwithstanding Montanus describes it far to the West, and towards the Mediterran Sea, near Endor, contrary to Stella, Laicstan, Adrichome, and all other the best Authors. This City was the greatest of all those of Decapolis: but the children of Manasse could not expell the Inhabitants thereof: and therefore called it Sane, an enemy, or Beth-san, the house of an enemy.

Jude. 1. fol. 17. de Bell. fact.

Over the walls of this Beth-san the Philistims hung the body of Saul, and his sons slain at Gilboe. It had, while the Christian religion flourished in those parts, an Archbishop, who had nine other Bishops of his Diocese, numbred by Tyrius, in his 14. Book and 12. Chapter: but the fame was afterward translated to Nazareth. The later travellers in those parts affirme, that there is daily taken out among the rubble and the ruines of that City, goodly pillars and other pieces of excellent Marble, which witness the stately buildings, and magnificence which it had in elder times, but it is now a poor and desolate Village.

Hierom. in Epist. ad Euzeg. c. 1. in Luc. Hebr.

From Beth-san keeping the way by Jordan, they finde an ancient City called Salem, which City the ancient Rabbines, saith Hierome, do not finde to be the same with Hierusalem: there being in the time of Hierome and since, a town of that name, near Scythopolis before remembred, which if the place of Scripture, Gen. 13. 18. doe not confirme, where the Vulgar readeth transivisti in Salem ubi erem Sichemorum (for which others read venit incolunt ad Civitatem Sechemum, making the word Shalem not to be a proper name, but an adjective) yet the place John. 3. 13. where it is said, that John was baptizing in Enon near Salem, may somewhat strengthen this opinion, and yet it is not unlikely that this Salem of which S. John speaketh, is but contracted of Shahalm, of which in the Tribe of Benjamin, 1 Sam. 9. 4. This word Junius maketh to be the plural of Shahal: of which we read, 1 Sam. 13. 17. for as for that which is added out of Canticus 6. 12. of Shulammitis, as if it had been as much as a Woman of this Salem near Enon, it is so hath no probability.

This City Bezech by the place Jud. 1. 3. seemeth to have been in Juda. Jos. ant. 6. c. 5. 1 Sam. c. 11.

Not far from thence where they place Salem, they finde Bezech the City of Adonibezec. Josephus calls it Bala: here it was that Saul assembled the strength of Israel and Juda, to the number of 330000. when he meant to relieve Jabesh Gilead, against Naab the Ammonite: who would give them no other conditions of peace, than to suffer their right eyes to be thrust out. Near Bezech is the City of Bethbera, or rather Beith-bara, of which Judg. 7. 24. in the story of Gideon: and then Ephra, or Hophra, wherein Gideon inhabited: in the border whereof stood an Altar consecrated to Baal, which he pulled down and defaced; and near it that stone, on which Abimelech the Bastard slew his 70. brothers; a Heathenish cruelty, practised by the Turk to this day: and not far hence, 40 between the Village of Asophon and Jordan, Ptolomus Lathurus overthrew Alexander King of the Jews, and slaughtered, as Josephus numbereth them, 3000. but according to Timagenes 50000. after which victory, as Ptolome pass by the Villages of the Jews, he slew all their women, and caused the young children to be sod in great Caldrons, that the rest of the Jews might thereby thinke that the Egyptians were grown to be meat-eaters and strike them with the greater terror.

* This Aner Junius upon 1 Chron. 6. 70. makes to be the same with Tahenac, of which Jos. 21. 25. Hierome names it from Aner the Confederate of Abraham. Gen. 14. 13. Josua 12. 17. 1 Kings 14.

Towards the West and on the border of Isachar, they place the Cities of * Aner of the Levites, and Abel-Mehola, which Junius, Judg. 7. 22. placeth in Ephraim: it was the habitation of Heli the Prophet, numbred among those places, 1 Reg. 4. 12. which were given in charge to Baana by Solomon, to whose charge also Tahenac belonged, as a place of great strength, which at the first resisted Josua, though their King was afterward hanged, and their City given to the Levites.

In the body of this Territory of Manasse, but somewhat neerer Jordan than to the Mediterran Sea, were three great Cities, to wit, Thersa, whose King was one of those that Josua slew: which the Kings of Israel used for their Regall seat, till such time as Samaria was built. From hence the wife of Jeroboam went to Achia to enquire of her sons health: who knowing her, though she were disguised, told her of her sons death.

The second was Thebes near Samaria, of which name there are both in Egypt, and Greece, Greece, of great fame in the assault of the Tower of this Town, whereinto the Citizens retired, the Bastard Abimelec was wounded by a weighty stone, thrown by a woman over the wall, who despairing of his recovery, commanded his Page to slay him outright, because it should not be said that he perished by the stroke of a woman. But O. Judg. 9. 3. 54. thers let this City in Ephraim near Sichem, or Neapolis.

The third is Acrabata, of which the Territory adjoining is called Acrobatena, (one of the ten Toparchies, or governments in Judea) for which Hierome, 1 Macc. 5. reads Arabathena: but in the Greek it is Acrobatine: Isidore calls it Agabat. This City had one of the largest Territories of all Palestine belonging to the Governour thereof. Josephus remembereth it often, as in his second book of the Jews wars, c. 11. 23. 28. and elsewhere.

Hier. Mac. 1. c. 5.

The difference between a Tetrarchy and a Toparchy, was, that the first was taken for a Province, and the other for a City with some lesser Territory adjoining; and a Tetrarch is the same with Præses in Latine, and President in English, being commonly the fourth part of a Kingdom: and thereof so called. Pliny nameth seventeen Tetrarchies in Syria: the Holy Land had four, and so hath the Kingdome of Ireland to this day, Lemster, Ulster, Connath, and Munster. Euseb. in Chro.

To the South-west of Acrabata they place the Cities of Balaam, or Bilham, and Gethremmon of the Levites: but Junius out of Jos. 21. 25. and 1 Chron. 6. 70. gathers that these two are but one; and that Jibleham, Jos. 16. 11. is another name of the same City.

Then is Jezebel a Regall City, set at the foot of the Mountains of Gilboe, towards the South-west: herein Jezebel, by a false accusation, caused Naboth to be stoned, to the end he might possesse his Vineyard adjoining to the City, which Naboth refused to sell, because it was his inheritance from his father.

Joram also was cast unburi'd into the same field: for which his mother Jezebel murdered Naboth. 2 Kings 2.

Toward the Sea from Jezebel is the City which they call Gaber: in whose ascent as Abesiar King of Juda fled from Jehu, when he had slain Joram, he was wounded with the shot of an arrow, of which wound he died at Mageddo adjoining. The Scripture calls this City of Gaber, Chr. 2 Kings 9. 27.

Then Adadremmon, near unto which the good King Josias was slain by Necho King of Egypt, in a war unadvisedly undertaken. For Necho marched towards Affyria against the King thereof, by the commandment of God; whom Josias thought to resist in his passage. It was afterward called Maximianopolis.

A neighbour City to Adadremmon was Mageddo, often remembred in the Scriptures; whose King was slain among the rest by Josua: yet they defended their City for a long time against Manasse. The River which passeth by the Town, may perhaps be the same which Ptolome calleth Chorseus: and not that of which we have spoken in Zabulon. For because this name is not found in the Scriptures, many of those that have described the Holy Land, delineate no such River. Moore onely sets it down in his Geography of the twelve Tribes: but the River which passeth by Mageddo, he understandeth to be but a branch, falling thereinto. Laicstan and Schrois make a great confluence of waters in this place, agreeable to this Scripture in the fifth of Judges: Then fought the Kings of Canaan in Tanac by the waters of Mageddo. But these Authors, and with them Stella, give it no other name than the Torrent so called.

Jude. 1. 5. fol. 12. 17.

But seeing that ancient Cosmographers stretch out the bounds of Phœnicia, even to Sebaste, or Samaria; and Strabo far beyond it on the Sea-coast: And Josephus calls Cæsaria Palestine, a City of Phœnicia: yea, Laurentius Corvinus extendeth Phœnicia as far as Geza: Joseph 1. 15. seeing also Ptolome sets down Chorseus for the partition of Phœnicia and Judea, this river running East and West parallel with Samaria: it is very probable that this Torrent called Mageddo, after the name of the City which it watereth, is the same which Ptolome in his fourth Table of Affia, calleth Chorseus. The later travellers of the Holy Land call Mageddo Subimbre at this day. Strab. 1. 6. c. 13. Nig.

II.

Of Cæsaria Palestine, and some other Towns.

From Mageddo toward the West, and neerer the Mediterran Sea, was that glorious City of Cæsaria Palestine: first, the Tower of Straton: the same which Pliny calls G g Apollonia:

Apollonia : though Ptolomy sets Apollonia elsewhere, and toward Egypt, between this City and Joppe, to which Vespasian gave the name of Flavia Colonia. It was by Herod re-built, who therein laboured to exceed all the works in that part of the world. For besides the edifices, which he reared within the Walls, of cut and polish'd marbles, the Theater and Amphitheater, from whence he might look over the Seas far away, with the high and stately Towers and Gates : he forced a Harborow of great capacity, being in former times but an open Bay : and the winde blowing from the Sea, the Merchants haunting that Port, had no other hope, but in the strength of their Cables and Anchors. This work he performed with such charge and labour, as the like of that hath not been found in any Kingdom, nor in any age : which, because the Materials were fetcht from 10 far, and the weight of the stones was such, as it exceedeth belief, I have added Josephus own words of this work, which are these : Hanc locorum in commoditatem correcturus, circum portus circumduxit, quantum putaret magna classi recipiendæ sufficere : & in viginti ulnarum profundum, prægrandia saxa demisit : quorum pleraque pedum quinquaginta longitudinis, latitudinis vero octodecim, altitudine novem-pedali : fuerunt quedam etiam majora, minora alia : To mend this inconvenience of place (saith Josephus) he compass't in a Bay where, in a great Fleet might well ride : and let down great stones twenty fadome deep : whereof some were fifty foot long, eighteen foot broad, and nine foot thick : and some bigger, some lesser. To this he added an arm or caswie of two hundred foot long, to break the waves : theret he strengthened with a stone wall, with divers stately Towers thereon builded : of which the most magnificent he called Drusus, after the name of Drusus the son-in-law of Cæsar : in whose honour he intituled the City it self, Cæsaria of Palestine : all which he performed in twelve years time. It was the first of the Eastern Cities that received a Bishop : afterward erected into an Archbishoprick, commanding twenty others under it, saith Tyrinus.

Joseph. l. 15. c. 13.

Lib. 4. c. 12. 361. fact.

S. Hierome nameth Theophilus, Ensebius, Acacius, Euzorius, and Calasius to have been Bishops thereof. In this City was Cornelius the Centurion baptised by Saint Peter : and herein dwelt Philip the Apostle. S. Paul was herein two years prisoner, under the President Felix, unto the time and government of Porcius Festus : by whom making his appeal, he was sent to Cæsar. Here, when Herod Agrippa was passing on to celebrate the 30 Quinquennalia, taking delight to be called a god by his flatterers, he was stricken with an Angel unto death, saith Josephus.

To the North of Cæsaria standeth Dora, or Naphoth Dor, as some reade, Jos. 1. 2. so called (saith Adrichomius) because it joyneth to the Sea, whose King was slain by Josua. But Junius, for in Naphoth Dor, reades in traditibus Dor : and so the Vulgar, in regionibus Dor, although 1 Reg. 4. 11. for the like speech in the Hebrew it readeth omnis Nephth Dor : The Septuagint in the place of Josua call it Nephth-Dor, and in the other of the Kings, Nepht-Dor : but the true name by other places (as Jos. 12. 23. Judg. 1. 27.) may seem to be Dor. It was a strong and powerful City, and the fourth in account of those twelve Principalities, or Sitarchies, which Solomon erected. Junius upon Macchab. 15. 11. placeth this between the Hill Carmel, and the mouth of the river Chersens : for so some name the river Chersens, of which we have spoken already.

Mac. 1. 13. 15.

Into this City, for the strength thereof, Tryphon fled from Antiochus the son of Demetrius, where he was by the same Antiochus besieged with 12000. foot-men, and 8000. horse : the same perfidious villain that received 200. talents for the ransom of Jonathan Macchabæus (whom he had taken by treachery) and then slew him : and after him slew his own Master, usurping for a while the Kingdom of Syria. It had also a Bishops seat of the Diocese of Cæsaria.

Gul. Tyr. de bell. fact. l. 10. c. 6.

From Cæsaria towards the South, they place the Cities of Capharnam, Gabe, and Galgil : for besides that Capharnam famous in the Evangelists, they finde in these parts neer the West Sea, another of the same name. Of Gabe, Hierome in locis Hebraicis. The famous Galgil, or Gilgal, was in Benjamin : but this Gilgal, they say, it was whose King was slain by Josua.

Mac. 17. 31.

Then Antipatris, so called of Herod, in honour of his Father : but in the time of the Macchabæes, it was called Capharjalana : in the fields whereof Judas Macchabæus overthrew a part of the Army of Nicanor, Lieutenant to Demetrius : an Army drawn into Judea by a traiterous Jew, called Aleimus : who contended for the Priest-hood, first under Bacchides, and then under Nicanor. To this was Saint Paul carried prisoner from Hierusalem, Hierusalem, conducted by 470. souldiers, to defend him from the fury of the Jews. In after-times the Army of Godfrey of Bulion attempted it in vain : yet was it taken by Baldwine. It was honoured in those dayes with a Bishops seat, but it is now a poor Village, called Asur, saith Brochard. Neer unto this City the Prophet Jonas was three dayes preserved in the body of a Whale.

Into the Land, from Antipatris and Cæsaria, standeth Narbata, whereof the Territorie taketh name : which Cestius the Romane waisted with fire and sword, because the Jews which dwelt at Cæsaria fled thence, and carried with them the Books of Moses. Neer unto it is the Mountain of Abdias, the Steward of King Achab : wherein he hid an hundred Prophets, and fed them ; after which he himself is said to have obtained from God the Spirit of Prophecie also.

CHAP. VIII.

of the Kingdoms of Phœnicia.

§. I.

The bounds and chief Cities, and Founders, and Name of this Kingdom : and of the invention of Letters ascribed to them.

Because these five Tribes, of Asser, Nephthalim, Zabulon, Issachar, and the half of Manasse, posselt the better part of that ancient Kingdom of Phœnicia, to wit, of so much as lay to the South part of Anti-libanus ; I have therefore gathered a brief of those Kings which have governed therein : at least for many of them as time (which devoureth all things) hath left to posterity : and that the rest have perished, it is not strange ; seeing for many Volumes of excellent learning in so long a race and revolution, and in so many changes of Estates and Conquest of 30 Heathen Princes have been torn, cast away, or otherwise consumed.

The limits of this Kingdom, as touching the South parts, are very uncertain : but all Cosmographers do in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the North, where that part of Syria, which is called Casotis, ends : most of them bounding it by Orthosia, to the North of Tripolis. Ptolomy makes it a little larger, as reaching from the River Eleutherus, that falls into the Sea at the Island of Aradus, somewhat to the North of Orthosia, and stretching from thence alongst the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, as far as the River of Chorlus ; which seems to be that which the Jews call the Torrent, or River of Maggedo. Pliny extends it farther, and comprehends Joppe within it : Corvinus and Budeus, Plin. l. 5. c. 19. Joppe and Gaza. Phœnicia apud prisicos appellata (saith Budeus) que nunc Palestina Syrie dicitur : It was called Phœnicia of old (saith he) which now is called Palestina of Syria.

Strabo comprehends in this Countrie of Phœnicia all the Sea-side of Judea, and Palestina, even unto Pelusium, the first Port of Egypt. On the contrary, Diodorus Siculus foldeth it up in Cælosyria, which he boundeth not. But for my self, I take a middle course, and like best of Ptolomies description, who was seldom deceived in his own art. It had in it these famous Maritimate Cities (besides all those of the Islands) to wit, Aradus, Orthosia, Tripolis, Botrys, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolomæis (or Acon) Dora, and Cæsaria Palestine : and by reason of the many Ports and goodly Sea-rowns, it anciently commanded the Trades of the Eastern world : and they were absolute Kings of the Mediterranean Sea.

The ancient Regall Seat of those Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first son of Canaan : and the people then subject to that people were called Zidonians ; the same state continuing even unto Josua's time. For till then, it is probable that there was but one King of all that Region ; afterward called Phœnicia : which Procopius also confirmeth in his second Book of Vandall wars. But in proceesse of time the City of Tyre adjoining, became the more magnificent : yet, according to the Prophet, it was but a daughter of Zidon, and by them first built, and peopled.

But after the death of Moses, and while Josua yet governed Israel, Agenor an Egyptian of Thebes, or a Phœnician bred in Egypt, came thence with his sons Cadmus, Phœnix, Gg 2 Cyrus,

F. 17.

Cyrus, and Cilix, (say Cedrenus and Curtius) and built and possess the Cities of Tyre and Zidon : to wit, the new Tyrus, and brought into Phenicia (so called after the name of his second son) the use of Letters : which also Cadmus in his pursuit after his sister Europa, taught the Grecians. For Taurus King of Crete, when he surpris'd Tyre, had stolen her thence : of which the Poets devised the fable of Jupiter's transformation into a Bull, by whom that stealth was also suppos'd to be made. Pomponius Sabinius makes Belus the first King of Phenicia ; and findes Cadmus his successour, whom he calleth his grand-child : and it seemeth that Belus was the father of Agenor, and not Neptune : because the successours of Dido held that name always in reverence, making it a part of their own, as Asdrubal, Hannibal : whose memory Virgil also toucheth in these Verses.

*Hic Regina gravem gemmis auroque poposcit, Implevitque mero pateram : quam Belus & omnes
A Belo soliti.*

The Queen anon commands the weighty bowl
(Weighty with precious stones and massie gold)
To flow with wine. This Belus us'd of old,
And all of Belo Line.

Whether this Belus were father or grand-father to Agenor, the matter is not clear. But it seems to me by comparing of times, that Belus was Ancestor to these Phenicians, and preceded Agenor. For were Belus, or Jupiter Belus, the son of Neptune by Lybia the daughter of Epaphus, or were he the son of Thelegonus, according to Eusebius ; yet it is agreed that Cecrops then ruled in Attica : and in the end of Cecrops time, saith Saint Augustine, Moses left Egypt : Agenors successour living at once with Josua. Now that Agenor returned about the same time into the Territory of Zidon, I cannot doubt : neither do I deny, but that he gave that Region the name of Phenicia, in honour of his son. But in stead of the building of Tyre and Zidon, it is probable that he repaired and fortified both : and therefore was called a Founder, as Semiramis and Nabuchodonosor were of Babylon.

For be it true, that Agenor was of the same Nation, and brought up in Egypt : where he learnt the use of Letters (Egypt flourishing in all kinde of learning in Moses time) or were he by Nation an Egyptian, yet it is very likely that either he came to save his own Territory ; or otherwise to defend the coast of Canaan from the Israelites : who were by Moses led out of Egypt, to the great losse and dishonour of that Nation : and by Josua conducted over Jordan, to conquer and possess the Canaanites Land. For though the Egyptians, by reason of the losse which they received by the hand of God in the Red Sea, and by the ten plagues cast on them before that, and by the slaughter of so many of the male children at the same time, could not hinder the Hebrews from invading Canaan by land : which also they knew had so many powerfull Nations to defend it : the Desert inter-jacent, and the strong Edomites, Moabites, Amorites, and Ammonites their borderers : yet Egypt having such Vessels, or Ships, or Gallies, as were then in use, did not in all probability neglect to garrison the Sea-coast, or assist Agenor with such forces as they had to spare ; and which they might perform with the greater facility, in that the Philistines, which held the shores of Canaan next adjoining unto them, were their Friends and Confederates.

Eliop. 19. 29.

Now, as it appeareth by the course of the Story, those Cities of Phenicia, which Agenor was said to have built (that is, to have fortified and defended against Josua, and against the Tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Josua called the strong Citie Accob, so afterward Ptolemais, Achzib, and Dor) were all that Phenicia had in those days.

That the Kings of Phenicia were mighty, especially by Sea, it appears, first by their defence against Israel : secondly, by this, that David and Solomon could not master them, but were glad of their alliance : thirdly, that one of their Cities, though they were then but Reguli, defended it self 13. years against a King of Kings, Nabuchodonosor : and that Alexander the Great (who being made victorious by the providence of God, seemed irresistible) spent more time in the recovery of Tyre, than in the conquest of all the Cities in Asia.

Other

Other opinions there are, as that of Berosus out of Josephus, who conceives that Tyre was founded by Tyrus the son of Japhet. And for the Region it self, though Calisthenes derive it, ab arvore dactylorum ; and the Greeks from the word Phenos, of slaughter, because the Phenicians slew all that came on their coasts ; yet for my self, I take it that Phenix the son of Agenor gave it that name. But that either Agenor in Phenicia or Cadmus his son in Greece, were the Inventors of Letters, it is ridiculous : and therefore the dispute unnecessary.

The Ethiopians affirm, that Atlas, Orion, Orpheus, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the first light of all those Arts, Sciences, and civill Policies, which they afterward profest, and taught others : and that Pythagoras himself was instructed by the Lybians : to wit, from the South and superiour Egyptians : from whom those which inhabited neerer the out-let of Nilus, as they say, borrowed their Divinitie and Philosophy : and from them the Greeks, then barbarous, received Civillitie. Again, the Phenicians challenge this invention of Letters and of Learning : acknowledging nothing from the Egyptians at all ; neither do they allow that Agenor and his sons were Africans ; whence Lucan,

*Phoenices primi (sane si creditur) ausi
Mansuram rudibus vocem signare figuris.*

Lucan. l. 5. 3.

Phenicians first (if fame may credit have)
In rude Characters dar'd our words to grave.

And that Cadmus was the son of Agenor, and was a Phenician, and not an Egyptian, it appeareth by that answer made by Zeno ; when he in a kinde of reproach was called a Stranger, and not a Phenician :

Si patria est Phoenix, quid tum ? nam Cadmus & ipse Phoenix ; cui debet Græcia docta libros.

Athen. 1. Diogenes.

If a Phenician born I am, what then ?
Cadmus was so : to whom Greece owes
The Books of learned men.

Out of doubt the Phenicians were very ancient : and from the Records and Chronicles of Tyre, Josephus the Historian confirms a great part of his Antiquities. The Thracians again subscribe to none of these reports : but affirm constantly, that the great Zalmoxis flourished among them : when Atlas lived in Mauritania : Nilus and Vulcan in Egypt : and Ochnus in Phenicia. Yea, some of the French do not blush to maintain, that the ancient Gauls taught the Greeks the use of Letters, and other Sciences. And do not we know that our Bardes and Ervudes are as ancient as those Gauls, and that they sent their sons hither to be by them instructed in all kinde of learning ?

Lastly, whereas others bestow this invention on Moses, the same hath no probability at all ; for he lived at such time as Learning and Arts flourished most, both in Egypt and Assyria, and he himself was brought up in all the learning of the Egyptians, from his infancy.

But true it is, that Letters were invented by those excellent Spirits of the first age, and before the general Flood : either by Seth or Enos, or by whom else God knows ; from whom all wisdom and understanding hath proceeded. And as the same infinite God is present with all his Creatures, so hath he given the same invention to divers Nations : whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other ; as well in this as in many other knowledges : for even in Mexico, when it was first discovered, there was found written Books after the manner of those Hieroglyphicks, anciently used by the Egyptians, and other Nations : and so had those Americans a kinde of Heraldries ; and their Princes differing in Arms and Scutchions, like unto those used by the Kings and Nobility of other Nations, jura naturalia communia, &c. generalia, &c. Natural laws are common, and Juris general.

§. II.

of the Kings of Tyre.

BUt whatsoever remaineth of the Story and Kings of Phœnicia (the books of Zeno, Sachoniatho, Antaeas, and others of that Nation, being no where found) the same is to be gathered out of the Scriptures, Josephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus.

Agenor lived at once with Joſua, to whom ſucceeded Phœnix, of whom that part of Canaan, and ſo far towards the North as Aradus, took the name of Phœnicia: what King ſucceeded Phœnix it doth not appear; but at ſuch time as the Grecians beſieged Troy, 10 Phœnix governed Phœnicia.

In Hieremie time, and while Jehojakim ruled in Juda, the Tyrians had a King apart: for Hieremie ſpeaketh of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of ſeverall Kings.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Army wherewith he invaded Greece, Tetramneſtus ruled that part of Phœnicia about Tyre and Zidon: who commanded, as ſome Writers affirm, Xerxes Fleet, or rather, as I ſuppoſe, thoſe 300. Gallies, which himſelf brought to his aid: for at this time it ſeemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Persian: for being broken into Reguli, and petty Kings in Hieremies time, they were ſubjected by Nabuchodonosor; of whoſe conqueſts in the Chapter before remembred, Hieremie prophesied.

Tennes, though not immediately, ſucceeded Tetramneſtus, remembred by D. Siculus in his 14. Book.

Strato, his ſucceſſor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, becauſe of his dependancy upon Darius, and that his Predeceſſors had ſerved the Eaſt Empire againſt the Grecians. But divers Kings, of whom there is no memory, came between Tennes and Strato. For there were conſumed 130. years and ſomewhat more, between Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander eſteemed the more unworthy of reſtitution, becauſe (ſaith Curtius) he rather ſubmitted himſelf by the inſtigations of his ſubjects (who foreſaw their utter ruine by reſiſtance) than that he had any diſpoſition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians.

Of this Strato, Athenæus out of Theopompus reporteth, that he was a man of ill living, and moſt voluptuous; alſo that he appointed certain games and prizes for women-dancers, and ſingers, whom he to this end chiefly invited, and aſſembled: that having beheld the moſt beautifull and lively among them, he might recover them for his own uſe and delights. Of the ſtrange accident about the death of one Strato King of theſe coaſts, S. Hierome and others make mention: who having heard that the Persians were near him with an Army too weighty for his ſtrength, and finding that he was to hope for little grace, becauſe of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians; he determining to kill himſelf, but fainting in the execution, his wife being preſent, wreſted the ſword out of his hand, and ſlew him: which done, the alfo thereupon pierced her own body, and died.

After Alexander was poſſeſſor of Zidon, and the other Strato driven thence, he gave the Kingdom to Hephæſtion to diſpoſe of: who having received great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whoſe houſe he lodged, offered to recompence him therewith; and willingly offered to eſtabliſh him therein: but this Citizen, no leſſe vertuous than rich, deſired Hephæſtion that this honour might be conferred on ſome one of the blood and reſt of their ancient Kings: and preſented unto him Balonimus, whom Curtius calls Abdolominus, Juſtine, Abdolominus, and Plutarch, Alynomus: who at the very hour that he was called to this regal Eſtate, was with his own hands working in his garden, ſetting herbs and roots, for his relief and ſuſtenance: though otherwiſe a wife man, and exceeding juſt.

Theſe were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whoſe eſtate being afterward changed into Popular or Ariſtocratical: and by times and turnes ſubjected to the Emperours of the Eaſt, there remaineth no farther memory of them, than that which is formerly delivered in the Tribe of Aſſur.

The Kings of Tyre, who they were before Sammels time, it doth not appear: Josephus the Hiſtorian, as is ſaid, had many things wherewith he garniſhed his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Josephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be be gathered a deſcent of ſome twenty Kings of the Tyrians; but theſe Authors, though they both pretend to write out of Menander Epheſius, do in no fort agree in the times of their reigns, nor in other particulars.

Abibals is the firſt King of the Tyrians, that Josephus and Theophilus remember, whom Theophilus calls Abemalus: the ſame perchaunce that the ſon of Sirach mentioneth in his 46. fourtie and ſixth Chapter, ſpeaking of the Princes of the Tyrians.

To this Abibals, Swron ſucceeded, if he be not one and the ſame with Abibals. David (ſaith Eusebius out of Eusepius) conſtrained this Swron to pay him Tribute, of whom alſo David complaineth, Pſal. 83.

Hiram ſucceeded Swron, whom Josephus calls Irom, and Theophilus ſometime Hieronymus, ſometimes Hieromus, but Tatian and Zonaras, Chiram. He entred into a league with David, and ſent him Cedars, with Maſons and Carpenters, to performe his buildings in Hieruſalem, after he had beaten thence the Jebuſites. The ſame was he that ſo greatly aſſiſted Solomon: whom he not onely furniſhed with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raiſing of the Temple, and with great ſums of money, but alſo he joyned with him in his enterprize of the Eaſt India, and of Ophir: and furniſhed Solomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the moſt excellent Navigators: and lent him 120. talents of gold. Of this Hiram, there is not onely mention in divers places of Scripture, but in Josephus in his Antiquities the 7. and 8. chap. 2. and 3. in Theophilus his 2. third book, in Tatianus his Oration againſt the Greeks: and in Zonaras, Tome the firſt. This Prince ſeemed to be very mighty and magnificent, he deſpised the 20. Towns which Solomon offered him: he defended himſelf againſt that victorious King David: and gave his daughter in marriage to Solomon, called the Lidonian: for whole ſake he was contented to worſhip Aſtaroth, the Idoll of the Phœnicians. Hiram lived 53. years.

Baleſtarius, whom Theophilus calleth Bazorus, ſucceeded Hiram King of Tyre and Zidon, and reigned 7. years, according to Josephus.

Abdaſtarius the eldeſt ſon of Baleſtarius, governed 9. years, and lived but 20. years, according to Josephus: but after Theophilus he reigned 12. years, and lived 54. years being ſlain by the four ſons of his own Nurſe, the eldeſt of them held the Kingdom 30 12. years.

Aſtarius brother to Abdaſtarius, recovered the Kingdom from this Uſurper, and reigned 12. years.

Aſarimus, or Atharimus, after Theophilus, a third brother, followed Aſtarius, and ruled 9. years, and lived in all 54.

Phelles the fourth ſon of Baleſtarius, and brother to the three former Kings, ſlew Aſarimus, and reigned 8. moneths, and lived 50. years.

Ithobalus (or Iuthobalus, in Theophilus) ſon to the third brother Aſarimus, who was the chief Prielt of the Goddeſſe Aſarta, which was a dignity next unto the King, revenged the death of his father, and ſlaughtered his Uncle Phelles: and reigned 32. years; the ſame which in the firſt of Kings, chap. 16. is called Eihbaal, whole daughter Jezebel, Achab married.

Badezor, or Bazor, the ſon of Ithobalus, or Eihbaal, brother to Jezebel, ſucceeded his Father, and reigned 6. years, and lived in all 45.

Metimus ſucceeded Badezor, and reigned but 9. years (ſaith Josephus) he had two ſons, Pygmalion and Barca, and two daughters, Eliſa and Anna.

Pygmalion reigned after Metimus his Father 40. years, and lived 56. In the ſeventh year of whoſe reign, Eliſa failed into Africa, and built Carthage, 143. years and 8. moneths after the Temple of Solomon: which by our account was 289. years after Troy was taken, and 143. before Rome: and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Æneas and Dido muſt be far out of ſquare. For Pygmalion, covetous of Sichens riches, who had married his ſiſter Eliſa, ſlew him traiterouſly as he accompanied him in hunting: or if we beleve Juſtine and Virgil, at the Altar: whereupon Eliſa fearing to be diſpoſed of her huſbands treaſure, fled by Sea into Africa, as aforeſaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to purſue, he was by his mothers tears, and by threats from the Oracle arreſted. Barca accompanied his ſiſter, and aſſiſted her, in the erection of Carthage: and from him ſprang that noble Family of the Barce in Africa, of which race deſcended many famous Captains, and the great Hannibal. Servius interprets this name of Dido by Virago, becauſe of her man-like acts: others from Jedidia, a ſurname of Solomon.

Ehileus succeeded Pygmalion, and reigned 36. years: the same that overthrew the fleet of Salmathasar, in the Port of Tyre: notwithstanding which he continued his siege before it on the Land side five years, but in vain.

After Ehileus, Eihobales governed the Tyrians, who vaunted himself to be as wise as Daniel: and that he knew all secrets (saith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writeth at large in his 28. Chapter: out of whom it was gathered, that this Prince died, or was slain in that long siege of Nabuchodonosor: who furrounded and attempted Tyre 13. years together, ere he prevailed.

Baal followed Eihobales, and reigned 10. years a tributary, perchance, to Nabuchodonosor: for after his death, it was governed by divers Judges, succeeding each other: First, 10 by Escibalus, then by Chebis, Abarus the Priest, Mitonus, and Gerasus, who held it among them some 7. years, and odd moneths: after whom Balatorus commanded therein as a King for one year: after him Aterbals sent from Babylon, 4. years: after him Irom sent thence also, 20. years. In the 17. of whose reign Cyrus began to govern Persia.

§. III.

of Bozins his conceit, that the Edumæans inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them received and brought into Phœnicia the knowledge of the true God.

OF the great mutations of this Kingdom and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a discourse of divers other Nations, there is one Bozins that hath written a Treatise at large, intituled, De ruinis Gentium. And although the great and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea, in all things under heaven, have proceeded from his ordinance, who only is unchangeable, and the same for ever; yet whereas the said Bozins, inforcing here-hence, that the prosperity and ruine of the Tyrians were fruits of their embracing or forsaking the true Religion; to prove this his assertion, supposeth the Tyrians to have been Edumæans, descended from Eſau, Jacobs brother: first, it can hardly be believed, that Tyre, when it flourished most in her ancient glory, was in any sort truly devout and religious. But to this end (besides the proof which the Scriptures give of Hiram's good affection when Solomon built the Temple) he brings many conjecturall arguments; whereof the strongest is their pedigree and descent: it being likely in his opinion, that the posterity of Eſau received from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Iſaac. That the Tyrians were Edumæans, he endeavours to shew, partly by weak reasons, painfully strained from some affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than weight: partly by authority. For Strabo, Herodotus, Plinius, and others, witness, that the Tyrians came from the Red Sea, in which there were three Islands, called Tyros, Aradus, and Sidon: which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards given to the Cities of Phœnicia. Considering therefore that all the coast of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) under the Edumæans: as Elab and Eſiongabur; or under the Amalekites, who descended of Amalec the Nephew of Eſau, whose chief City was Madian, so called of Maſian the son of Abraham by Cethura, whose posterity did people it: the consequence appears good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edumites: differing little or nothing in Religion from the children of Iſrael. Hereunto he adds, that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the worship of Aſtaris, the Idol of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Pherecydes being Phœnicians, themselves differed much in their Philosophy from the Idolatrous customs of the Greeks. That in Teman, a Town of the Edumæans, was an University, wherein, as may appear by Eliphaz the Temamitic, who disported with Job, Religion was sincerely taught.

Such is the discourse of Bozins, who labouring to prove one Paradox by another, deserves in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumæans, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his people: neither is it true that they were Edumæans at all. In what Religion Eſau brought up his children, it is no where found written; but that himself was a profane man, and disapproved by God, the Scriptures in plain terms expresse. That his posterity were Idolaters, is directly proved in the 25. Chapter of the second Book of Chronicles. That the Edumites were perpetuall enemies to the house of Iſrael, save onely when David & some of his race, Kings of Juda, held them in subjection, who knows not? or who is ignorant rant of David's unfriendly behaviour amongst them, when first they were subdued? surely, it was not any argument of Kinred or Alliance between Tyros and Mount Seir, that Hiram held such good correspondence with David; even then when Joab slew all the males of Edom: neither was it for their devotion to God, and good affection to Iſrael, that the Edumites were so ill intricated. It seemeth that the piety and ancient wisdom of Eliphaz the Themamite was then forgotten, and the Edumæans punished, for being such as David in his own dayes found them. Although indeed the city of Teman whence Eliphaz came to reason with Job, is not that in Edumæa, but another of the same name, lying East from the Sea of Galilee, and adjoining to Hus, the country of Job: and to such the City of Bildad the Subite; as both such Chorographers who best knew those parts, do plainly shew, and the holy Text maketh manifest. For Job is said to have exceeded in riches, and Solomon in wisdom, all the people of the East; not the inhabitants of Mount Seir, which lay due South from Palestina. True it is, that Eliphaz the son of Eſau had a son called Teman: but that fathers were wont in those dayes to take name of their sons, I no where finde. And Iſmael also had a son called Thema: of whom it is not unlike, that Thema in the East had the name: for as much as in the 7. Chap. of the book of Judges, the Midianites, Amalekites, and all they of the East are called Iſmaelites. And hethat well considers how great and strong a Nation Amalec was, which durst give battell to the Host of Iſrael, wherein were 600000. able men, will hardly believe that such a people were descended from one of Eſau's grand-children. For how powerfull and numberlesse must the forces of all Edom have been: if one Tribe of them, yea, one Family of a Tribe had been so great? surely Mount Seir and all the Regions adjoining could not have held them. But we no where finde that Edom had to do with Amalec, or assisted the Amalekites, when Saul went to root them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom: but a Nation of it self, if distinct from the Iſmaelites. The like may be said of Midian, that the Founder thereof being son to Abraham by Cethura, doubtlesse was no Edomite. And thus much in generall for all the Seignory of the Red Sea coast, which Bozins imagines the Edumæans to have held: if the Edomites in after-times held some places, as Elan and Eſiongabur on the Red Sea shore, yet in Mosese's time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them nor. For Moses himself saith, that Iſrael did compass all the borders of Edom: within which limits had Midian stood, Moses must needs have known it: because he had journeyed long in that Country: and there had left his wife and children, when he went into Egypt.

But conjecturall Arguments, how probable soever, are needlesse in so manifest a case. For in the 83. Psalm, Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as distinct Nations: yea the Tyrians and Sydonians being one people, as all good Authours shew, and Bozins himself confesseth, were Canaanites, as appears, Gen. 10. 15. & 19. appointed by God to have been destroyed, and their Lands given to the children of Iſrael, Jos. 20. because they were Idolaters, and of the cursed seed of Canaan, nor Cousins to Iſrael, nor professors of the same Religion. For though Hiram said, Blessed be God that hath sent King David a wise son: we cannot infer that he was of David's Religion. The Turk hath said as much of Christian Princes, his confederates. Certain it is, that the Sydonians then worshipped Aſtaroth, and drew Solomon also to the same Idolatry.

Whereas Hiram aided Solomon in building the Temple, he did it for his own ends, receiving therefore of Solomon great provision of Corn and Oyle, and the offer of twenty Towns and Villages in Galilee. And if we rightly consider things, it will appear that Hiram in all points, dealt Merchant-like with Solomon. He allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is over-pestered, being otherwise apt to yeeld silks: as the Andarine silks which come from thence, and other good commodities. For Corn and Oyle, which he wanted, he gave that which he could well spare to Solomon. Also Gold for Land: wherein Solomon was the wiser; who having got the Gold first, gave to Hiram the worst Villages that he had: with which the Tyrian was ill pleased. But it was a necessary policy which inforced Tyros to hold league with Iſrael. For David had subdued Moab, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, even to Euphrates: thorow which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carry and re-carry their Wares on Camels, to their fleets on the Red Sea, and back again to Tyros: so that Solomon being Lord of all the Countries through which they were to passe, could have cut off their Trade.

But the Israelites were no Sea-men, and therefore glad to share with the Tyrians in their adventures. Yet Solomon, as Lord of the Sea-towns which his Father had taken from the Philistines, might have greatly distressed the Tyrians, and perhaps have brought them even into subjection. Which Hiram knowing, was glad (and no marvel) that Solomon rather meant, as a man of peace, to imploy his Fathers Treasure in magnificent Works, than in pursuing the conquest of all Syria. Therefore he willingly aided him, and sent him cunning workmen, to increase his delight in goodly Buildings, Images, and instruments of pleasure.

As these passages between Solomon and Hiram, are no strong arguments of piety in the Tyrians: so those other proofs which Bozins frames negatively upon particular examples, are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I think, no man knows. It seems to me, that having more cunning than the Greeks, and being very ambitious, he would fain have purchased divine honours; which his Daughters, Nephews, and others of his house obtained; but his own many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pherecydes are but single examples: Every salvage Nation hath some wisdom excelleth the Vulgar, even of civill people. Neither did the morall wisdom of these men expresse any true knowledge of the true God. Only they made no good mention of the Gods of Greece: whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to say, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not known to have taught Idolatry, therefore the Tyrians were not Idolaters. But this is offorce, That Carthage, Utica, Lepis, Cadiz, and all Colonies of the Tyrians (of which I think, the Islands before mentioned in the Red Sea to have been, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, even from their first beginnings: therefore the Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so likewise.

This their Idolatry from Solomons time on-wards is acknowledged by Bozins, who would have us think them to have been formerly a strange kinde of devout Edomites. In which fancie he is so peremptory, that he styleth men of contrary opinion, Impios politicos, as if it were impiet. To think, that God (who even among the Heathen, which have not known his Name, doth favour Vertue and hate Vice) hath often rewarded morall honesty, with temporall happinesse. Doubtlesse, this doctrine of Bozins would be better have agreed with Julian the Apostata, than with Cyril. For if the Assyrians, Greeks, Romans, and all those Nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most, when they drew neerest unto the true Religion: what may be said of the foule Idolatry which grew in Rome as fast as Rome it self grew: and was enlarged with some new superstition, almost upon every new victory? How few great battells did the Romans win, in which they vowed not either a Temple to some new god, or some new honour to one of their old gods? yea, what one Nation, save only that of the Jews, was subdued by them, whose gods they did not afterward entertain in their City? Only the true God, which was the God of the Jews, they rejected, upbraiding the Jews with him, as if he were unworthy of the Roman Majesty: shall we hereupon enforce the lewd and foolish conclusion which Heathen Writers used against the Christians in the Primitive Church: That such Idolatry had caused the City of Rome to flourish, and that the decay of those abominations did also bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought so, if prosperity were a signe or effect of true Religion. Such is the blinde zeal of Bozins, who writing against those whom he fallly terms impious, gives strength to such as are impious indeed. But such indiscretion is usually found among men of his humour; who having once either foolishly embraced the dreams of others, or vainly fashioned in their own brains any strange Chimera's of Divinity, condemne all such in the pride of their zeal, as Atheists and Infidels, that are not transported with the like intemperate ignorance. Great pitié it is, that such mad dogs are oftentimes encouraged by those, who having the command of many tongues, when they themselves cannot touch a man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious vertue of an Hypercrit.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Tribe of Ephraim, and of the Kings of the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim.

§. I.

Of the memorable places in the Tribe of Ephraim.

HAVING now past over Phœnicia, we come to the next Territory adjoining, which is that of Ephraim: sometimes taken per excellentiam, for the whole Kingdom of the ten Tribes. Ephraim was the second son of Joseph, whose issues when they left Egypt were in number 45000. all which dying in the Desarts, (Joshua excepted) there entered the Holy Land of their children grown to be able men, 32500. who fate down on the West side of Jordan, between Manasse and Benjamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Jordan, 10 and the Mediterran Sea, did by the East and West.

The first and chief City which Ephraim had, was Samaria, the Metropolis of the Kingdom of Israel, built by Anri or Honri King thereof, and seated on the top of the Mountain Somron, which overlooketh all the bottome, and as far as the Sea-coast. It was afterward called Sebaste, or Augusta, in honour of August. Cesar. This City is often remembered in the Scriptures: and magnificent it was in the first buildings; for as Brochard observeth, the ruines which yet remain, and which Brochard found greater than those of Hiersusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood upright: for to this day there are found great store of goodly Marble pillars, with other hewen and carved stone in great abundance, among the rubble.

It was beaten to the ground by the sons of Hierannus the high Priest: restored and built by the first Herod the son of Antipater: who to flatter Cesar called it Sebaste. Herein were the prophets Heliseus and Abdias buried: and so was John Baptist. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Grecian Monks.

Neer Samaria towards the South, is the hill of Bethel, and a town of that name: on the top of which mountain, Jeroboam erected one of his golden calves, to be worshipped: with which he seduced the Israelites.

In sight of this Mountain of Bethel, was that ancient City of Sichem; after the restitution called Neapolis, now Pelusa, and Napolasa: It was destroyed by Simcon and Levi, in revenge of the ravishment of their sister Dina: and after that by Abimelech evened with the soyl. Jeroboam raised it up again: and the Damascens a third time cast it down.

Under Sichem toward the Sea standeth Pharathon or Pirbathor, on the Mountain Amalec, the City of Abdon Judge of Israel. And under it Beberon of the Levites, built as it is said by Sara, the daughter of Ephraim. Neer to this City Julias Macchabeus overthrew Seron and Lyfias, Lieutenants to Antiochus. This City had Solomon formerly repaired and fortified.

Between Ethoron and the Sea, standeth Samir, of which Jos. 10. and Saron, whose King was slain by Joshua: it is also mentioned Abd. 9. 35. and of this Saron the Valley taketh name, which beginning at Cesarea Palestine, extendeth it self alongst the coast as far as Joppe, saith Adrichome: though indeed the name Saron is not particularly given to this Valley, but to every fruitfull plain Region; for not only this Valley is so called, to wit, between Cesarea and Joppe, but that also between the Mountain Tabor and the Sea of Galilee: for so S. Hierome upon the five and thirtieth Chapter of Ezay, interprets the word Saron: and so doth the same Father in his Commentaries upon Abdias, read Saron for Assaron: understanding thereby a Plaine neer Lidda: which Lidda in his time was called Diopolis, or the City of Jupiter, one of the Toparchies of Judea, the fifth indiginitie (or the third after Phny) where S. Peter (non sua, sed Christi virtute) cured Aeneas. Niger calls all that Region from Anti-libanus to Joppe, Saron. This Joppe was burnt to the ground by the Romans, those Ravens and spoylers of all Estates, disas much as belonged to the charge of the Tribes of Ephraim and Manasse: and so many of them as wrought in those works. During which time, as he went from Hierusalem, he encountered the Prophet Abijah: who made him know that he was by God destinated to be King of Israel, and to command ten of the twelve Tribes. After this, fearing that those things might come to Solomons knowledge, he fled into Egypt to Shishak, whom Eusebius calleth Ochozias, whose Daughter he married: the Predecessor of which Shishak (if not the same) did likewise entertain Adad the Edumean, when he was carried young into Egypt from the fury of David, and his Captain Joab; which Adad the King of Egypt married to his Wives sister Taphnes; using both him and Jeroboam as instruments to shake the Kingdom of Judaea, that himself might the easilier spoil it, as he did: for in the fifth year of Achoboom, Shishak sackt the City of Hierusalem, and carried thence all the treasure of David and Solomon, and all the spoils which David took from Adadazer of Soba, with the presents of Tobu, King of Hamath, which were of an inestimable value.

1 King. 15.

This Jeroboam after the death of Solomon became Lord of the ten Tribes: and though he were permitted by God to govern the Israelites, and from a mean man exalted to that state: yet preferring the policies of the world before the service and honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribes under his rule should repair to Hierusalem to do their usual Sacrifices, they might be drawn from him by degrees) he erected two golden Calves, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worship (an imitation of the Egyptian Apis, saith S. Ambrose, or rather of Aarons Calf in Horeb:) further he made election of his Priests out of the basest and unlearned people. This King made his chief Seat and Palace at Sichem: He despised the warning of the Judean Prophet, whom Josephus calleth Adon, and Glycas Joel: his hand thereafter withered, and was again restored: but continuing in his Idolatry, and hardened, upon occasion that the Prophet returning was slain by a Lion; Abijah makes him know that God purposed to root out his posterity.

He was afterward overthrown by Abia King of Juda, and died after he had governed two and twenty years; whom Nadab his son succeeded: who in the second year of his reign, together with all the race of Jeroboam, was slain, and rooted out by Baasba, who reigned in his stead: so Nadab lived King but two years.

Baasba the son of Abijah, the third King after the partition, made war with Asa King of Juda: he seated himself in Therfa: and fortified Rama against Juda, to restrain their excursions. Hereupon Asa entertained Benhadad of Damascus against him, who invaded Nephthali, and destroyed many places therein: the mean while Asa carried away the materials, with which Baasba intended to fortifie Rama: but being an Idolater, he was threatened by Jehu the Prophet, that it should befall his race, as it did to Jeroboam: which afterward came to passe: He ruled four and twenty years, and died.

To Baasba succeeded Ela his son, who at a feast at his Palace of Therfa, was in his cups slain by Zambris, after he had reigned two years: and in him the prophesie of Jehu was fulfilled.

Zambris succeeded Ela, and assumed the name of a King seven dayes; but Ambris in revenge of the Kings murder, set upon Zambris, or Zimri, and inclosed him in Therfa, and inforced him to burn himself.

Ambris or Homri succeeded Ela, and transferred the Regall seat from Therfa to Samaria: which he bought of Shemer, built, and fortified it. This Ambris was also an Idolater no lesse impious than the rest: and therefore subjected to Tabremmon, King of Syria, the father of Benhadad, according to Eusebius, Nicephorus, and Zonaras: but how this should stand, I do not well conceive; seeing Benhadad the son of Tabremmon was invited by Asa King of Juda, to assaile Baasba King of Israel, the father of Ela, who fore-went Ambris. This Ambris reigned twelve years, six in Therfa, and six in Samaria, and left two children, Achab and Athalia.

§. III.

Of Achab and his Successors, with the captivity of the ten Tribes.

Achab, or Abab succeeded Omri, who not onely upheld the Idolatry of Jeroboam, borrowed of the Egyptians: but he married Jezabel the Zidonian: and as Jeroboam followed the Religion of his Egyptian Wife: so did Achab of his Zidonian: and erected an Altar and a Grove to Baal in Samaria. He suffered Jezabel to kill the Prophets of the most high God. God sent famine on the land of Israel. Achab met Elias: Elias prevailed in the trial of the sacrifice, and killeth the false prophets; and afterward flieth for fear of Jezabel.

Benhadad not long after besieged Samaria: and taken by Achab, was by him set at liberty: for which, the Prophet (whom Glycas calleth Mithaeas) reproveth him: afterward he caused Naboth by a false accusation to be stoned. Then joyning with Josaphat in the war for the recovery of Ramoth, he was slain, as Mithaeas had foretold him.

He had three sons named in the Scripture, Ochozias, Joram, and Jous: besides seventy other sons by sundry wives and concubines.

Ochozias succeeded his father Achab. The Moabites fell from his obedience: he bruised himself by a fall: and sent for counsell to Beelzebub the god of Acharon. Eliab the Prophet meeteth the messenger on the way: and misliking that Ochozias sought help from that dead Idoll, asked the messenger, if there were not a God in Israel? Ochozias sendeth two Captains, and with each 50. souldiers, to bring Eliab unto him, both which with their Attendants were consumed with fire. The third Captain besought mercy at Eliab's hands, and he spared him, and went with him to the King, avowing it to the King that he must then die; which came to passe in the second year of his reigne.

Joram, the brother of Ochozias by Jezabel, succeeded: He allured Josaphat King of Juda, and the King of Edom to assist him against the Moabites, who refused to pay him the tribute of 20000. sheep. The three Kings wanted water for themselves and their horses in the Desarts. The Prophet Elisba causeth the ditches to flow. The Moabites are overthrown: their King flieth to Kirbairasith, and being besieged, according to some Expositors, burnt his son on the walls as a sacrifice, whereat the three Kings, moved with compassion, returned and left Moab, wasting and spoiling that Region. Others, as it seems with better reason, understand the Text to speak of the son of the King of Edom, whom they suppose in this irruption to have been taken prisoner by the Moabites, and that the King of Moab shewed him over the walls, threatening, unless the siege were dissolved, that he would offer him in sacrifice to his gods. Whereupon the King of Edom besought those of Juda and Israel to break off the siege for the safety of his son: which when the other Kings refused to yield unto, and that Moab, according to his former threatening, had burnt the King of Edoms son upon the rampire, that all the assailants might discern it, the king of Edom being by this sad spectacle enraged, forsook the party of the other Kings, for want of whose assistance the siege was broken up.

After this the King of Aram sent to Joram, to heal Naaman the Captain of his Army of the Leprosie. The answer of Joram was, Am I God to kill, and to give life; that he doth send to heal a man of his Leprosie? adding, that the Aramites sought but matter of quarrell against him. Elisba hearing thereof, willed the King to send Naaman to him; promising that he should know that there was a Prophet in Israel: and so Naaman was healed by washing himself seven times in Jordan. Elisba refused the gifts of Naaman: but his servant Gehazi accepted a part thereof: from whence the sellers of spirituall gifts are called Gehazites, as the buyers are Simonians, or Simon Magus.

Afterward Benhadad King of Aram, or Damascus, having heard that this Prophet did discover to the King of Israel whatsoever the Aramites consuled in his secretest counsell, sent a troop of horse to take Elisba: all whom Elisba struck blinde, and brought them captives into Samaria: Joram then asked leave of the Prophet to slay them, Elisba forbade him to harm them: but caused them to be fed, and sent back to their own Prince in safety.

The King of Aram, notwithstanding these benefites, did again attempt Samaria, and brought the Citizens to extreme famine. Joram imputeth the cause thereof to the Prophet Elisba. Elisba by prayer caused a noise of Chariots and Armour to sound in the aire, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the siege. An act of great admiration, as the same is written in the second of Kings. After this, when Azael obtained the Kingdome of Syria by the death of his Master, Joram entring upon his frontier, took Ramoth-Gilead: in which war he received divers wounds, and returned to Jezreel to be cured. But whilest he lay there; Jehu (who commanding the Army of Joram in Gilead, was anointed King by one of the children of the Prophets sent by Elisba) surprized and slew both him and all that belonged unto him, rooting out the whole posterity of Ahab.

Pag. 86.

Jehu, who reigned after Jehoram, destroyed not onely the race of his fore-goers, but also their religion; for which he received a promise from God, That his seed should occupy the Throne unto the fourth generation. Yet he upheld the Idolatry of Jeroboam, for which he was plagued with grievous war, wherein he was beaten by Hazeael the Aramite, who spoiled all the Countries to the East of Jordan: in which war he was slain, saith Cedrenus; whereof the Scriptures are silent. Jehu reigned 28. years.

2 King 13.

Joachaz, or Jehoachaz the son of Jehu succeeded his father, whom Azael and his son Benhadad often invaded, and in the end subjected, leaving him onely 50. horse, 20. chariots, and 10000. foot: and, as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like dust beaten into powder. Joachaz reigned 17. years.

2 King 14.

After Joachaz, Joas his son governed Israel, who when he repared to Elisba the Prophet as he lay on his death-bed, the Prophet promised him three victories over the Aramites: and first commanded him to lay his hand on his bowe, and Elisba covered the Kings hands with his, and bad him open the window Westward (which was toward Damascus) and then shoot an arrow thence out. He again willed him to beat the ground with his arrows, who smote it thrice, and ceased: The Prophet then told him, that he should have smitten five or six times, and then he should have had so many victories over the Aramites as he gave strokes. And so it succeeded with Joas, who overthrew the Aramites in three battels, and recovered the Cities and Territory from Benhadad the son of Azael, which his father Joachaz had lost. He also overthrew Amazias King of Juda, who provoked him to make the war, whereupon he entred Hierusalem, and sacked it with the Temple. This Joas reigned sixteen yeers, and died; in whose time also the Prophet Elisba exchanged this life for a better.

Jeroboam the third from Jehu, followed Joas his father, an Idolater, as his predecessors; but he recovered all the rest of the lands belonging to Israel, from Hamath which is neer Libanus, to the dead Sea, and reigned one and forty yeers.

Zacharias the fifth and last of the house of Jehu, slain by Shallum his vassall, who reigned in his stead, governed six moneths. Shallum held the Kingdome but one moneth, being slaughtered by Menabem of the Gadites.

2 King 16. 19.

Menabem who took revenge of Shallum, used great cruelty to those that did not acknowledge him: ripping the bellies of those that were with childe. This Menabem being invaded by Phul, bought his peace with ten thousand talents of silver, which he exacted by a Tribute of fifty shekels from every man of wealth in Israel. Menabem governed twenty yeers.

1 King 15. 29.

Pekahiah, or Phaccia, or after Zonaras, Phacesia succeeded, and after he had ruled two yeers, he was slain by Phaca, or Pekab the Commander of his Army, who reigned in his place. In this Pekab's time, Phulassar, or Tiglat-Phylassar invaded the Kingdom of Israel, and won Sion, Abel-Bethmaacab, Janoach, Kedesh, Hazor, and Gilead, with all the Cities of Galilee, carrying them captives into Affryia: he was drawn in by Achaz King of Judaea, against Pekab and Rezin, the last of the Adads. For Achaz being waisted by Pekab of Israel, and by Rezin of Damascus, did a third time borrow the Church-riches, and therewith ingaged the Affryan, who first suppressed that Monarchy of Syria and Damascus, and then of Israel: and this inviting of the great Affryan, was the utter ruine of both States, of Israel, and of Judaea. Pekab reigned 20. yeers.

Then Hosea, or Osea, who slew Pekab, became the vassall of Salmanassar; but hoping to shake off the Affryan yoke, he sought aide from So, or Sua, or Sebicur King of Egypt: which being known to the Affryan, he cast him into prison, besieged Samaria, and mastered it: carried the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Ninive in Affrya, and into Ragesin in Media, and into other Eastern Regions, and there dispersed them: and re-planted Samaria with divers Nations, and chiefly with the Cutha (inhabiting about Cutha, a River in Persia, or rather in Arabia Deserta) and with the people Catanee bounding upon Syria, and with those of Sebarvajim (a people of Sebar in Mesopotamia upon Euphrates, of whose conquest Senacherib vaunteth) also with those of Aua, which were of the ancient Avims, who inhabited the Land of the Philistims in Abrahams time, dwelling neer unto Gaza, whom the Captivims rooted out: and at this time they were of Arabia the Desert, called Havai, willing to return to their ancient seats.

To

To these he added those of Chamath, or Iturea, the ancient enemies of the Israelites, and sometime the Vassals of the Adads of Damascus, which so often afflicted them. And thus did this Affryan advise himself better than the Romanes did. For after Titus and Vespasian had wasted the Cities of Judaea and Hierusalem, they carried the people away captive: but left no others in their places, but a very few simple labourers, besides their own thin Garrisons, which soon decayed: and thereby they gave that dangerous entrance to the Arabians & Saracens, who never could be driven thence again to this day. And this transmigration, plantation, and displantation, happened in the yeer of the world, 3292. the sixth yeer of Ezekiah King of Juda: and the ninth of Hosea the last to King of Israel.

CHAP. X.

Of the memorable places of Dan, Simeon, Juda, Reuben, Gad, and the other half of Manasse.

40

Of Dan, whereof Joppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other Towns.

Now following the coast of the Mediterran Sea, that portion of Land assigned to the Tribe of Dan, joyneth to Ephraim, whereof I spake last: of which Family there were numbred at Mount Sinai 62700. fighting men, all which leaving their bodies with the rest in the Desarts, there entred the Holy Land of their sons 66400. bearing arms. The first famous City in this Tribe on the Sea-coast was Joppe, or Japho, as in the 19. of Josua: one of the most ancient of the World, and the most famous of others on that coast, because it was the Port of Hierusalem. From hence Jonas embarked himself when he fled from the service of God towards Tharsis in Cilicia. In the time of the Macchabees this City received many changes: and while Judas Macchabees governed the Jews, the Syrians that were garrison'd in Joppe, having their Fleet in the Port, invited 200. principall Citizens aboard them, and cast them all into the Sea: which Judas revenged by firing their Fleet, and putting the companies which sought to escape to the sword.

It was twice taken by the Romanes, and by Cestius the Lievtenant utterly burnt and ruined. But in the yeer of Christ, 1250. Lodowick the French King gave it new Walls and Towers: It is now the Turki, and called Jaffa. There are certain Rocks in that Port, whereunto it is reported, that Andromeda was fastned with chains: and from thence delivered from the Sea-monster by Perseus. This fable (for so I take it) is confirmed by Josephus, Solinus, and Pliny. Marcus Scaurus during his office of Ædileship, shewed the bones of this Monster to the people of Rome. S. Hierome upon Jonas speaks of it indifferently.

The next unto Joppe was Jamnia, where Judas Machabæus burnt the rest of the Syrian Fleet: the fire and flame whereof was seen at Hiernsalem, 240. furlongs off. It had sometime a Bishops seat, saith Will. of Tyre; but there is no signe of it at this time, that such a place there was.

After Jamnia is the City of Geth, or Gath, sometime Antbedon, saith Volatteran. And so Montanus seems to understand it. For he sets it next to Egypt, of all the Philistim Cities, and in the place of Antbedon. But Volatteran gives neither reason nor authority for his opinion; for Ptolomy sets Antbedon far to the South of Joppe: and Geth was the first and not the last (beginning from the North) of all the great Cities of the Philistims: and about sixteen miles from Joppe: where S. Hierome in his time found a great Village of the same name. It was sometime the habitation and Seminary of the Anakims, strong and Giant-like men, whom Josua could not expell, nor the Danites after him, nor any of the Israelites, till Dauids time: who slew Goliath, as his Captains did divers others not much inferiour in strength and stature unto Goliath.

Roboam the son of Solomon rebuilt Geth: Ozias the son of Amazias destroyed it again. It was also laid waste by Azazel King of Syria. Fulke the fourth King of Hiernsalem, built a Castle in the same place out of the old ruines. Whether this Geth was the same that Will. of Tyre in the Holy war calls Ibtilin, I much doubt: the error growing by taking Geth for Antbedon.

Not far from Geth or Gath standeth Bethsemer, or the house of the Sun. In the fields adjoining to this City (as is thought) was the Ark of God brought by a yoke of two Kine, turned loose by the Philistims: and the Bethsemites presuming to look therein, there were slain of the Elders seventy, and of the people fifty thousand, by the ordinance of God. After which slaughter, and the great lamentation of the people, it was called the great Abel, saith S. Hierome. Benedictus Theologus findes three other Cities of this name; one in (a) Nephtalim: another in Juda: and another in Issachar. Hierome findes a fifth in Benjamin.

Keeping the Sea-coast, the strong City of Accaron offereth it self, sometime one of the five Satrapies, or Governments of the Philistims. S. Hierome makes it the same with Cæsaria Palestine. Pliny confounds it with Apollonia: It was one of those that defended it self against the Danites and Idumeans. It worshipped Beelzebub, the god of Hornets or Flies. To which Idoll it was that Abaziah King of Israel sent to enquire of his health: whose messengers Eliab meeting by the way, caused them to return with a sorrowfull answer to their Master. This City is remembered in many places of Scripture.

Christians Schrot placeth Azotus next to Geth, and then Accaron or Ekyon. This Azotus or Aldod, was also an habitation of the Anakims, whom Josua (b) failed to destroy, though he once possist their Citie. Herein stood a sumptuous Temple, dedicated to the (c) Idoll Dagon: the same Idoll which fell twice to the ground of it self, after the Ark of God was by the Philistims carried into their Temple: and in the second fall, it was utterly broken and defaced. Neer it was that famous (d) Judas Machabæus slain by Bacchides and Alcimus the Lieutenants of Demetrius. Afterward it was taken by Jonathan: and the rest of the Citizens being put to the sword, all that fled into the Temple of Dagon, were with their Idoll therein consumed with fire: neer which also he overthrew Apollonius.

Gabinus the Romane rebuilt it. It had a Bishops seat while Christianity flourished in those parts. But in S. Hierome's time it was yet a fair Village. And this was the last of the Sea-Towns within the Tribe of Dan.

The Cities which are within the Land Eastward from Azotus, and beyond the Fountain of Zibbora, wherein Philip the Apostile baptized the Eunuch, are Tjorab, or Saxxa, and Efthiopa, and between them Castra Danis neer Hebron: though this place where Sampson was born, may seem by the words, Judg. 18. 12. to be in the Tribe of Judab, as the other also were bordering Towns between Dan and Juda.

After these within the bounds of Juda, but belonging to the Danites, they finde Gedor, or as it is 1 Mac. 15. Cedron, which Cenebæus the Lievtenant of Antiochus fortified against the Jews, and neer which himself was by the Macchabees overthrowen.

Then Asidon the Native City of the Macchabees: and wherein they were buried, on whose Sepulchre the seven Marble Pillars, which were erected of that height, as they served for a mark to the Sea-men, remained many hundreds of yeers after their first setting up, as Brochard and Breidenbach witness.

There are besides these the City of Cariathiarim, that is, the City of the woods: seated in the border of Juda, Benjamin, and Dan, wherein the Ark of God remained twenty yeers in the house of Aminadab: till such time as David carried it thence to Hiernsalem. Of this place (as they say) was Zacharias the son of Barachias, or Jehoiada, who was slain between the Temple & the Altar: alio Orias, whom Joachim King of Hiernsalem slaughtered, as we finde in Jeremy. Many other places which they place in this Tribe, rather as I take it, upon presumption than warrant, I omit: as that of Calpin taken with great slaughter by Judas Machabæus: and Lechie, whose King was slain by Josua, in which also Amaziah was slain: The same which Senacherib took, Ezekias reigning in Juda.

Of other Cities belonging to this Tribe, see in Josua c. 19. from the ver. 41. where also it is added, that the Danites portion was too little for their number of Families: and therefore that they invaded Lechem, and inhabited it: which City, after amplified by Philip, the brother of Herod Antipas, was called Cæsarea Philippi, as before, and made the Metropolis of Ituræa, and Trachonitis: of which coasts this Philip was Tetrarch: but of this City see more in Nephtalim. In this Tribe there are no Mountains of fame.

It hath two Rivers or Torrents: the Norther-most riseth out of the Mountains of Juda: and passing by Modin, falleth into the Sea by Sachrona. The other hath the name of Sorek or Sored, whose banks are plentifull of Vines which have no feeds or stones: the wine they yeeld is red, of excellent colour, taste, and favour, &c. In this Valley of Sorek, so called from the River, inhabited Dalila whom Sampson loved.

§. II.

THE TRIBE OF SIMEON.

The Tribe of Simeon takes up the rest of the Sea-coast of Canaan, to the border of Egypt: who being the second son of Jacob by Lea, there were increased of that Family while they abode in Egypt, as they were numbered at Mount Sinai, 59300. able men, all which ending their lives in the Desarts, there entered the Land of Promise of their issues 22200. bearing arms, who were * in part mixed with Juda, and in part severed, inhabiting a small Territory on the Sea-coast, belonging to Edumæa, of which 40 the first City adjoining to Dan, was Ascalon.

The Reguli, or petty Kings thereof, were called Ascalonites: of which Volatteran out of Xanthus, in the History of the Lydians, reports, that Tantalus and Ascalus were the sons of Juda, bey of Hymenæus: and that Ascalus being employed by Aciamus King of the Lydians, with an Army in Syria, falling in love with a young Woman of that Country, built this City, and called it after his own name: The same hath Nicolaus in his History, saith Volatteran.

Diondorus Siculus in his third Book remembreth a Lake neer Ascalon, wherein there hath been a Temple dedicated to Dereto, the Goddesse of the Syrians; having the face of a Woman, and the body of a Fish: who, as I have said before in the story of Ninus, was the mother of Semiramis, feigned to be cast into this Lake, and fed and relieved by Doves. And therefore was the Dove worshipped both in Babylonia and Syria, of which Tibullus the Poet:

Alba Palestino sanctæ Columba Syre.

The white Dove is for holy held in Syria Palestine.

It was one of the chiefeft and strongest cities of the Philistims. It bred many learned men

2 Sam. 1.

In David's time it was one of the most renowned Cities of the Philistims: for he nameth Gath and Ascalon only, when he lamenteth the death of Saul and Jonathan: but not speaking of the other three. Tell it not in Gath, nor publish it not in the streets of Ascalon: It is now called Scalene. Gabinus restored it as he did Azotus and Gaza.

Next to Ascalon stood Gaza, or Gazera, which the Hebrews call Hazza, the Syrians, Azan, of Azonus (as they say) the son of Hercules. Other profane writers affirm, that it was built by Jupiter. Pomp. Mela gives the building thereof to Cambyses the Persian; because belike he re-built it, and Gaza in the Persian tongue is as much to say, as Treasure. This Gaza was the first of the five Satrapies of the Philistims, and the South bound of the land of Canaan towards Egypt. But this City was far more ancient than Cambyses, as it is proved by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb: but the strength of the Anakims put him from it. At such time as Alexander Macedon invaded the Empire of 20 Persia, it received a Garrison for Darius: in despite whereof it was by the Macedonians after a long siege demolished, and was called Gaza of the Desert.

It was a Town of great account in the time of the Maccabees, and gave many wounds to the Jews till it was forlorn by Simon: of which he made too great account, as that he purposed to reside therein himself, and in his absence left John his Son and Successor to be Governour. In Brochard his time it was still a goodly City, and known by the 30 name of Gazara.

But Julian the Apostata soon after favouring the Gazeans, made it subject unto them, and commanded it to be called Gaza maritima.

Then Rabbia, where Philopater overthrew the great Antiochus: and beyond it Rhinocura, whose Torrent is known in the Scriptures by the name of * the Torrent of Egypt, 40 till the Septuagint converted it Rinocura: to difference it, Es. 27. 12. giving the name of the City to the Torrent that watereth it. Plinie calls it Rhinocolura: and Jos. 13. Rhinocura: (a) Epiphanius reports it as a Tradition, that at this place the world was divided by lot, between the three Sons of Noah.

Within the Land and upon the River of Besor they place Gerar: which the Scripture placeth between Kadesh and Shur. Gen. 20. 1. That it was near to the Wilderneffe of Beer-

Sheba, it appears Gen. 20. 31. and therefore no marvell that as elsewhere Beer-Sheba, so sometime Gerar, be made the South bound of Canaan. It was of old a distinct Kingdom from the Philistims Satrapies: the Kings by one common name were called Abimelechs;

S. Hierome faith that afterward it was called Regio salutaris, the healthy Country: so that it 50 was no marvel that Abraham and Isaac lived much in those parts. Of King Asa's conquest of the Cities about Gerar, see 2 Chron. 14. 14.

More within the Land was Siceleg, or Tiglak, which was burnt by the Amalekites, when David in his flying from Saul to the Philistims had left his carriages there, but David followed them over the River of Besor, and put them to the slaughter, and recovered the prey.

Next Dabir sometime Cariath-Sepher, the City of Letters, the University, as they say, or Academie of old Palestine. In Saint Hierome's time, it seems, it had the name of

DABURA:

Daema; Jos. 15. 49. it is called Urbs Sanna: from the name, as it seems, of some of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Urbs Arbabi. For even hence also were these Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Othoniel, incouraged by Caleb's promise of his Daughter Jef. 11. 21. in marriage: but that Josua and the Hoast of Israel were at the surprize, it appears Jos. 10. 39. This City Jos. 21. 15. is named among those which out of Simeon and Juda were given to the Levites. And hence it seems they attribute it to this Tribe.

Besides these, there are many others in the Tribe of Simeon, but of less fame, as Hajin, of which Jos. 19. 7. which also Jos. 21. 16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Levites, given out of the portion of Juda and Simeon, (for which Junius thinks Hasbam is named 10 1 Chron. 6. 59. though * in the place of Josua these two are distinguished) also Tholad, so named 1 Chron. 4. 29. for which Jos. 19. 4. we have Elsholad, Chatzar-Susa, so named, Jos. 19. 5. for which Jos. 15. we have Chatzar-Gadda, both names agreeing in signification: for Gadda is Turma, and Susi Equitatus.

In the same places of Josua, and of the Chronicles, Chorma is named, which they think to be the same with that of which Numb. 14. 45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites pursued the Israelites: But that Chorma cannot be in Simeon, nor within the Mountains of Edumæa. For Israel fled not that way: but back again to the Camp, which lay to the South of Edumæa, in the Desert. Dut. 1.

The same places also name Beer-Sheba in this Tribe: so called of the Oath between 20 Abraham and Abimelec: neer unto which Hagar wandered with her son Ismael. It was also called the City of Isaac, because he dwelt long there. While the Christians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to strengthen this place, standing on the border of the Arabian Desert, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gibelin. The other Cities of Simeon which are named in the places of Josua, and of the Chronicles above noted, because they help us nothing in story, I omit them. In the time of Ezekia King of Juda, certain of this Tribe being strengthened in their own Territories, passed * as it seems in the Land of Jude. See in the first P to  Gedor*, as it is 1 Chron. 4. 39. (the same place which Jos. 15. 36. is called Gedera and Gederobaima) which at that time was inhabited by the Issue of Cham: where they feated themselves: as also five hundred others of this Tribe, destroyed the Reliques of Amalec chap. of this Chapter in the Cities of Dan. Jos. 15. 3.

30 in the Mountains of Edom, and dwelt in their places. The mountains within this Tribe are few, and that of Sampson the chiefest: unto which he carried the Gate-post of Gaza. The Rivers are, Besor, and the Torrent of Egypt, called Shichar, as is noted in Asse.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF JUDA.

OF Juda, the fourth son of Jacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Egypt 74600. all 40 which (Caleb excepted) perished in the Deserts. And of their sons there entered the Land of Canaan 76500. bearing arms. Agreeable to the greatnesse of this number was the greatest Territory given, called afterward Judea: within the bounds whereof were the portions allotted to Dan and Simeon included. And many Cities named in those Tribes, did first, as they say, belong unto the Children of Juda: who had a kinde of Sovereignty over them: as Succoth, Cariathiarim, Lachis, Bethsemer, Isiglag, Beer-Sheba, and others. The multitude of people within this small Province (if it be meted by that ground given to this Tribe only) were incredible, if the witness of the Scriptures had not warranted the report. For when David numbered the people, they were found five hundred thousand fighting men.

50 The Cities of Juda were many. But I will remember the chiefest of them: beginning with Arad, or Horma, which standeth in the entrance of Judea from Idumæa: whose King first surprized the Israelites as they passed by the border of Canaan towards Moab, Numb. 21. 2. and took from them some spoyles, and many prisoners: who being afterward overthrown by the Israelites, the sons of Keniz, the Kinsmen of Moses, obtained a possession in that Territory: who before the coming of the Israelites, dwelt between Madian and Amalek.

Following this Frontier towards Idumæa and the South, Ascensus Scorpionis, or Acrab-Nam, Nam. 24. 4. him is placed: the next to Arad: so called because of Scorpions, which are said to be in Dut. 8. 15. that the Dead Sea: and the Mountains of Juda, which begin to rise by Emaus, and end neer Taphna, and these part Juda from Dan and Simeon. Of others which stand single, there is that of Hebron, at the foot whereof was that Oak of Mamre, where the three Angels appeared to Abraham; which Saint Hierome calleth a Fir-tree, and saith, That it stood till the time of Constantine the younger. There is also that Mountain called Colis Achille, on the South of Zipp: on the top whereof the great Herod, inclosing the old Castle, erected by Jonathan Maccabaeus, and called Massada, garnished it with twenty seven high and strong Towers: and therein left Armour and Furniture for an hundred thousand men; being, as it seemeth, a place unaccessible, and of incomparable strength.

In the Valley afterward called the Dead Sea, or the Lake Asphaltitis, this Country had four Cities, Adama, Sodom, Seboim, and Gomorra, destroyed with fire from Heaven for their unnatural sins.

§. IV. THE TRIBE OF REUBEN, and his Borderers.

||. I.

The seats and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites was from Sehon King of Hefbon.

ON the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Jacob's sons inhabited: of whose children there were numbered at Mount Sinai 46000. who dying with the rest in the Deserts, there remained to possess the Land promised 43700. bearing arms. But before we speak of these, or the rest that inhabited the East side of Jordan, something of their borderers: to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose Land in our writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first we are to remember, that out of Abraham's kindred came mighty Families: as by Isaac and Jacob the Nation called Israel, and afterward Jews: by Ejan, or Edom, the Idumeans: by Ismael, the eldest son of Abraham, the Ismaelites: and by Keturah, his last wife, the Midianites. And again, by Lot, Abraham's brothers son, those two valiant Nations of the Moabites and Ammonites: all which being but strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly possessed by the Canaanites; and by the Families of them descended) these issues and alliance of Abraham, all but Jacob, whose children were bred in Egypt, inhabited the frontier places adjoining.

Ejan and his sons held Idumaea, which bounded Canaan on the South, Ismael took from the South-east part of the Dead Sea; stretching his possession over all Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Desert, as far as the River of Tygris, from Swr to Havilah.

Moab took the rest of the coast of the Dead Sea, leaving a part to Midian, and passing over Arnon, inhabited the Plains between Jordan and the Hills of Abarim, or Arnon, as far North as Essebon, or Chesbon.

Ammon fate down on the North-east side of Arnon, and possessed the Tract from Rabbah, afterward Philadelphia, both within the Mountains of Gilbead, and without them as far forth as Aroer, though in Moses time he had nothing left him in all that Valley: for the Amorites had thrust him over the River of Jaboc, as they had done Moab over Arnon. As these Nations compassed sundry parts of Canaan, so the border between the River of Jaboc and Damascus, was held by the Amorites themselves, with other mixt Nations: all which Territory on the East side of Jordan, and on the East side of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasse; whereof that part which Moab had, was first possessed by the Emims, a Nation of Giants weakened and broken by Chedorlabomer, after repulsed by the Moabites, as before remembered. That which the Ammonites held, was the Territory and ancient possession of the Zuzim, Zuzims, or Zuzi, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedorlabomer, Amraphel, and the rest: and by them an easie way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Now where it is written, that Arnon was the border of Moab, the same is to be understood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Sehon or his Ancestor beaten beaten the Moabites out of the plain Countries, between Abarim and Jordan, and driven them from Hebron over Arnon; and this happened not long before Moses arrivall upon that border, when Vabeb governed the Moabites. For he that ruled Moab when Moses past Arnon, was not the son of Vabeb, but his name was Balac, the son of Zippor. And it may be that those Kings were elective, as the Edumeans anciently were.

Now, all that part of Moab, between Arnon and Jordan, as far North as Essebon, was inhabited by Reuben. And when Israel arrived there out of Egypt, it was in the possession of Sehon, of the race of Canaan by Amoreus: and therefore did Jephthah the Judge of Israel justly defend the regaining of those Countries against the claim of the Ammonites: because (as he alleged) Moses found them in the possession of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab, or Ammon: who (saith Jephthah) had 300. years time to recover Jedg. 11. them, and did not: whence he inferreth that they ought not to claim them now.

And lest any should marvel why the Ammonites in Jephthah's time should make claim to these Countries: whereas Moses in the place Num. 21. v. 26. rather accounts them to have been the ancient possession of the Moabites, than of the Ammonites: it is to be noted, that Dent. 3. 11. when it is said that the Iron bed of Og was to be seen at Rabbath, the chief City of the Ammonites, it is also signified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Israelites possessed, was by him or his Ancestors got from the Ammonites, as much of Sehon's was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were seated so confusedly together, that it was hard to distinguish them; so also were the sons of Moab and Ammon, Madian, Analec, and Ismael. Yet the reason seemeth plain enough why Ammon commanded in chief, in Jephthah's time; for sometime the one Nation, sometime the other of all those borderers acquired the Sovereignty: and again, that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely, within the Mountains of Gilead, or Gilebad, and as far South as Aroer, belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking advantage of the time, they then fought how to recover it again. Yet at such time as Moses overthrew Sehon at Jabaz, the Ammonites had lost to the Amorites all that part of their possession which lay about Aroer, and between it and Jaboc: Sehon and Og, two Kings of the Amorites, having dislodged both Moab and Ammon of all within the Mountains. For it is written in Numb. 21. 24. that Israel conquered the Land of Sehon from Arnon unto Jaboc, even unto the children of Ammon: so as at this time the River of Jaboc was the South bound of Ammon within the Mountains, when as anciently they had also possessions over Jaboc, which at length the Cadites possessed, as in the 13. Chapter of Joshua, Ver. 25. it appears.

||. II.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

THE chief Cities belonging to Reuben were these, Kedemoth, for which the Vulgar, without any shew of warrant, readeth Jethon. The Vulgar or Hierome followed the Septuagint, those two Verses, 36. and 37. in Josh. 22. being wanting in the old Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint readeth Kedson for Kedmoth, which Kedson by writing slip into Jethon.

This City which they gave to the Levites, imparts her name to the Desert adjoining: from whence Moses sent his Embassy to Sehon. In the same place of Joshua, where this Kedemoth is mentioned, the Vulgar for Beser & villa ejus, reads Esosr in Solitudine Misor, without any ground from the Hebrew: whence Adrichomius makes a Town called Misor, in the border between Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemoth, neer the Dead Sea (for the Countree between being Mountainous, hath few Cities) they place two Towns of note, Lasa or Leshash, of which Genesis 10. ver. 19. The Greeks call it Callirhoe: neer which there is a Hill, from whence there floweth Springs both of hot and cold, bitter and sweet water; all which soon after their rising, being joyned in one stream, doe make a very wholesome Bath, especially for all contraction of sinews: to which Herod the elder, when he was desperate of all other help, repaired, but in vain. Others say, that these Springs arise out of the Hills of Macherus, in this Tribe. The like fountains are found in the Pyrenies, and in Peru, called the Baths of the Inga's, or Kings. The other Town is Macherus, the next between Lasa and Jordan: of all that part of the world the strongest In-land City and Castle, standing upon a Mountain every way unaccessibile. It was first fortified by Alexander Jannæus, who made it a frontier against the Arabians; but it was demolished by Gabinus in the war with Arifobulus, faith Josephus. It was thither (faith Josephus) that Herod sent John Baptist, and wherein he was slain: his Army soon after being utterly overthrown by Aretas King of Arabia, and himself after this murder never prospering. Not far from Machærus was Bozor, or Bosara, a town of refuge, and belonging to the Levites, and neer it Livias upon Jordan, which Herod built in honour of Livia, the mother of Tiberius Cæsar.

To the North of Livias is Setim, or Sittim: where the children of Israel embraced the daughters of Midian, or Moab: and where Phineas pierced the body of Zimri and Cossi with his spear, bringing due vengeance upon them when they were in the midst of their sin; and from hence Josua sent the discoverers to view Jericho, staying there until he went over Jordan. As for the Torrent Setim, which in this place Adrichomius dreams of, reading Joel 3. 18. irrigabit torrentem Setim: The Vulgar hath torrentem spinarum: and Junius, vallem Cedrorum: expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan: but for the Church, in which the just being placed, grow as the cedars, Psal. 92. 13.

The plain Country hereabout, by Moses called, The plains of Moab, where he expounded the book of Deuteronomy to the people a little before his death, is in the beginning of the same book precisely bounded by Moses. On the South it had the great Desert of Paran, where they had long wandered. On the East it had Chafseroth, and Dizabab (of which two, the former is that Gazorus, of which Ptolomy in Palestina: the later was a 20 Tract belonging to the Nabatheï in Arabia Petrea, where was * Mezabab, of which, Gen. 36. 39.) by the Geographers called Medava, and Medaba. On the West it had Jordan, and on the North it had Laban (in Junius edition, by the fault of the Print, Lamban, Deut. 1. 1.) the same which the Geographers call Libias: and some confound it with Livias, of which even now we spake.

Also on the same North side towards the confines of Cælosyria, it had Theophel: whereabout sometime Pella of Cælosyria stood: which was in the Region of Decapolis; and, as Stephanus faith, was sometime called Buris. It is also noted in Moses to be over against or neer unto Suph, for which the Vulgar hath the Red Sea, as also Nam. 2. 14. it translateth the word Suph in like manner: whereas in this place of Deuteronomy there is no addition of any word in the Hebrew to signifie the Sea: and yet the Scripture, when this word is so to be taken, useth the addition of Mara, thereby to distinguish it from the Region of Suph, or Suphab: which doubtlesse was about these plains of Moab towards the Dead Sea: where the Country being full of reeds, was therefore thus called: as also the Red Sea was called Mare Suph, for like reason.

The place in these large plains of Moab, where Moses made those divine exhortations, some say was Bethabara, where John baptized, which in the story of Gideon is called Beth-barai. Josephus sayes it was where after the City Abila stood, neer Jordan, in a place set with Palm-trees: which fure was the same as Abel-sittim in the plains of Moab, Nam. 33. 49. (that some call Abel-fathaim, and Bel-fathim) which is reckoned by Moses in that place of Numbers for the 42. and last place of the Israelites incamping in the time of Moses: This place is also called sittim: which word if we should interpret, we should rather bring it from Cedars than from Thorns, with Adrichomius and others. It was the wood of which the Ark of the Tabernacle was made.

Toward the East of these plains of Moab, they place the Cities, Nebo, Baal-Meon, Silma, and Hesbon the chief City of Sebon, and Elbalel, and Kiriathaima the seat of the Giant Emim. Of the two first of these Moses seems to give a note that the names were to be changed, because they tasted of the Moabites * Idolary. For Nebo (in stead of which, Junius, Esa. 46. 1. reads Deus vaticinatus) was the name of their Idoll-Oracle, and Baal-meon, is the habitation of Baal. Of the same Idoll was the Hill Nebo in these parts so denominated: from whose top, which the common Translators call Phasgab, Moses before his death saw all the land of Canaan beyond Jordan. In which story Junius doth not take Phasgab, or Pisgab for any proper name: but for an appellative, signifying a Hill: and so also Vatabus in some places, as Nam. 21. 20. where he noteth, that some call Pisgab that top which looketh to Jericho, and Hair as it looketh to Moab, which opinion may be somewhat strengthened by the name of a City of Reuben, mentioned Jos. 13. 20. called Aphdath-Pisga, which is as much as decursus Pisga: to wit, where the waters did run down from Pisga. In the same place of Josua there is also named Beth-Peor, as belonging to Reuben: so called from the Hill Peor: from whence also Baal the Idoll was called Baal-Peor; which, they say, was the same as Priapus: the chief place of whose worship seems to have been Bamoth-Bahal, of which also Jos. 13. in the Cities of Reuben: for which, Nam. 22. 41. they read, the high places of Baal (for so the word signifieth) to which place Balaak first brought Balaam to curse the Israelites.

ll. III.

Of divers places bordering Reuben, belonging to Midian, Moab, or Edom.

Here were besides these, divers places of note over Arnon, which adjoynd to Reuben: amongst which they place Callim, the City of Phalti: to whom Saul gave his daughter Michol from David: but Junius thinks this Town to be in Benjamin: gathering so much out of Esa. 10. 29. where it is named among the Cities of Benjamin. With better reason perhaps out of Nam. 21. 19. we may say that Mathana and Nabal were in those confines of Reuben: through which places the Israelites past after they had left the Well, called Beer: Then Deblathaim, which the Prophet Hieremy threatneth with the rest of the Cities of Moab.

Madian also is found in these parts, the chief City of the Madianites in Moab: but not that Midian, or Madian by the Red Sea, wherein Jethro inhabited. For of the Madianites there were two Nations, of which these of Moab became Idolaters, and received an exceeding overthrow by a Regiment of twelve thousand Israelites, sent by Moses out of the Plains of Moab: at such time as Israel began to accompany their Daughters: their five Kings with Balaam the Soothsayer, were then slain: and their Regall City with the rest destroyed. The other Madianites, over whom Jethro was Prince or Priest, forgot not the God of Abraham their Ancestor; but relieved and assisted the Israelites in their painful travels through the Desarts: and were in all that passage their guides. In the South border of Moab adjoynding to Edom, and sometime reckoned as the chief City of Edom, there is that Petra, which in the Scriptures is called Sela, which is as much as rupe, or petra. It was also called Joabbeel, as appears by the place, 2 Kings 14. It was built (faith Josephus) by Rezem, one of those five Kings of the Madianites: slain as before is said: after whom it was called Rezem. Now, they say, it is called Crac, and Mozera. The Soldans of Egypt, for the exceeding strength thereof, kept therein all their treasures of Egypt and Arabia: of which it is the first and strongest City: the same perhaps which Pliny and Strabo call Nabathea, whence also the Province adjoynding took name: which name seems to have been taken at first from Nabathoth, the son of Abraham by Kethura. For Nabathea is no where understood for all Arabia Petrea (at least where it is not misf-understood) but it is that Province which neighboureth Judea. For Tharan inhabited by Ismael, whose people Ptolomy calleth Pharanites, in stead of Ismaelites, and all those Territories of the Cusites, Madianites, Amalekites, Ismaelites, Edomites, or Idumeans, the Lands of Moab, Ammon, Hus, Sin, and of Og King of Basjan, were parts of Arabia Petrea: though it be also true, that some part of Arabia the Desart belonged to the Amalekites, and Ismaelites: all which Nations the Scriptures in the first of Chronicles the fifth, calls Hagarens, of Hagar.

This City Petra, Scaurus besieged with the Romane Army, and finding the place in shew impregnable, he was content, by the persuasion of Antipater, to take a composition of monie, and to quit it. Yet Amasias King of Juda (after he had slaughtered ten thousand of the Arabians in the valley called Salmarum) was also this City. S. Hierome finds Ruth the Moabite to be natural of this City. In the mean time, when the Christians held the Kingdom of Hierusalem, it had a Latine Bishop, having before been under the Greek Church. It is seated not far from Hor, where Aaron died, and on the other side towards the North is the river of Zared, or Zered, by which Moses encamped in the 38. It is described by Adrichomius the waters of Menrim, or rather Nemrim, in his Map of Reuben, not far hence, and between Zared and Arnon: and so he doth the Valley of Sava: but the waters of Nimra, or Beth-Nimra (for which it seems Adrichomius writ Nemrim) refresh the plains of Moab: and the confluence of those waters of Nimra are in the Tribe of Gad. Sava also cannot be found in this place, that is, to the South of Arnon, and under Midian. For after Abraham returned from the pursuit of the Assyrian and Persian Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Save, or Saveh, which is the Kings Dale, where Abolom set up his Monument, as it seems, not far from Hiernsalem. And at the same time Melchizedec King of Salem also encountered him. But Abraham coming from the North, and Melchizedec inhabiting either near Bethsan, otherwise Seythopolis, in the half Tribe of Manasse, or in Hiernsalem (both places lying to the West of Jordan) could not encounter each other in Arabia: and therefore Save, which was also called the Kings Dale, could not be in these parts.

§. IV. Of the Dead Sea.

NOW because the Sea of Sodom, or the Dead Sea, called also the Lake of Asphaltitis, and the Salt Sea (in distinction from the sea of Iberia, which was fresh water) also the sea of the Wilderness, or rather the sea of the Plains, is often remembered in the Scriptures, and in this story also, therefore I think it not impertinent to speak somewhat thereof. For it is like unto the Capfin Sea, which hath no out-let, or disburthening. The length of this Lake Jofephus makes 180. furlongs (which make 22. miles and a half of ours) and about 50. in breadth, which make 18. of our miles, and somewhat more. Pliny makes it a great deal less; but those that have of late years seen this sea, did account it (saith Weissenburg) eight Dutch miles (which is two and thirty of ours) in length: and two and a half of theirs (which is ten of ours) in breadth. Of this Lake or Sea, Tacitus maketh this report: Lacus est in immenso ambitu, speciei maris, sapore corrupti, et gravitate odoris accolis pestifer: neque vento impellitur, neque pisces aut fuitas aquis volucres patitur, incertum unde superjecta aut solido feruntur, periti, imperitique nandi perinde atolluntur. &c. That it is very great, and (as it were) a sea of a corrupt taste: of smell infectious, and pestilent to the borderers: it is neither moved nor raised by the winds, nor indureth fish to live in it, or fowl to swim in it. Those things that are cast into it, and the unskillful of swimming, as well as the skillfull, are born up by this water. At one time of the year it casteth up Bitumen: the art of gathering which, Experience (the finder of other things) hath also taught. It is used in the trimming of ships, and the like busineses.

And then of the Land, he speaketh in this sort: The fields not far from this Lake, which were sometime fruitful, and adorned with great Cities, were burnt with lightning: of which the ruins remain, the ground looking with a sad face, as having lost her fruitfulness: for whatsoever doth either grow, or is set thereon, be it fruits or flowers, when they come to ripeness, having nothing within them, but moulder into ashes: Thus far Tacitus. And it is found by experience, that those Pomegranates, and other Apples or Oranges, which do still grow on the banks of this cursed Lake, do look fair, and are of good colour on the outside, but being cut, have nothing but dust within. Of the Bitumen which this Lake casteth up, it was by the Greeks called Asphaltitis. Vespasian desirous to be satisfied of these reports, went of purpose to see this Lake, and caused certain Captives to be cast up into it, who were not only unskillful in swimming, but had their hands also bound behind them, yet notwithstanding they were carried on the face of the waters, and could not sink.

§. V.

Of the Kings of Moab, much of whose Country within Arnon Reuben possesse.

OF the Kings of Moab, whose Countie (within Arnon) Reuben possesse (though not taken from Moab, but from Sehon the Amorite) few are known. Junius in the 21. of Num. v. 14. nameth Vabek, which seems to be the Ancestor or Predecessor of Balac, the son of Zippor: which Balac sent for Balaam to curse Israel. For fearing to contend with Moses by arms, by the examples of Sehon and Og, he hoped by the help of Balaam: cursings or enchantments, to take from them all strength and courage, and to cast on them some pestilent diseases. And though Balaam at the first, moved by the spirit of God, blest Israel, contrary to the hope and desire of Moab: yet being desirous in some sort to satisfy him, and to do him service, he advised Moab to send Madianitis women among the Israelites: hoping by them, as by fit instruments of mischief, to draw them to the Idolatry of the Heathen: but in the end, he received the reward of his falling from God, and of his evil counsell, and was slain among the rest of the Princes of Midian.

After

After these times the Kings of the Moabites are not named: saying that we finde in the first of Chronicles the fourth, that Jokim, and the men of Chozeba, and Josb, and Sareph, all being of the issue of Juda, sometime had the Dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the same Verse, these also are ancient things: to wit, as some expound it, the particulars of these mens governments are no where extant or remaining: or as others, hæc prius fuer, these Families of Juda were once thus famous: but now their posterity choole rather to abide in Babylon, and be Clay-workers to the King there.

Then we finde Eglon King of Moab, who with the help of Ammon and Analec mastered Israel, and commanded them 18. years: which Eglon, Ebud slew in his own house, and 10. afterward 1000. of his Nation. What name the King of Moab had unto whom David fled fearing Saul, it doth not appear: or whether it were the same against whom Saul made war, it is not manifest, for neither are named. But in respect that this Moabite was an enemy to Saul, he received David, & relieved him; knowing that Saul fought his life.

After this, David himself entered the Region of Moab, but not likely in the same Kings time: for he slaughtered two parts of the people, and made the third part tributary: whereupon it was said of David, Moab is my wash-pot, over Edom will I cast my shoe: meaning, that he would reduce them to such an abjection, and appoint them for base services: and that he would tread down the Idumæans.

The next King after David's time of the Moabites, whose name liveth, was Mefba: who 20. falling from Juda, (perhaps in remembrance of the severity of David) fattened himself to the Kings of Israel, and paid tribute to Ahab, 100000. Lambs, and 200000. Rams with the wooll: who revolting again from Israel after the death of Ahab, was invaded by Jehoram, with whom joyned the Kings of Juda & Idumæa: and being by these three Kings preft and broken, he fled to Kir-hareeth, as is else-where shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the Kings name; when that Nation, assisted by the Ammonites and Idumæans, invaded Jehobabphat: and by reason of some private quarrels among themselves, the Moabites and Ammonites set upon the Idumæans, and slaughtered them: and then one against another, so as Jehobabphat had a notorious victory over them all, without either blood or wound. Also in the time of Hieremy the Prophet, there was a King of Moab which is not named, which was after Mefba of Moab many descents: for Mefba lived with Jehoram, and this Moabite in Zedeckia's time, fourteen Kings of Juda coming between, who wasted three hundred and odde years.

§. V.

Of the memorable places of the Gadites, and the bordering places of Ammon.

THE Territory adjoining to Reuben, is that of Gad: whereof all that part which joyned to the Mountains, was sometime in the possession of the Ammonites, as far to the South as Aroer. Of the children of Gad, the seventh son of Jacob by Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, there parted out of Egypt, and died in the Deserts, 455. 50. and their sons entered the Land promised, 45000. bearing arms: from the half Tribe of Manasse, the River of Jaboc divided them: from Reuben, the Cities of Hesbon, Elbe, and Aphce.

The chief City of Gad was Aroer, which they make to be the same with Ar, or Rabbath Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Junius attending diligently to those words of Moses, Deut. 2. 36. Ab Harobero, quæ est in ripa fluminis Arnon, ex civitate ipsa quæ est in flumine; Where the city in the river is distinguished from the city upon the bank of the river, as also in like manner (Jof. c. 12. v. 2. and c. 13. 9.) thinketh that Harobero, which doubtlesse belonged to the Gadites (as Numb. 32. 34.) it is said that they built it) was indeed seated neer Har of the Moabites, but divers from it. For that Har was never possessed by Moses, it is plain Deuteronomy 2. 9. where God forbidding Moses to touch it, saith he hath given Har for an inheritance to the sons of Lot. Now that this City, which in divers places is said to be within, and in the middle of the River of Arnon (and so distinguished from Harobero, which is said in the same places to be on the bank of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites, the same Junius proveth out of Numbers, ch. 21. v. 15. where Arnon is said to be divided into divers streams, where or among which Har is seated: And the same is confirmed by the place of Jof. 13. ver. 25. where Harobero is said to be seated before Rabbah: which Rabbah, as it seems, cannot be the

* So Junius reads for the Hebrew, Harobero every where, and so also the edition of atabilis, Deut. 3. 17. though Deut. 4. 44. it hath more solitudinis, as also 2 Reg. 14. 25. the reason of this name seems to be, because it joyns to the plains of Moab, which are called Harobero, Deut. 3. 4. 1. as also we have Cajulath in Harobero, that is in the plains, to wit, of Zabulon, 1 Mat. 9. 2. whence Adrichomius imagines a city in Zabulon, called Araba, a Defer, Sand.

Rabbab of the Ammonites (for they feat not Harobar neer it, nor in sight of it) and therefore by Rabbab here, we must understand Rabbab of Moab, which they make to be Ar, or Har: and so we must needs distinguish it from Harobar. And asfor Har* (which also gave the name to the coast adjoining) it seems it continued in the possession of the Moabites, after they had once expelled the Giant-like people called Emims, first weakened by Chedorlaomer and his Associates: but Harobar by the interchange of times suffered many ancient changes, as being won from the Moabites by Sehon, and from him by the Israelites, and from them, as it seems in the story of Jeftba, by the Ammonites: and from the Ammonites again by the Israelites, under the conduct of Jeftba. In S. Hieroms time the greatest part of this City perished by an earth-quake, as also Zoar, in which Lot saved himself in the destruction of Sodom, seated not far hence; which, they say, was therefore called Vitula conflagrans, because as a wanton tumbling heifer, she was thrice overthrown with earth-quakes: for which cause also Hierome seems to think that this Zoar was called Salissa, or Bal-Salissa, as if Baal had been a remainder of the old name i. Balab, of Belab, (of which Gen. 14. 2. and Saliba, which hath a signification of the ternation or number, had alluded to the three earth-quakes.

Brochard takes Harher to be Petra, but erroneously, as before it is noted ; seeing that Petra was in the South border of Moab adjoining to Edon, whereas Harher is in the North-East border. Between Harher and Jordan they feed Dibon, which is attributed to the Gadites, because they are faind to have built it, Numbers 32.34. though Isaia 13.20 verse 17. it is said that Moses gave it to the Reubenites. Of this City through the revel of Moab, both Esay and Hieremy prophesied, that it should perish, and the Lakes about it run with the blood of the Inhabitants. It was a great Village near Arnon in Saint Hierom's time.

Keeping the banks of Arnon, one of the next Cities of fame to Aroer, was Bethnimrab, of which Esay prophesieth, That the waters thereof should be dried up: and all the vale of Moab withered. Not far from Bethnimrab in this Tribe, Adricimins placeth Jogbeha, and Nobach, or Nobe: of both which we read in the story of Gideon: and that Jogbeha was in Gad, built by the Gadites, it appears, Numbers 32:35. and therefore Nobachallo is in Gad, or Adricimins is in Gad, or Jogbeha is in Gad, is not certain: only must needs be in these parts; but whether in Gad or Manasse it is not certain: only so that it was anciently called Kenath, Moses witnessed. Nobach also (saith he) went and took Kenath with her Town, and called it Nobach of his own name, where because the Ver- ses precedent speak of the Manassites, and because it is not likely that Moses would have severed this seat of the Gadites from the rest, of which he spake before, ver. 34, 35, 36. therefore it may seem that this * Nobach was in that part of Manasse which was in the East of Jordan, though Adrichomius place it in Gad. For whereas he suppoeth it to be the same with Nob, which Saul destroyed, of this we shall speak (a) in the Tribe of Benjamin. And as for that Karkor, where Zebab and Zalmunna rested themselves in their flight from Gideon, to which place Gideon marched through this Nobach and Jugbeha, though some place it in Gad, and make it the same with Kir-chares, of which Exo. say 15. and 2 Reg. 3.25. yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and if it be the same with Kir-chares, it is certain, that it was still a principall City held by the Moabites, and not in the Tribe of Gad.

In the body of this Tribe of Gad they place Hataroth: of which name the Scripture witnesseth that two Cities were build by the Gadites; the former simply called Hataroth, the later Hatroth-Sophan: for which later the vulgar makes two Cities, Roth and Sophan: the name Hataroth, is as much as Corona.

In the Valley of the Kingdom of Sehon, together with Bethnimra, of which we have spoken, Jof. 13. 27. nameth Beth-haram and Succoth : the former, Numb. 32. 36. (where it is called Beth-haram) together with Bethnimra, is said to have been built by the Gad-ites, which (perhaps the rather, because in Jofna it is called Beth-haram) some take to be Betaraphtha, (of which (b) Jofephus after by Herod called Julias. But whether this Betaraphtha were corrupted from Beth-haram, or from Beth-Aramatha (of which Aramatha there is mention in (c) Jofephus) or from Beth-Rumpha (of which Rumpha an Idol of those Countries, we read, Abf. 7. 43. and to which Junius refers the name of the City Rephan, 1 Maacchab. 37.) of this question it were hard to resolve. But touching Julias (according to Jofephus, sometime Betaraphtha) the same Jofephus placeth in the Region of Persea, beyond Jordan, which Regio Persea, as the Greek word signifieth, is no more than Regio ulterior, the Country beyond the River; and therefore they which labour to fet down the bounds of this Perea, take more pains than needs. Fourteen Villages this Julias had belonging unto it, according to Josephus. He makes it to have been built by Herod Antipas, and named Julias, in honour of the adoption of Livia Augustus his wife into the Julian Family; by which adoption she was called Julia. Another Julias, he faith was built by Philip the brother of Herod, in the lower Gaulanitis, which, he faith, is the same as Bethsaida.

Ant. 20. 11.
Jof. ant. 18. 3.
Jof. Scil. Judg. v. 8.

Upon the Sea of Galilee, near to Julias in Perea, (that is, in the Region over Jordan) they finde Peteezobra, as it is called in Iosephus, for Beth-esab, which is as much as domus 3. 9. p. 1. de Bell.
to hissopi. A noble woman of this City, which for safeguard in the time of War with the Jude. d. 7. c. 8.
Romans, came with many others into Hiernsalem, and was there besieged. Iosephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable History; how for hunger she eat her own childe, with other tragical accidents hereupon ensuing.

Of Succoth (which we said Jos. 13. is placed with Ben-haran, in the Valley of the Kingdom of Sebon) it is plain by the story of Gideon that it is neer unto Jordan: where it is Judg. 8. 5. said, that as he was past Jordan with his three hundred, wearie in the pursuit of Zobab and Zalmunhar, he requested relief of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gideon's return were by him tortured, as it seems under a threshing-Car or Tribulum, between which and their flesh he put Thorns to teare their flesh as 2 Sam. 12. 31. they were preft and trod under the Tribulum, and after which sort also David used some of the Ammonites, though not with Thorns, but with Iron teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Succoth, which signifieth such Tabernacles as were made in haste, either for Men or Cattell, Moser, Gen. 33. 17. witnesseth that the original of the name was from such harbours, which Jacob in his return from Mesopotamia built in that place: as also the place beyond the Red Sea, where the children of Israel, as they came from Rameses in Egypt, had their first Station, was upon like reason called Succoth: becaufe there they set up their first Tabernacles or Tents: which they used after for forty yeers in the Wildernesse. In remembrance whereof the Feast of Succoth, or Tabernacles, was instituted. Exod. 12. 5. Levit. 23. 43.

30 Other four Cities of Gad are named Jof. 21.38. Ramoth in Gilead, Machanaim, Cheshbon, and Jabzer, all of them by the Gadites given to the Levites, of which Jabzer, as Cheshbon, or Heshbon was a chief City of Sehon, whence Numb. 32.1. his Country is called the Land of Jabzer. It was taken by Moses, having first sent spies to view it. In the first of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilead. In latter times (as it may be gathered by the Prophecy of Ezay touching Moab) it was possessed by the Moabites: to which place of Ezay, also Hieremy in a like prophecy alludes. It was at length regained (but as it seems from the Ammoonites) by Judas Maccabaeus: as it is 1 Macc. 5.8. where Junius out of Euphrates, reads Jabzer, though the Greek hath Gazer. For Gazer, or Gazer (as he gathereth out of Jof. 16.3. & 8. and Jud. 1.29. ywas far from these Countries of Sehon, feared in the Welt border of Ephraim, not possessed by the Israhelites, until Solomons time, for whom the King of Egypt wan it from the Canaanite, and gave it him as a Dowrie with his Daughter.

Of Chebon it may be marvelled that in the place of Jofua, and 1 Chron. 6.81. it should be faid to have been given to the Levites by the Gadites, feeing Jof. 13.17. it is reckoned for a principall City of the Reubenites: Adrichomius, and fuch as little trouble themselves with fuch scruples, finding Cashon, 1 Mac. 5.36. among the Cities of Gilead, taken by Judas Maccabaeus, makes two Cities of one: as if this Cashon had been the Chebon of Gad, and that of Reuben diftinct from it: but the better reconciliation is, That it being a bordering City, between Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that ⁵⁰ the Gadites gave their part to the Levites, for fo allo it seems that in like reafon Dibon is faid in one place built by the Gadites, and in another given to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Manachaim, which word fignifieth a double Army, we read Gen. 32.2. that it was therefore fo called, becaufe the Angels of God in that place met Jacob in manner of another Hoaft or company, to joyne with his for his defence: as Alfo Lu. 2.13. we read of a multitude of the Hoaft of Heaven, which appeared to the Shepherds, at the time of our Saviours birth: and fo unto the godly King Ofwald of Northumberland, when he was foon after to joyne battell with the Pagan Penda of middle-England, Peda reports that the like comfort appeared: whence the Field where the Battell was fought, in the North-parts of England, is called Heaven-field. In this City of Maachanathim, David abode during the rebellion of Abshalom: and the same, for the strength thereof, Abner chose for the seat of Ishboeth, during the war between David and the house of Saul.

Of the fourth Town, which was Ramoth in Gilead, we read often in the Scripture, for the recovering of which, King Achab lost his life. Junius thinks that Ramatha Mispha, of which Jos. 13. 26, was this Ramoth in Gilead. Concerning the place where Laban and Jacob sware one to the other, as it was called Gilead, which is as much as a witnessing heap, because of the heap of stones which Laban and his sons left for a monument, so also that it was called Misphah, which signifieth over-looking (because there they so called God to over-see and be witness to their Covenant) it is plain by the place, Gen. 31. 49. That in these parts there was not only a Town, but likewise a Region called Mispha, it appears Jos. 11. 3, where we read of the Chivites under Hermion, in the Country of Mispha, *the Town of Mispha, as it seems both by this place, and in the eighth ver. following, being not in the Hill Country, but in the Valley. But seeing that Jephtha the Judge of Israel, who after he came home from Tob, (whither his brethren had driven him) dwelt in the Town of Mispha, who doubtless was of the Tribe of Manasse, and thence at first expelled by his brethren, it may seem that they do not well, which place this Town of Mispha rather in Gad than in Manasse. By Judas Machabeus this Town of Mispha (whether in Gad or in Manasse) was utterly spoiled and burnt, 20 and the Males of it slain: for it was then posselt of the Ammonites.

Between Succoth (of which we have spoken) and the River Jaboc, was that Peniel, or Peniel, which name signifieth Locum faciei Dei: A place where the face of God was seen: so called for memory of the Angels appearing to Jacob, and wrestling with him there: the churlishness of which City, in refusing to relieve Gideon, was the cause that in his return he overthrew their Tower, and slew the chief Aldermen thereof. To these places of the Gadites, they add Rogelim, the City of that great and faithful subject Barzilai, as it seems, not far from Nabemaima, where he sustained King David, during Abshalom's rebellion. To these they add the Town of Gaddi, Arnon, and Alinies, of which Gaddi, being in Hebrew no more than Gaddita, is ignorantly made the name of a place. Arnon 30 also no where appears to be the name of a Town, but still of a River. Alinies Adrichomius frames of Ammon, 1 Mac. 5. 26. To that the name should rather be Alema, but Judas is mistaken out of Josuephus reads Malle, for this in Alinies: and understanding Malle to be put for Millo, and to be as much as Munitio, (as we have shewed touching the Millo of the Sechemites) he takes this Malle to be Mispha Moabitaram, of which 1 Sam. 22. 3. As for that Mageth which Adrichomius finds in this Tribe of Gad, it is that Mahacath, which Moses notes to be as far as the furthest of Manasse, out of the bounds of this Tribe. So also Dathema, of which 1 Mac. 5. 10. (which Junius takes to be (b) Rithma, of which Num. 33. 18, a place of strength in the Territory of the Ammonites) and in like manner Minnith, and Abel vincarum, though by some they be attributed to the Gadites, 40 or to their borders, yet they are found farther off. For of the two last we read in Jephtha's pursuit of the Ammonites: seated, as it seems by that place of the Book of Judges, the former of them in the South border, and the other of them in the East border, both far removed from the Gadites. But the chief City of the Ammonites was nearer, and not far from the borders of Gad. It is called in the Scriptures sometimes Rabbath, 25 tend with the Conquerors for their ancient inheritance: and as Sehon of Heshon had disposselt Moab, so had Og of Basam the Ammonites, and between them recovered the best part of all the Valley, between the Mountains and Jordan. For this Og was also master of Rabba, or Philadelphia: And in the possession of the one or of the other of these two Moses and Israel, found all those Cities and Countries which were given to Reuben, Gad, and the half Tribe of Manasse. So that though it were 450. years since that these Zamzummins, or Raphaims, were expelled, yet they did not forget their ancient inheritance: but having these two Kings of one kindred, and both valiant and undertaking men, to wit, Og and Sehon, both Amorites, they recovered again much of their lost possessions, and thrust the sons of Lot over the Mountains, and into the Desarts. And as the Kings or Captains of Persia and Affria (remembered in the 14. of Genesis) made way for Ammon, Moab, and Edom: so by that great conquest which Moses had over those two Amorites, Og and Sehon, did the Moabites and Ammonites take opportunity to look back again into those Plains; and when the Reubenites, Gadites and Manassites, forsook the worship of the living God, and became fleshfull and licentious; they taking the advantage, invaded them, and cast them out of their possessions: and were sometime their Masters, sometime their Tributaries, as they pleased or displeased God: and according to the wisdom and virtue of their Commanders.

In this City of Rabba, was the Iron bed of Og found, nine cubits of length, and four 2 Sam. 12, 30 of breadth. The City was taken in David's time, and the Inhabitants slain with great severity, and by divers torments. At the first assault thereof Urias was shot to death, having been, by direction from David, appointed to be employed in the leading of an assault, where he could not escape: wherein also many of the best of the Army perished: and wherein David so displeased God, as his affairs had ill success afterward, even to his dying day. From hence had David the weighty and rich Crown of Gold, which the Kings of Ammon were: or which, as some expound it, was used to be put on the head of their Idoll, weighing a talent, which is 60. pound weight after the common talent. In the time of Christians it had a Metropolitan Bishop, & under him twelve others.

The mountains which are described within this Tribe, and that of Manasse, with a 30 part of Reuben, are those that Ptolomy calleth the hills of Hippus, a City of Cælojyria: and Strabo, * Trachones: the same which continue from near Damascus, unto the Desarts of Moab: and receive divers names, as commonly Mountains do, which neighbour and bound divers Countries: for from the South part, as far Northwards as Alaroth, the chief City of Og, they are called Galaad, or Gilead; from thence North-ward they are known by the name of Hermion, for so Moses calleth them: The Sidonians name them Sibirion, but the Amorites, Shenir, others, Seir: of which name all those hills also were called, which part Judea and Idumæa: and lastly, they are called Libanus, for so the Prophet Hieremy makes them all one, calling the high mountains of Galaad, the head of Libanus. These Mountains are very fruitful, and full of good pastures, and have many Trees 40 which yeeld Balsammum, and many other medicinable drugs. The Rivers of this Tribe are the waters of Nimrah, and Dibon, and the River Jaboc: others do also fancy another River, which rising out of the Rocks of Arnon, falleth into Jordan.

§. VI.

Of the Ammonites, part of whose Territories the Gadites won from Og, the King of Basam.

THIS Tribe of Gad posselt half the Country of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, had that part of Arabia Petræa called Nabatheæ, as well within as 50 without the Mountains of Gilead: though at this time when the Gadites wan it, it was in the possession of Sehon and Og, Amorites: and therefore Moses did not expell the Ammonites, but the Amorites, who had thrust the issues of Lot over the mountains Trachones, or Gilead, as before. After the death of Orthoniel the first Judge of Israel, the Ammonites joyned with the Moabites against the Hebrews, and so continued long. Jephtha 1 Jud. 11, Judge of Israel had a great conquest over one of the Kings of Ammon, but his name is omitted. In the time of Sanniel they were at peace with them again.

Afterward we find that cruell King of the Ammonites, called Nahas: who besieging Jabes Gilead, gave them no other conditions but the pulling out of their right eyes. 1 Sam. 31

The

The reason why he tendred so hard a composition, was (besides this desire to bring shame upon Israel) because those Gileadites using to carry a Target on their left arms, which could not but shadow their left eyes, should by losing their right, be utterly disabled to defend themselves: but Saul came to their rescue, and delivered them from that danger. This Nabab, as it may seem, became the confederate of David, having friended him in Saul's time, though Josephus thinks that this Nabab was slain in the battell, when Saul raised the siege of Jabes, who affirmeth that there were three Kings of the Mobabites of that name.

Hannu succeeded Nabab: to whom when David sent to congratulate his establishment, and to confirm the former friendship which he had with his father, he most contemptuously and proudly cut of the Ambassadors garments to the knees, and shaved the half of their beards. But afterward, notwithstanding the aids received from the Aramites, subject to Adadazer, and from the Reguli of Rehob, and Maacah, and from Istob, yet all those Arabians, together with the Ammonites, were overturned: their chief City of Rabba, after Philadelphia, was taken; the Crown which weighed a talent of gold, was set on David's head; all such as were prisoners, David executed with strange severity; for with saws and harrows he tare them in pieces, and cast the rest into lime-kills. Jo- and Sidon, in Japhat governing Juda, they afflicted the Mobabites their neighbours against him, and perished together. Ofias made them Tributaries, and they were again by Jotham enforced to continue that tribute, and to increase it, to wit, a hundred talents of silver, ten thousand measures of wheat, and ten thousand of barley: which the Ammonites continued two years.

The fifth King of the Ammonites, of whose name we read, was Baalis the confederate of Zedekia: after whose taking by Nabuchodonosor, Baalis sent Ismael, of the blood of the Kings of Juda, to flay Gedaliah, who served Nabuchodonosor.

§. VII.

Of the other half of Manasse.

The rest of the Land of Gilead, and of the Kingdom of Og in Basán, with the land of Hus and Argob, or Trachonitis (wherein also were part of the small Territories of Batania, Galulitis, Gessuri, Machati, and Auranitis) was given to the half Tribe of Manasse over Jordan; of which those three later Provinces deniended themselves against them for many ages. But Batania Pholomy setteth farther off, and to the North-East, as a skirt of Arabia the Desert: and all those other Provinces before named with Petra, as Thibithis and Iuræa, he nameth but as part of Calosyria; as far South as Rabba, or Philadelphia: likewise all the rest which belonged to Gad, and Reuben, having the Land near the Dead Sea, he makes a part of Arabia Petraea: for many of these small Kingdoms take not much more ground than the Country of Kent.

Basán, or, after the Septuagint, Basaniitis, stretcheth it self from the River of Jaboc to the East to the Tribe of the (a) Machati and Gessuri: and from the mountains to Jordan, a Region exceeding fertile; by reason whereof it abounded in all sorts of Cattell. It had also the goodliest woods of all that part of the world: especially of oaks, which bare mast (of which the Prophet Zacharias; Howle, O ye oaks of Basán) and by reason hereof they bred so many swine, as (b) 20000 in one herd were carried headlong into the Sea, by the unclean spirits which Christ had cast out of one of the Gadarens. It had in it 60. Cities walled and defended: all which, after Og and his sons were slain, Jair, defended of Manasse, conquered, and called the Country after his own name, Avoth Jair, or the Cities of Jair.

The principall Cities of this half Tribe (for I will omit the rest) are these, Pella, sometimes (c) Butis, otherwise Berenice; by Seleucus King of Syria, it is said to have been called so it is gathered Pella, after the name of that Pella in Macedon: in which both Philip the Father, and his Son, Alexander the great, were born. It was taken, and in part demolished by Alexander jannæus, King of the Jews, because it refused to obey the Jews laws: but it was repaired by Pompey, and annexed to the Government of Syria. It is now but a Village, with Niger. Carnaim, by the River of Jaboc, taken by (d) Judas Maccabæus: where he fell. 4. 11. 5. & 6.

a So they call them of Machath, which Machath somewhat hath been spoken toward the end of the fifth Paragraph of this Chapter, see the 1. Mac. 5. 26. and Deut. 2. 14. and 3. 13. b Mar. 5. 13. c Anciently, as it seems, it was called Tephel. See above in the bounds of Manasse, in this Chapter, Sect. 4. 11. 2. d 1. Mac. 5.

set on fire the (e) Temple of their Idols: together with all those that fled thereunto for Sanctuary; and neer it they place the Castle of Carnion, of which 2. Mac. 12. 22. Then the strong City of (f) Ephron neer Jordan: which refusing to yeeld passage to (g) Judas Maccabæus, was forced by him by assault, and taken and burnt with great slaughter.

Jabes Gilead, or Jabesut, was another of the Cities of this half Tribe, which being beleiged by Nabab (b) King of the Ammonites, was delivered by Saul, as is (i) Jewell where mentioned. In memory whereof these Citizens (k) recovered, embalmed and buried the bodies of Saul and his sons: which hung despoightfully over the walls of Bothsan, or Sethopolis. (l) Gaddara, or Gadara, is next to be named, seated by Pliny on a Hill neer the River Hieromiacæ, which River Ortelius seems to think to be Jaboc. At the foot of the Hill there spring forth also hot baths, as at Maachærus. Alexander Jannæus after ten months siege, wan it, and subverted it. Pompey restored it: and Gabinus (m) made it one of the five Courts of Justice in Palestine. Hiersalem being the first, Gadara the second, Emath, or Amathus the third, Hierico and Sephora in Galile, the fourth and fifth. The Citizens impatiently bearing the tyranny of Herod, furnished Acalonitis, accused him to Julius Cæsar of many crimes: but perceiving that they could not prevail, and that Herod was highly favoured of Cæsar, fearing the terrible (n) revenge of Herod, they slew themselves: some by strangling, others by leaping over high Towers, others by drowning themselves.

To the East of Gadara they place Sebei (o) in which, Jos. ant. 5. 13. faith, Jephtha was buried: whence others reading with the Vulgar, Jud. 1. 2. 7. Sepultus est in Croitate sua Gilead, (for in una Croitate Gilead) imagine Gilead to be the name of a City, and to be the same with Sebei. In like manner following the Vulgar, 1. Mac. 5. 26. where it readeth Casphor for Chebron; the same Adrichomius imagineth it to be ampla & firma Gilebaditarum Croitas: so of one City Herbon, or Chebron, which they call Esfebon, the chief City of Sehon, in the Tribe of Reuben, he imagineth two more: This Casphor in Manasse, and a City in Gad which he calleth Carbon, of which we have admonished the Reader heretofore. Of Gamala (so called, because the Hill on which it stood, was in fashion like the back of a Camell) which Josephus placeth not far from Gadara, in the lower Gaulanitis over against Taricheæ, which is on the West side of the Sea or Lake of Tiberias, see this Josephus in the fourth book of the Jewish war: where he describes the place by nature to be almost invincible: and in the storie of the siege, shewes how Vespasian with much danger of his own person, entering it, was at first repulst, with other very memorable accidents: and how at length, after the coming of Titus when it was taken, many leaping down the rocks with their wives and children, to the number of five thousand, thus perished: besides four thousand slain by the Romans: so that none escaped, save only two women that hid themselves.

About four miles West from Gadara, and as much East from Tiberias (which is on the other side of the Lake) Josephus placeth Hippus, or Hippene, whence Ptolomie gives the names to the hills that compass the plains in which it standeth: so that it may seem to have been of no small note. It is seated far from the hill Country: on the East of the Lake, as also Pliny noteth lib. 5. cap. 15. It was restored by Pompey: after by Augustus added to Herods Tetrarchie: it was wasted by the Jews, in the beginning of their rebellion: when by many massacres of their Nation, they were enraged against their borders.

The next City of note, but of more ancient fame, is Edrebi, or Edrai, wherein Og of another King of Basán chiefly abode, when Moses and Israel invaded him: and neer unto this Edrebi his Regall City, it was that he lost the battell and his life. It stood in S. Hieronims time: and had the name of Adar, or Adara. Not far from these townes neer Jordan, in a valley, stood Gersa, or Gergeffa, inhabited by the Gergeffes, defended of the fifth son of Canaan. Of these Gergeffes we read Mat. 8. 28. that Christ coming from the other side of the Lake of Tiberias, landed in their coasts: where casting the Devils out of the possessed, he permitted them to enter into the herd of Hogges: in which story, for Gergeffes, or Gergeffus, S. Luke and S. Marke have Gadarens: not as if these were all one (for Gergeffa, or Gervafa is a distinct Towne in these parts from Gadara) but the bounds being confounded, and the Cities neighbours, either might well be named in this story. This City received many changes and calamities: of which Josephus hath often mentioned.

tion. For besides other adventures, it was taken by L. Annus, Lieutenant to Vespasian: and 1000. of the ablest young men put to the sword, and the City burnt. In the year 1120. it was rebuilt by Baldwine King of Damascus: and in the same year recovered by Baldwine de Burgo King of Jerusalem: and by him utterly razed. Neer unto Gerasa is the village of Magedan, or, after the Syriack, Magedu, or, after the Greek, Magdala, where the Tharisees and Sadducees desired of our Saviour a signe from Heaven: the same place, or some adjoining to it, which S. Mark calleth Dalmanutha. By the circumstances of which story it appears, that this coast lay between the Lake of Tiberias and the Country of Decapolis. Brochard makes both these places to be one; and finds it to be Phiale, the fountain of Jordan, according to Iosephus: but this Phiale is too far from the Sea of Galilee, and from Bethsaida, to be either Magdala or Dalmanutha. For as it appears by the story, not far hence, towards the North, was the Desart of Bethsaida, where Christ filled 5000. people with the five barley loaves and two fishes.

On the North of this Bethsaida, they place Julias, not that which was built by Herod, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the Region Trachonitis towards the South. It was sometime a Village, and not long after the birth of Christ, it was compassed with a wall by Philip the Tetrarch of Iturea and Trachonitis: and after the name of Julia, the wife of Tiberias, called Julias, as hath been further spoken in the Tribe of Gad: where it was noted that Iosephus makes this Julias to be the same as Bethsaida. Upon the East side of the same Lake of Tiberias stands Corozaim, or Corazin, of which Christ in Matth. 23: Woe be unto thee Corazin.

But the principall City of all these in ancient time was Asteroth: sometime peopled with the Giants Raphaim: and therefore the Countrey adjoining called the Land of Giants, of whose race was Og King of Basan. In Genesis this City is called Asteroth of Carnaim, whence 1 Mac. 5. 26. it is called simply Carnaim, as Jos. 13. 21 it is called Asteroth, without the addition of Carnaim. The word Carnaim signifieth a pair of Horns, which agree well with the name of their Idoll Asteroth, which was the image of a sheep, as it is elsewhere noted, that Asteroth in Deuteronomy signifieth sheep. Others, from the ambiguity of the Hebrew take Karnaim to have been the name of the people which inhabited this City: and expound it heros * radiantes. For of old the Raphai which inhabited this City (Gen. 14. 5.) were Giant-like men, as appears by comparing the words Deut. 3. 11. Og ex residuo gigantum, with the words Jos. 13. 12. Og ex reliquiis Raphaim: but if the Karnaim (or Carnajim) were these Raphai, the word would not have been in the duall number: neither would Moses in the place of Genesis have said the Raphai in Asteroth of the Karnaim, but either the Raphai in Asteroth of the Raphai, or some other way fittest for periphrasis: for this naming of both thus in the same clause, distinguisheth one from the other.

Not far from Asteroth, Adricomius out of Brochard and Breidenbachius placeth Cedar in the way out of Syria into Galilee, foure miles from Corazin. This City (saith he) is remembered in the Canticles, and in the book of Judith, and there are that of this City understand David in his 120. Psalme: and here the Sepulchre of Job is yet to be seen, saith Breidenbach.

Now concerning the Texts which he citeth, it is so that the Greek hath Galaad instead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth use in that place of Judith, and joyneth Carmel and Galilee. The Canticles and the 120. Psalme do rather prove that Cedar was not hereabout, than any way help Adricomius. For that they speake of Scenite Cedarim, it is apparent, and as evident by the place in the Canticles, that they were decoloris, much more than any under the Climates of the Land of Canaan: whence Junius out of Lampridius and Pliny placeth them in Arabia Petraea, far from these parts. Touching the Sepulchre of Job, it is certain that the Arabians and Saracens (holding those places) so faine many things to abuse the Christians, and to get money. Further, it may well be affirmed, that many (if not all) the historical circumstances of Job are so obscure, that we should rather by finding his Country seeke to get some knowledge of him, than by any presumptions founded upon him, inferre what his Country was, and build unto him a City by conjecture.

Of Job himself, whether he was the same Jobab remembered in the 36. of Genesis, descended from Esaie King also of Idumaea, though Rupertus, Lyrannus, Oleaster, and Belarmine are of another opinion, yet Saint Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostome, and Gregory with with Athanasius, Hippolitus, Irenaeus, Eusebius Emisenus, Apollinaris, Eustachius, and other cited by S. Hierome in his 126. Epist. to Evagrius, take him for the same.

The Land of Hus or Hur, wherein Job dwelt, is from the Greek Osi, which the Septuagint use for the word Hur, translated by the Vulgar sometime Hur, as Job 1. 1. sometime Ausius, as Hierem. 25. 20. This Land is placed by Junius between Palestine and Celofyria, besides Chamatha (or Hamath) under Palmyrene, in the Countrey called by Ptolomy Trachonitis, or Bathanea, the bounds of which Countreies are confounded with Bajan in this half Tribe of Manasser. And that this Land of Hur was thus seated, it may in part be gathered out of the place of Jer. 25. 20. where he reckons the Hushites among the promiscuous borderers of the Israelites, whom he therefore calleth promiscuous, or miscellaneous turbam, because their bounds were not only joyned but confounded, and their Seigniorities mingled one with the other: but of this place the words of Hieremy, Lam. 4. 21. speaking of the same Prophecy, of which he speaketh in the 25. Chapter, must needs be expounded, as Junius reads them, distinguishing the Land of Hur from Edom: O filia Edom, O qua habitas in terra Hutzai; O daughter of Edom, O thou which dwellest in the land of Hur. Now because the Vulgar doth not so distinguish, but readeth, Filia Edom qua habitas in terra Hur; Daughter of Edom which dwellest in the land of Hur: Hence, as it seems, some of the learned have thought that Job was an Edomite, as we have said, and King of Edom, which if they understand by it Idumaea, or Edom, so called in Moses time, they are greatly mistaken, making this Land of Hur to be in Idumaea. For it is very probable that Esaie, when he first parted from Jacob, did not seat himself in Edom, or Seir, which lieth on the South border of Judea, but inhabited Seir far to the East of Jordan, and held a part of those Mountains, otherwise called Galaad, and Hermion, which by corruption the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites, Shenir, for Seir; and from this his habitation did Esaie encounter Jacob, when he returned out of Mesopotamia, who passed by the very border of Esaie his abiding. It is true, that at such time as Moses wandered in the Deserts, that the posterity of Esaie inhabited Seir to the South of Judea: for it is like that the Amorites, who had beaten both Ammon and Moab, did also drive the Edomites out of those parts, who thence-forward seated themselves to the South of Judea, bordering the Desart Param, and stretched their habitations over the Deserts as far as Hor where Aaron died.

Now for this Hur, which gave the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hur the son of Aram, as Junius thinks in his note upon Gen. 10. 23. or rather Hur the son of Nachor, Abrahams brother, the question is doubtful. For my part I rather incline to think, that it was Hur the son of Nachor: partly because these Families of Aram seem long before to have been lost: and partly because in Job 2. 2. Elihu the fourth of Job's friends, which seems to be of Job's own Country, is called a Euzite, of Euz the brother of Hur, the son of Nachor: as also Jer. 25. in the same continuation (though some other Nations named between) where Hur is spoken of, there Euz is also named. Neither doth it hinder our conjecture, that in the place of Job 2. Elihu the Euzite is said to be of the Family of Ram: (which Junius expounds to be as much as of the Family of Aram) for that by this Aram we are not to understand Aram the son of Sem, Junius himself maketh it plain, both in his annotation upon the beginning of his book, where he saith, that one of Job's friends (which must needs be this Elihu) was of the posterity of Nachor (as also in this place he confesseth so much expressly,) and in as much as he readeth not de familia Aram, or Ram, but de familia Syriae; like as elsewhere Laban, who sprung of Nachor, is called a Syrian.

As for the other three of Job's friends (of whom by this note of Elihu his being of the Syrian Family, or of the Family of Nachor) it is implied that they were of other kindreds; as also by the Septuagints addition, that this Elihu was of the Land of Hur, or Ausitis; it is implied that they thought only Elihu to have been of Job's own Country.

Franciscus Brochard the Monke, in his description of the Holy Land in the journey from Acon Eastward, findeth Suetha, and Theman on the East of the Sea of Galilee: both very near to the Land of Hur: whereof the one may seem to have denominated Bildad the Shuchite; the other Eliphaz the Themaquite: two of the three friends of Job, of the which Job 2. 11. But Junius thinks that the Shuchites were inhabitants of Arabia the Desart, descended of Shnach the son of Abraham and Ketura: of whom Gen. 25. 2. perhaps, saith he, the same whom Pliny calls Sacae. So also he thinketh the Themanites, of whom Eliphaz was to have been of Arabia the Dyfa : and Eliphaz himself to have been of the posterity of 1berman the son of Eliphaz, which was the son of Efau. And so also Nabamah, whence Tophar the third of Job's friends (which in this place of Job 2.11. are mentioned) is by the fame learned Expolitor, thought either to be named of Thinnab by tranſposition of letters (which 1berman, Gen. 36.40. is named among the sons of Efau, that gave denomination to the places where they were ſeated) or elfe to be the fame Nabamah, which Job 1.5.41. is reckoned for a City of Juda in the border, as he thinks, of Edom. And yet I deny not but that near the Land of Hur, in Bajan, as it ſeems, in the Tribe of Manaſſer, there is a Region which (at leaſt) in later times was called Sutis, or of ſome like name. For this is evident by the Hiſtory of Will. Tyrus, which reports of a Fort in this Region of Sutis, or Suites (as he calls it diversly) of exceeding great ſtrength and uſe for the retaining of the whole Country : which, in the time of Baldwine the ſecond King of Hieruſalem, was with great digging through rocks recovered by the Chriſtians; having not long before been loſt to the great diſadvantage of the Country, while it was in the hands of the Saraceni. The ſituation of this Fort is by Tyrus deſcribed to be ſixteen miles from the City Tiberias, on the Eaſt of Jordan : by Adrichomius four miles North-ward from the place where Jordan enters the Lake Tiberias at Corazin.

Other Cities of this part of Manasse named in the Scripture are these: Golan, Gebeſſithera, Mitſſa of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the coming of the Iſraelites was called Nobach. Of Nobach or Kenath, and Mitſſa of Gilead, we have ſpoken by occaſion among the Cities of Gad. The other two were given to the Levites, and Golan made one of the Cities of refuge: from which Golan we have both Golanitis ſuperior and inferior, oft in Joſephus. Bebeſſithera is accounted the chief City of Baſan by ſome, but the Writers corrupting the name into Bozra, it is confounded with Beſer, or Bozra of Reuben, and with Bozra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this tract, and hence Hicrom hath Arga, a name of a City placed by ſome about the waters of Merom (as they are called by Joſua) which make the Lake Samachonitis, as Joſephus calls it. This Lake, being as it were in the midſt between Caeſarea Philippi and Tiberias, through which, as through the Lake of Tiberias, Jordan runneth, boundeth part of this half Tribe on the Weſt. When the ſnow of Libanus melteth, it is very large, ſaith Brocard: otherwiſe more contracted, leaving the marſh ground on both ſides, for Lions and other wilde beaſts, which harbour in the ſhrubs that plentifully grow there.

Adjoining to this Lake in this Country of Manasse, Josephus names two places of strength, fortified by himself in the beginning of the Jews rebellion : Seleucia the one, and Sogane the other. In the North side of this half Tribe of Manasse, and in the North-east, the Scripture nameth divers bordering places towards Danawus, as Tfedad, Chauram, and Chatsar-Henan, lying in a line drawn from the West, of which three Cities we reade Ezek. 47. 15. with which also agrees the place, Num. 34. 8. where for Chauram between Tfedad, and Chatsar-Henan, Zipbron is named. From this Chauram is the name of Auranitis Regio, in Josephus and Tyrius, whose bounds (as also the bounds of Geffur and Mabacath, or Macati, which were likewise borderers to Manasse towards the North-east) are unknown : onely that Geffur was of might, it appears in that David married Mabaca the daughter of Thalmay King of Geffur : by whom he had the most beautiful, but wicked and unfortunate Abalom.

CHAP. XI.

The History of the Syrians, the chief borderers of the Israelites that dwelt on the East of Jordan.

§. I.

Of the City of Damascus, and the divers fortunes thereof.

D of the City of Damaiicus, and the ardent journeyer thereof.
Amajcus of all other in this border, and of that part of the world, was the most famous, excelling in beauty, antiquity, and riches, and was therefore called the City of joy or gladnesse, and the House of pleasure; and is not onely remembred in many places of Scripture, but by the best Historians and Cosmographers. The Hebrews, saith Iosephus, think it to have been built by Hus the son of Arax: of which opinion S. Hierome upon Ezay seemeth to be:
 though

though in his Hebrew questions he affirmeth, that it was founded by Damascus the son of Eliezer, Abrahams Steward ; a thing very unlikely, seeing the City was formerly known by that name, as appears by Abrahams calling this his Steward Eliezer of Damascus. David was the first that subjected it to the Kingdom of Juda, after the overthrow of Adadazer their King ; but in Solomons time, Rezon recovered it again, though he had no title at all or right to that Principality : but David having overthrown Hadadazer King of Sophena (otherwise Byria Seba, or Zoba) Rezon or Rezon, with the remainder of that broken Army, invaded Damascena, and possessed Damascus it self, and became an enemy to Solomon all his life.

10 The next King of Damascus was Adad the Edomite, who flying into Egypt from David 1 Kings 11. and Joab, when they slew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphnes the King of Egypt's Wives sister : of whom Taphnes in Egypt was so called. This Adad returning again, became an enemy to Solomon all his life, and (as some Writers affirm) invaded Damascus, and thrust Rezon thence-out. In the Line of Adad that Kingdome continued nine descents, (as hereafter may be shewed in the Catalogue of those Kings of Syria) to whom the Affyrians, and then the Grecians succeeded. This City was exceeding strong, compassed with waters from the Rivers of Abanah, and Pharpar : whereof one of them, prophane Writers call Chryssorboas, the golden River. 2 Kings 5. Junius takes it for Adonis. The Countrie adjoining is very fruitful of excellent Wines and Wheat, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very strong Castle, built as it seems by the Florentiner, after it became Christian : the Lillies being found cut in Herod. 5. Tell. many Marbles in that Cittadell. Against this City the Prophets Amos, Esay, Jeremy, Jer. 49. 19. and Zacharias, prophesied that it should be taken, burnt, demolished, and made a heap of stones. In the time of the last Rezon, and tenth King of the Damascians, Teglabphalaser, invited by Achaz King of Juda, carried away the naturals of Damascus into the East : 2 Kings 16. leaving of his own Nation to inhabit it. After that it was utterly ruined by the Babylonians, faith Hierome upon Esay : which thing was performed by Salmanasser, according to Junius in his note upon that place, five years after the Prophecy. In time it was retored by the Assaceonians, and the Ptolomies ; but long after, when Syria fell into the hands of the Romans, it was taken by Metellus, and Lollius. In the time of the Christians it had an Archbishop : Saint Hierome living, as he affirmeth upon the Aëts, it was the Metropolis of the Saracens : being taken by Haomer their King from the Romans, in the year of our redemption 636. and in the year 1147. Conrad the third, Emperour of Rome, Lewis King of France, Baldwine the third King of Hierusalem, Henry Duke of Aufria, brother to Conrad, Frederick Barbarossa afterward Emperour, Theoderick Earle of Flanders, and other Princes assembled at Ptolomais Acon, on the sea-coast, determined to recover Damascus : but being betrayed by the Syrians, they failed of the enterprise. Geograph. in Cyren. lib. 45. Will. Tyr. de Jacc. lib. 17. c. 13. & 4.

In the year 1262, Halon the Tartar incompast it, and having formerly taken the King, brought him under the Walls, and threatned extreme torture unto him, except the Citizens rendred the place: but they refusing it, the King was torn afunder before them, and in fine the City taken, Agab the son of Halon was by his father made King thereof.

In the year 1400. Tamberlain Emperour of the Parthians, invaded that Region, and beſieged the City with an Army of 1200000. (If the number be not miſtaken.) He entered it, and put all to the ſword, filling the ditch with his priſoners; thoſe that retired into the Caſtle, which ſeemed a place impregnable, he overtopped with another Caſtle adjoining: he forbore the demolishing of the City, in reſpect of the beauty of the Church, garniſhed with fourty Gates, or ſumptuous Porches. It had 50 within it 9000. Lanterns of Gold and Silver: but while he invaded Egypt, they again ſurprized Damaſcus. Laſtly, in his return after three months ſiege, he found it: the Mahometans proſtrating themſelves with their Priests, deſired mercy. But Tamberlain commanding them to enter the Church, he burnt them and it to the number of 30000. and did ſo demolish it, as thoſe that came afterwards to ſee their houſes, knew them not by the foundations. And as a Trophée of his victory, he raiſed three Towers with great art, builded with the heads of thoſe whom hee had ſlaughtered. After this, it was reſtored and re-poſſeſt by the Soldans of Egypt with a Garrifon of Mammalukes: And in the year 1517. Selimus Emperour of the Turks wrested it out of the hands of the Egyptians: in whose possession it now remaineth inhabited with Mahometans and Christians of all neighbouring Nations.

§. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing up of their power.

Now be it that Damascus were founded by Huz the son of Aram, or by Damascus the son of Eliezer Abraham's steward, we finde no relation of their Kings, or Commonwealth till David's time. For it stood without the bounds of Canaan: and therefore neglected by Moses, Joshua, and the Judges, as impertinent to that Story. But were it so that it had some Reguli, or petty Kings over it, as all the Cities of those parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till such time as David overthrew Adadezer Prince of Sophena, or Syria Zoba: the same Nation which P^{lin} calleth Nubai, inhabiting between Batania and Emphrates. Now the better to understand the story of those Syrian Princes, whom soon after the Kings of Damascus made their vassals, the Reader may inform himself, That on the North-east parts of the Holy Land, there were three chief principalities, whereof the Kings or Commanders greatly vexed or disturbed the State or Commonwealth of Israel, namely, Damascus, or Aram, Sophena, or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath Zoba; of which these werethe Princes in Davids and Solomon's times: Razon, or Rezon of Damascus, Adadezer of Syria, Zoba, and Tobu of Chamath. But it seemeth, that Damascus was one of the Cities subject to Adadezer when David invaded him, though when Saul made war against Zoba, Damascus was not named. And as Josephus affirmeth, the leader of those succours, which were levied and sent to Hadad-Iszer from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battell slain with 20000. Aramites of Damascus: whereof, as of the overthrow of Adadezer, Rezon the Commander of his Army, taking advantage, made himself King of Damascus, Adadezer and Adad of Damascus being both slain. About the same time Tobu King of Chamath, or Iturea, hearing that his neighbour and enemy Adadezer was utterly overthrown, sendeth for peace to David, and presenteth him with rich gifts: but in dolo, saith S. Hierome; it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the Holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited: but they for the most part were in league and peace with the Judeans and Israelites. But to return to the Kings of Syria, I mean of Syria as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damascena, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath, or Iturea; to which I may adde Geshur, because it is so accounted in the second of Sam. 15. as joyning in the Territory to Damascus (for Syria at large is far greater, of which Palestina it self is but a Province, as I have noted in the beginning of this Tract.) It is not agreed among the Historians of former times, nor of our later Writers, who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus.

Some account Rezon, others Adad of Idumea: of whom it is written in the first of Kings, that David having invaded that Region, & left Joab thereto destroy all the male children thereof: Adad of the Kings seed fled into Egypt; and was there married to Taphnes the Queens sister, as before; who hearing of Davids death, and of the death of his Captain Joab (whom indeed all the bordering Nations feared) he turned again: and as Bunting thinketh, this Adad did expell Rezon out of Damascus, and was the first of the Syrian Kings. To me it seemeth otherwise. For, as I take it, Adadezer, the son of Rehob, whom Saul invaded, was the Founder of that Principality: and the first of Adads, who forsaking his fathers name, as he grew powerful, took upon him the stile of Adad, the great god of the Assyrians, saith Macrobinus, which signified Oneness or Unity. Also I finde a City called Adada, in the same part of Syria: of which whether these Princes took the name, or gave it, I am ignorant. For Adad-ezer, Ben-adad, El-adad were the same in name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and Eli adjoyned. And that Adadezer was of greatest power, it appeareth first, because it is against him, that David undertook the war: secondly, because he levied 22000. Aramites out of the Territory of Damascus: as out of his proper Dominions: for had the Damascus had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would have given us his name: thirdly, because Syria Zoba, of the most of which Adadezer was King, was an exceeding large Territory, and contained of Arabia the Desert as far as to Emphrates, according cording to P^{lin}: and the greatest part of Arabia Petraea, according to Niger. Whosoever was the first, whether Adadezer, or Adad of Idumea, Rezon was the second: Who was an enemy to Israel all the days of Solomon. Besides the evil that Adad did, the evil that Hadad did, seemeth to be referred to Hadad of Idumea, lately returned out of Egypt: to wit, 23. yeers after he was carried thither.

The third King of Damascus, and of Zoba both, was Hezion; to Hezion succeeded Tabrimmon, or Tabremmon; to him Benhadad, as is proved in the first of Kings: For Asa King of Juda the son of Abiam, the son of Roboam, the son of Solomon, being vexed & invaded by Baasba, the succellour of Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, sent to Benhadad the son of Tabrimmon, the son of Hezion, King of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to invade Israel (while Baasba fought to fortifie Rama against Asa: thereby to block him up, that he should not enter into any of the territories of Israel) who according to the desire of Asa, having received his presents, willingly invaded the Country of Neptalim, and took divers Cities, and spoys thence: Asa in the mean while carrying away all the Materials, which Baasba had brought to fortifie Rama withall, and converted them to his own use.

This Benhadad's Father Tabremmon was in league with Asa: and so was his Father Hezion: for Asa requirith the continuance of that friendship from Benhadad, his son: though it seemeth that the gold and silver sent him out of the Temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Tabremmon invaded Israel, before the enterprise of his son Benhadad, it is conjectured. For Benhadad when he was prisoner with Achab, spake as followeth: The Cities which my Father took from thy father, I will restore: and thou shalt make streets or keepers of the borders for thee in Damascus: as my father did in Samaria. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the argument it self were of much importance) because Tabremmon was father indeed to Benhadad which invaded Baasba, at the request of Asa: But this Benhadad that twice entred upon Achab, and was the second time taken prisoner, was rather the son of Benhadad, the first of that name, the confederate of Asa and Abiam, as before, than the son of Tabremmon. For between the invasion of Benhadad the first, in Baasba's time, and the siege of Samaria, and the overthrow of Benhadad by Achab, there past 49. yeers, as may be gathered out of the reigns of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30. yeers of age to Benhadad, when he invaded Baasba, and after that 49. yeers ere he was taken by Achab, which make eighty lacking one, it is unlikely that Benhadad at such an age should make war. Besides all this, the first Benhadad came with no such pomp; but the second Benhadad vaunteth, that he was followed with 32. Kings: and therefore I resolve, that Benhadad the son of Tabremmon invaded Baasba and Omri; and Benhadad the second invaded Achab, at whose hands this Benhadad received two notorious overthrows: the first at Samaria, by a fall of 700. Israelites: the second at Aphec, where, with the like number in effect, the Israelites laughed at 20000. of the Aramites; besides 27000. which were crush't by the fall of the wall of Aphec. And this Benhadad, Achab again setteth at liberty: to whom he rendreth those Towns that his father had taken from the Predecessour of Achab, but being returned, he refused to render Ramoth Gilead, a frontier Town, and of great importance. Now three yeers after (for so long the league lasted) Ramoth not being delivered, Achab invaded Gilead, and besieged the City, being assisted by Josaphat. The Aramites came to succour and fight: in which Achab is wounded, and dieth that night. After this, Benhadad sendeth the Commander of his forces, called Naaman, to Joram the son of Achab to be healed of the leprosie, and though Elizeus had healed him, yet he picketh a quarrell against Joram: and when Joram, by Elizeus his intelligence, had escaped his plot, he sent men and Chariots to take the Prophet, as is aforesaid. After Benhadad besieged Samaria again, and being terrified thence from heaven, he departed home, and sickneth, and sendeth Azael with great gifts to Elizeus, to know his estate if he might live. Azael returning, smothereth him. Zonaras and Cedrenus call this Benhadad Adar, and the son of Adar: Amos and Hieremy mention the Towers of Benhadad. Josephus writeth that Benhadad and his succellour Azael were worshipped for gods by the Syrians to his time, for the sumptuous Temples which they built in Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their antiquity, ignorant, saith he, that scarce yet 1100. yeers are complete since their wars with the Israelites.

Hazael, or Azael, the first King of the race of the Adads of Damascus, was appointed by Elifba, or Elizeus, when he was sent by Benhadad to the Prophet, to know whether Benbadad should recover his present sickness: He waged war with Joram, who received divers wounds at the encounter at Ramoth in Gilead: from whence returning to be cured at Jesreel, he and the King of Juda, Ahaziah or Ochozias, are slain by Jehu, as before is said. After the death of Joram, Azael continued war against Jehu, and wasted Gilead, and all those portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manasse, over Jordan. He then invaded Juda, and took Gath; but by gifts from Joas he was averted from attempting Hierusalem: for he presented him all the hallowed things which Jehosaphat, Jehoram, and Ahaziah his fathers, Kings of Juda, had dedicated; and which he himself had dedicated: and all the gold which was found in the treasuries of the Lord, and in the Kings house. This was the second time that the Temple was spoiled to please the Adads of Damascus. For Asa did present Benbadad with those treasures, when he invited him to war upon Baasha King of Israel. And notwithstanding this composition between Joas and Azael, yet a part of his Army spoiled the other Provinces of Judea, and slaughtered many principall persons. Lastly, Azael vexed Joahaz the son of Jehu, and brought him to that extremity, as he left him but fifty Horse-men, ten Chariots, and ten thousand Footmen of all his people.

§. III.

Of the later Kings, and decay and overthrow of their power.

2 Reg. 13. 2 Sam. 9. 1. After Hazael, Benbadad the second, or rather the third of that name, the son of Hazael, reigned in Damascus: who fought against Israel with ill success: for Joas King of Israel, the son of the unhappy Joachaz, as he was foretold by Elisba the Prophet, beat Benbadad in three severall battels: and he lost all those Cities to Israel, which his father Hazael had taken violently from Joachaz.

2 Reg. 13. 2 Sam. 9. 1. After this Benbadad the son of Hazael, there succeeded three others by the same name, of whom the Stories are lost, only Nicolasus Damascus cited by Josephus, makes mention of them: and in one of these Kings times it was that Jeroboam the second, the son of Joas, recovered Damascus it self to Juda, faith the Geneva, but better in Junius, 30 Utque recuperabat Damascus, & Chathamam Jebuda pro Israele; that is, And how he recovered for Israel, Damascus and Chathamam of Judea; for these Cities sometimes conquered by David, did of right belong to the Tribe of Juda.

And it is likely, that this conquest upon the Adads was performed: the first of these three Adads then living, of whom there is no Story. For when as Jehoas the King of the ten Tribes had thrice overcome the Syrians in the time of Benbadad the son of Hazael, and had recovered the Cities which Hazael had won from Israel; and so left his Kingdom to his son Jeroboam the second; it seemeth that this Jeroboam without delay, and having nothing else left for him to enterprize, instantly followed his fathers good fortune, and invaded Damascus.

2 Kin. 16. 5. 5. 2. 1. Razim, or Rezin, after Josephus, Rases; after Zonaras, Rasaf the tenth Adad, making league with Pekab, or Phacis King of Israel, against Achaz King of Juda; both carry away a great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Hierusalem; but in vain. Then Adad alone invadeth Elath, and beating out the Jews, maketh it a Colony of Syrians. Wherefore Achaz brought Teglatphalassar against Razim, who took him, and beheaded him, and won Damascus: with whom ended the line of the Adads, and the Kingdom of Damascus: the Affrians becoming masters both of that and Israel. These Adads, as they reigned in order, are thus reckoned:

- 1 Adadazer the son of Rebub.
- 2 Rezin the son of Eliadad, or Razin.
- 3 Hezion.
- 4 Tabremmon.
- 5 Benbadad, who invaded Baasha.
- 6 Benbadad the second, taken prisoner by Achaz.
- 7 Hazael, whom Elisba foretold with tears of his advancement; the same who overthrew Joram King of Israel at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Hazael which preceded Benbadad the third, it is not improbable, because that Hazael which took Geth, and compounded the war with Joas, made the Expedition thirty yeers, and perchance more, more, after the first Hazael which stifled his master Benbadad, and had slain Joram the son of Achab King of Israel. For Joas began to reigne in the 7. yeer of Jehu King of Israel; and after he had reigned 23. yeers, the Temple was not yet repaired, after which (and how long we know not) it is said that Hazael took Geth, and turned his face towards Hierusalem. It is also some proof that Hazael that took Geth, was not the same with Hazael that murdered Benbadad, because he could not at that time be of good yeers, being, as it seemeth, the second person in the Kingdom, and Commander of Benbadad's men of war. To this Hazael (be he the first or second) succeeded.

8. Benbadad the third, whom Joas King of Israel thrice overthrew.
10. 9. Rezin, or Rezin, the last, who joyned with Pekab King of Israel, against Juda, at which time Achaz King of Juda waged for his defence Teglatphalassar.

Now between Benbadad the third, and Rezin the last, Nicolasus Damascus finds three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelve in all.

For the rest of the Princes of Syria, which were but Reguli, as those of Emath, and Geffur, we finde that Tobu was King of Emath, or Camath, in David's time, to whom he 2 Sam. 8. 9. sent his son Joram with presents, after David's victory against Adadazer. Also Senacherib speaketh of a King of Emath, but names him not.

§. IV.

20. Of Other lesser Kingdoms of the Syrians, which being brought under the Affrians, never recovered themselves again.

OF Geffur we finde two Kings named; to wit, Talmat, and his Father Ammibur: to Talmat, whose Daughter David married, it was that Abshalom fled, who was his maternall grandfather. Of the Kings of Sebhena, or Syria, Soba, or Celofyria, there are two named, Rehob, or Rechob, the Father of Adadazer, and Adadazer himself; and it is plain, that after his death the seat of the Kings of Soba was transferred to Damascus, a City better fitting their greatness. After Rezin became Lord of both Principalities. And the race of these Kings of Syria, (which became so potent, and joyned Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the Desert of Arabia, with other Provinces into one, under Rezin the second of the Adads) as it began with David, so it ended at once with the Kingdom of Israel. For Achaz King of Juda waged the Affrian Teglatphalassar against Pekab King of Israel, and against Rezin the last King of Damascus: which Teglat first invaded Damascus, and the Region of Soba, and took Damascus it self, and did put to death Rezin the last, carrying the Inhabitants captive. This was the second time that the Affrians attempted Israel. For first Phul Belochus entred the borders thereof (Menahem governing Israel) who stopt the enterprize of Phul with a thousand talents of silver: for this Phul Belochus, whose pedigree we will examine hereafter, being scarce warm, as yet, in his seat at Babylon, which he, with the help of his companion Abacer, had wrested from 40 Sardanapalus: having besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and strong Prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the King of Israel for that present time. But his son Teglat following the purpose of his father Belochus, and finding so excellent an occasion, as the war begun between Israel and Judah, Pekab commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Rezin being also wrapt in that war, and wasted in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Juda, his imprest and entertainment. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his path towards Israel, he carried it (as is before remembered) and then with great ease possessed himself of the Cities of Nephtalim; leading with him a great part of the people captive. And his son Salmanasser, whom Ptolomee calleth Nabonasser, 50 after the revolt of Hofea, forced Samarina, and rent that Kingdom asunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted; the race and Monarchy of the Syrian Adads in Rezin, whom Teglat slaughtered; the Kingdom of Israel in Hofea, whom Salmanasser overturned; happened neer about a time: that of Ninus in the daies of Belochus, and the other two in the daies of Teglatphalassar, and Salmanasser his son. For Sardanapalus perished, Ofia ruling Juda; and the other two Kingdoms were dissolved, Achaz yet living.

Lastly, the Kingdom of Juda it self, being attempted by Senacherib, the son of Salmanasser, in vain, and preserved for the time by God miraculously, was at length utterly utterly overturned. Hierusalem and the Temple burnt 132. yeers after the captivity of Israel and Samaria: the destruction of Israel being in the ninth yeer of Hofea: that of Juda in the eleventh of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Assyria and Babylon held also the Kingdom of Syria, from the eighth yeer of Salmanassar, to the last of Baltassar, whom Herodotus calleth Labyntus: in all about 200. yeers. After these the Persians from Cy-

363. rus to Darius their last King, held Syria about 200. yeers.
381. Then Alexander Macedon took this among other Provinces of the Persian Empire, and his successors the Seleucide reigned therein, till it became subject unto the power of the Romans, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in possession of the Turks, as shall be shewed in due place. Thus much of the Nations bordering upon the Israelites, with whom they had most to do, both in war and peace, being the only people, whose History in those ancient times carried an assured face of Truth.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Tribe of Benjamin, and of Hierusalem.

§. I.

Of divers memorable places in the Tribe of Benjamin, whercof Hiericho, Gilgal, Mitspa, Bethel, Rama, Gobah and Gibba.

OF the Tribe of Benjamin, the twelfth and youngest son of Jacob, whom he had by Rachel, there were mustered at Mount Sinai 35000. able bodies: all which perishing in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their issues 45600. fit to bear Arms: and these had their Territory on this side Jordan, between Juda and Ephraim: The Cities within this Tribe neereſt Jor-
1 Chro. 8. 12. dan, are Lod, Hadid, and Ono: of which, Lod and Ono were built by Shenea a Benjaminite: they were all three re-inhabited with Benjaminites, after the return out of Captivity, as is mentioned, Nehem. 11. 35. and Ezra. 2. 35. where Adrichomius reading Lod, Hidid, Ono, makes besides Hadid in Nehemia, a City called Lodhadid: This Hadid or Chadid was re-built by Simon Macchabeus.

Samarim, or Tfemaraim, named of Tfemary, one of the sons of Canaan, was another of their Cities: and further into the Land standeth Jericho, one of the Toparchies and the last of Juda, seated in a most fruitfull Valley, adorned with many Palm-trees: and therefore elsewhere called the City of Palms. From the time of Josua, who utterly destroyed it, it lay waste until the time of Achad: in whose daies Chiel of Bethel laid the new foundation of it, in the losse of Abram his eldest son, and built the gates of it in the losse of his youngest son Segub: according to the curse of Josua: in which and other respects, Hof. 12. 14. calleth Josua a Prophet. In after-times it was destroyed by Resphaan, and re-built by Adrian.

To the Southeast of Jericho stood * Halmon of the Levites, of which Jof. 21. 18. To the South Barhaba, of which Jof. c. 15. and c. 18. Then that Gilgal of which there is so much mention in the Scripture, where Josua first ate of the fruits of the land, circumcised all those borne in the Deserts, and celebrated the Passover.

The reason of the name, or rather a memorable application of the Etymology of this name (for it seems by the place, Deut. 11. 30. that the name was known before the coming of the Israelites into Canaan) is noted Jof. 5. 9. Ob devolutionem probri Aegyptiaci, because their fore-skins (the people being there circumcised) were rumbled down the Hill: which from thence was called Collis preputiorum. This Gilgal was also called Giloth, as appears by comparing the places, Jof. 1. 5. 7. and 18. 17. for it was in the borders of Jordan, of which Jof. 22. 13. and Geliloth signifieth borders. It stood (though in some distance) directly Eastward, over against the two Hills Garazim and Hebal: upon the one of which the blessings, and on the other the cursings were to be read to the people, both being the mountains of Ephraim. Further, for the situation of this Gilgal, it is to be be noted, that both it, and Mitspa of Benjamin (of which also we read oft in the Scripture) were seated about the midst of the length of the land of Canaan: for which reason (a) Samuel chose these two places, to either of which he came yearly to give judgment to the Israelites: of which two, Gilgal, (as is said) was neer Jordan on the East side of this Tribe; and Mitspa near the West Sea, towards the land of the Philistines.

The third place, which is named with these two, whither also Samuel used yearly to come, is (b) Bethel: which also was seated in this Tribe of Benjamin. But to return to Gilgal, which was the first place where the Arke resided, after they past over Jordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kiriath-jeharim, and at length to Hierusalem) here in Gilgal it was that Josua pitched up the 12. stones, which were taken out of the channell of Jordan, when it was drie, that the Israelites might passe over it: by which Story, as it is set down Jof. 4. it appears, that the same day that they passed over Jordan, they lodged at Gilgal. At the same Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was that Samuel hewed Agag the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mitspa, whither Samuel came yearly to give judgment, there also were often the greatest meetings held: as that for the revenge of the Levites wife against Gibba, and the Benjaminites, Jof. 20. 1. and another against the Philistines, 1 Sam. 7. 12. Thither also Judas Macchabeus gathered the Jews, (when Hierusalem was possessed by the Heathens) as it is 1 Macc. 3. 47. in which place this reason of their meeting is added; Quia locus orationis fuerat Mitspa and so forth not speak of Israhel. Touching this Mitspa, to avoid confusion, it is to be remembered, that the Scriptures mention four places of this name: Mitspa of Juda, of which Jof. 15. 38. (c) Mitspa of Gilead, of which we have spoken already in the Tribe of Gad. Mitspa of the Moabites, where David for a while held himself, commending his Parents to the King of Moab, 1 Sam. 22. 3. and lastly, this chief Mitspa of the Benjaminites. And as in this place the chief meetings were held both before Hierusalem was recovered from the Jebusites, and also in the time of the Macchabees (as we have laid) when Hierusalem was held by the wicked under Antiochus, so also in the time of Hieronymus, after the destruction of the Temple by the Chaldees, Gedaliah whom Nabuchodonosor left in Jewrie, as Governour over those that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place: until (to the great hurt of the Jews) he was slain by the treason of Ishmael, one of the royall bloud of Juda, as it is Jerem. 41.

Neer unto this Mitspa, the Scripture mentioneth Beth-car, after called Aben-Hezer, that is, the Stone of help: where Samuel pitched up the Piller or Stone, for a Trophy against the Philistines.

Touching Bethel, which (as it seems) was the third place where Samuel held his chief meetings for the ministring of Justice, that it was anciently called Luz, and how it was taken by the issue of Joseph (though it belonged to the portion of Benjamin, as it is Nehem. 11. 31. and Jof. 18. 22.) and how another City called Luz (d) neer adjoining to it, was built by the man of the city which shewed the entrance to the Spies, as it is Jud. 1. and of the occasion of the name from Jacobs vision: and how Jeroboam, by erecting one of his calves here, of Bethel (which signifieth the house of God) made it (e) Beth-aven, that is, the house of Vanitie, Hof. 4. 15. and 10. 5. as also other memorable things of this place, they are so well known out of the Histories of the Scripture, that we may well passe them over.

The Territorie of Bethel, which at the first belonged to the Kingdom of the ten Tribes, from the time of the great victory of Abia against Jeroboam, of which 2 Chron. 13. was taken from them, and adjoynt to the Kingdom of Juda: and so it continued, as appears by the Story of Josias: which performed the Prophecies against the altar of Bethel, 2 Reg. 23. whence those coasts 1 Macc. 11. 34. are called Apherama, which Greek word signifieth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the ten Tribes. It was one of the three Seigniories, or Prefectures which Demetrius in his Epistle mentioneth, as added by him to the Dition of the Jews, out of the Samaritan Country. A part of it, as appears 2 Chron. 13. 19. was Hephraim, which Jof. 18. 23. is called Hophram, belonging to this Tribe of Benjamin.

Not far from this Bethel, in this tribe, we finde three other Cities, often mentioned in the Scriptures, Rama, Gidba, and Geba. Of the name Rama, (b) it is noted already in the description of Ephraim, that there were many Towns so called, because of their town in the confines of the Kingdoms of Juda and Israel between Hai and Bethel, Jof. 7. 2. and 18. 12. b See cap. 9. Jed. 1.

high situation. But whereas they find out Rama in the Tribe of Juda (as it seems, because Mat. 2. it appears that it bordered Bethlehem) and also out of Brochard and Breidenbach make Silo to have been called Rama, and find yet another Rama in Zabulon; these three have no warrant in the Scripture. Of Rama in the Tribe of Asser, as it seems, we have testimony, Jos. 19. 29. and of another in Nephthaliim, Jos. 19. 36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in Mount Ephraim, 1 Sam. 25. 1. which more often is called (c) Ramatba, and 1 Sam. 1. 1. Ramatbaim Jophim: for which the Septuagint have Aramatbaim Jophim, taking the Artic affixed in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they think Joseph of Arimathea Mat. 27. 57. was denominated.

Of a fourth Rama we read 2 Reg. 8. 29. which is Ramoth in Gilead. The first, which is most often mentioned, is Rama of Benjamin, seated, as we said, near Bethel the uttermost South-border of the kingdom of the ten Tribes: for which cause Baalha in the time of Asa king of Juda, fortified it, to hinder those that did flee from him to Asa. Of this Rama, or Ramatba, I should rather think Joseph was that buried Christ: because it was nearer to Hierusalem, and after the captivity belonged to Judea, as it appears, Ez. 2. 26. wherein that it is joined with Geba, it is plain that he speaketh of that Rama with whose stones (after Baalha had ceased to build it) Asa (as it is 1 Reg. 25. 22.) built Geba adjoyning to it: both being in Benjamin. And as Rama was the South-border of the ten Tribes, so was Geba the North-border of the Kingdom of Juda: whence 2 Reg. 23. 8. we read that Josiah through all his Kingdom, even from Geba, which was the North-border, to Beer-sheba, which was the South-border, destroyed the places of Idolatry.

The third City Gibba, which was the City of Saul (the wickedness of which City in the time of the Judges had almost utterly rooted out this Tribe) Adrichomius confounds with Geba, making one of two (as they are evidently distinguished, Ez. 10. 27.) of which word (d) Gibba, in another from Gibbath, he imagineth Gibbath, another City in this Tribe, making two of one. The vicinitie of this City also to Rama of Benjamin appears Jud. 19. 13. where the Levite with his wife, not able to reach to Rama, took up his lodging at Gibba. By that place of 1 Sam. 22. 6. it seems that there was in this Gibba some Tower or Citadel called Rama: where Junius reads in exceſſo, for in Rama: but it may be that the name of the chief place where Samuel with the College of Prophets abode, was Najoth. The great City of Hai overthrown by Josiah, which Jos. 7. 2. is placed near Beit-aven, upon the East of Bethel, was in this Tribe, as is proved Neh. 7. 10. 30. though it be not named by Jos. c. 18. for it was burned by him and laid desolate, as it is Jos. 8. 28. In solitudinem, in tumulum perpetuum. Another City of chief note is reckoned Jos. 18. 25. In this Tribe was Gibbon, the chief City of the Hevites: whose cunning to binde the Israelites by oath to fave their lives, is set down Jos. 9. whence they were reckoned among the * Nethinim, or Profliters, and were bound to certain publique services in the house of God: which oath of faving these Gebonites, broken in part after 40 by Saul, was by God punished by a famine, 2 Sam. 21. 1. This Gibbon, or Gibbon with Almon and Jebai (of both which we have spoken) and with Hanothoth the natall place of Hieremie the Prophet, were said Jos. 21. 28. to be given to the Levites by the Benjaminites. Neer to this Hanothoth was Nob, as appears 1 Reg. 2. 26. where Abiathar the Priest, which was of Nob before it was destroyed by Saul, is sent to his grounds at Hanothoth. It is reckoned in the Tribe of Benjamin, Neh. 9. 31. and though in the time of Saul the residing place of the Arke was at Kircaib-jeharim: yet by the lamentable tragedie of bloudshed, which Saul raised in this place (as it is set down 1 Sam. 21. and 22.) in the judgement of Junius, it is proved that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

Micmas also in this Tribe, Nehem. 9. 31. was a place of fame, of which Ez. 10. 28. 50 where also he nameth Gallim, and Migrom in this Tribe. In Micmas Saul had his Camp, 1 Sam. 13. 2. (when he left Gibba to Jonathan) and there also was Jonathan Macchabaeus his abode, 1 Macc. 9. 73. Of Gilcala in Galilee Jos. 19. 36. makes often mention, but of any here in Benjamin, which they make the natall place of S. Paul, whence (they say) when it was taken by the Romans, he failed with his parents to Tharſis, of this I find no good warrant. Other places of lesse importance I omit, and come to the City of Hierusalem, c Of this Amatba 1 Sam. 1. 1. understand the place 1 Macc. 11. 34. where it is named for one of the three Presbiteres which Demetrius yielded to the Jews out of the country of Samarita: this lying toward the East to Jericho, and Lydda toward the West, and Achora (of which even now we speak) lying in the middle between the two others. A sixth Ramat it seems there was in the Tribe of Simeon toward the South, which Jos. 19. 28. is called Ramat of the South, and otherwise Babalath-bet. d Gibba in construction, that is, Governing a positive rule, is Gibbath: whence the Vulgar out of the Septuagint reads Jos. 24. 33. Gibbath Phineas for which Junius hath Colis Phineas (for this word is oftentimes an Appellative signifying a Hill) but Adrichomius taking notice of this, builds his City Gaba upon this Text, and placeth it in Benjamin, when as the words adjoyned, note that this Hill was in the mountains of Ephraim.

* The word Nethinim, or Nethinim, as is such as dari (as it were a Deo dari) or as Junius expounds it, dedidit: it is used 1 Chron. 9. 1. and in Ez. 46. 12. and Nethinim often.

and

and the Princes and Governours of this City: A great part whereof was in the Tribe of Benjamin, whence Jos. 18. 28. it is named among the Cities of Benjamin.

Of divers memorable things concerning Hierusalem.

At what time Hierusalem was built (which afterward became the Princeſſe of all Cities) it doth not appear. Some there are who imagine that Melchisedec was the founder thereof in Abraham's time. But, * according to others, that City out of which Melchisedec encountered Abraham (in his return from the overthrow of the Assyrian and Chanaanite Kings or Captains, when Lot was made prisoner) standeth by the River of Jordan, in the half Tribe of Manasse bordering Zabulon, which was also called Salem, and by the Greeks Solima.

Hierusalem (whensoever, or by whomsoever built) was a principall City in Josua's time: yet not so renowned as Hazor the Metropolis (in those dayes and before) of all the Canaanites. Adonizedek (whom Josua slew) was then King of Hierusalem. That it was belonging to the Jebusites it is manifest: for how long soever they held it before Moses time, they were Masters and Lords thereof almost 400. years after him: even till David won it: and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Jebusites (the children of Jebus the son of Canaan) built; after whom it was called Jebus. And so much did that Nation relye on the strength of the place, as when David attempted it, they bragged that their lame, and blinde, and impotent people should defend it.

David, after he had by Gods assistance possesed it, and turned out the Jebusites, gave it an exceeding great increase of circuit: it strengthened it with a Citadell or Castle: and beautified it with many Palaces, and other buildings: changing the name from Jebusalem, the City of the Jebusites, to Hierusalem, which the Greeks call Hierosolyma. After David's time, Solomon amplified, beautified, and strengthened it exceedingly. For besides the work of the Temple, which was no lesse admirable than renowned among all Nations, the Palaces, Gates, and Walls, could not any where in the world be exempld: and besides, that it had 15000. Inhabitants, the women and children not accounted, the ditch had 60. foot depth, cut out of the very rock: and 250. foot of breadth: whereof the like hath seldom been heard of, either since or before.

After the death of Solomon, and that the Kingdom of the Jews was cut asunder, Shishac King of Egypt, and his Predecessor, having bred up for that purpose Adad the Idumean, and Jeroboam Solomons servant; and both married to Egyptians: the State by the one disturbed, by the other broken: Shishac first invaded the Territory of Juda, entered Hierusalem, and sack't it, and became Master not onely of the riches of Solomon, but of all those spoils which David had gotten from Adadazer, Tobu, the Ammonites, and other Nations. It was again sack't, and a part of the wall thrown down by Joas King of Israel: while Amasia the twelfth King thereof governed Juda.

Not long after, Achaz the fifteenth King of Juda impoverished the Temple, and presented Eglathphalaser with the treasures thereof. And Manasse the son of Ezekiah, the son of Achaz, by the vaunts made by Ezekiah, to the Embassadors of Merodach, lost the remain, and the very bottom of their treasures. It was again spoiled by the Babylonians, Joakim then reigning. But this ungratefull, Idolatrous and rebellious Nation, taking no warning by these Gods gentle corrections and afflictions, but persisting in all kinde of impiety, filling the City even to the mouth with innocent blood, God raised up that great Babylonian King Nabuchodonosor, as his scourge and revenger, who making this glorious City and Temple, with all the Palaces therein, and the 50 Walls and Towers which embraced them, even and level with the dust, carried away the spoils with the Princes and people, and crush't them with the heavey yoke of bondage and servitude full seventy years, in somuch as Sion was not onely become as a torme and plowed-up field, Hierusalem an heape of stones, and rubble, the Mountain of the Temple as a grove, or wood of thorns and briars, but (as Hierome speaketh) even the birds of the Ayre scorned to flie over it, or the beasts to tread on that defiled soile.

Then 70. years being expired, according to the prophecie of Daniel, and the Jews by the grace of Cyrus returned: the Temple was again built, though with interruption and and difficulty enough: and the City meanly inhabited, and without Walls or other defences, for some 60. and odd years, till Nebemia by the favour of Artaxerxes re-built them. Then again was the Temple and City spoiled by Bagojes, or Vagges, the Lievtenant of Artaxerxes: after by * Ptolomeus the first; then by Antiochus Epiphanes: and again by Apollonius his Lievtenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed, though Craffus in his Parthian expedition took as much as he could of that which Pompey spared.

But the damages which it sustained by the violence of sacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompensed by the industry or bounty of good Princes, the voluntary contribution of the people, and the liberality of strangers. Before the captivity, the people of the Land, through the exhortation of godly Kings, made many and large offerings to repair the Temple of Solomon. The wrong done by Ptolomeus Lagi to the second Temple, was requited by the bounty of his son Ptolomeus Philadelphus. The mischief wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes and his followers, was amended partly by the great offerings which were sent to Hierusalem out of other Nations. Finally, all the losses, which either the City or Temple had endured, might well seem forgotten in the reign of Herod, that usurping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the City, new built the Temple, and with many sumptuous works did so adorn them, that he left them far more stately and glorious than they had been in the days of Solomon.

§. III.

Of the destruction of Hierusalem by the Romanes.

IN this flourishing estate it was at the coming of our Saviour Christ Jesus: and after his death and ascension, it so continued about forty years. But then did Titus the Romane, being stirred up by God to be the revenger of Christ his death, and to punish the Jews sinfull ingratitude, incapable it with a Romane Army, and became Lord thereof. He began the siege at such time as the Jews from all parts were come up to the celebration of the Paschever: so as the City was then filled with many hundreds of thousands of all sorts; and no manner of provision or store for any such multitudes. An extreme famine, with the civill dissension, oppressed them within the Walls; a forcible enemy assailed them without. The Judaeans also, who lay in wait for the destruction of the Jews Kingdome, thrust themselves into the City, of purpose to betray it: who also burnt the Temple, when Nabuchodonosor took it. And to be short, there perished of all sorts, from the first besieging, to the consummation of the victory, eleven hundred thousand souls: and the City was so beaten down and demolished, as those which came afterward to see the desolation thereof, could hardly believe that there had been any such place or habitation. Onely the three Herodian Towers, (works most magnificent, and over-topping the rest) were spared, as well for lodgings for the Romane Garrisons, as that thereby their victory might be the more notorious and famous: for by those buildings of strength and state remaining, after ages might judge what the rest were; and their honour be the greater and more shining, that there-over became victorious.

After this, such Jews as were scattered here and there in Judaea, and other Provinces, began again to inhabit some part of the City; and by degrees to re-build it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and Tributaries to the Romane State: but after 65. years, when they again offered to revolt and rebell, Elmus Adrianus the Emperor slaughtered many thousands of them, and overturned those three Herodian Towers, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himself had foretold; That there should not stand one stone upon another of that ungratefull City. Afterward, when his fury was appeased, and the prophecy accomplished, he took one part without the Wall, wherein stood Mount Calvary, and the Sepulchre of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, he again made it a City of great capacity, and called it after his own name, Elia Capitolia. In the gate toward Bethel, he caused a Sow to be cut in Marble, and set it in the front thereof, which he did in despite of the Jews Nation: making an Edific, that they should not from thence-forth ever enter into the City, neither should they dare so much as to behold it from any other high place over-topping it.

But

But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palestina, it was inhabited at length by all Nations, and especially by Christians; and so it continued 500. years.

It was afterward in the 636. year after Christ, taken by the Egyptian Saracens, who held it 400. and odd years.

In the year 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Buillon, by assault, with an exceeding slaughter of the Saracens; which Godfrey, when he was elected King thereof, refused to be crowned with a Crown of Gold, because Christ, for whom he fought, was therein crowned with thorns. After this recovery, it remained under the Successors of Godfrey fourscore & eight years: till in the year 1197. it was regained by Saladine of Egypt: and lastly, in the year 1517. in the time of Selim, the Turks cast out the Egyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cusnubarec, or the Holy City. Neither was it Hierusalem alone that hath so often times been beaten down and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the World have with their Inhabitants, in severall times and ages, suffered the same shipwrack. And it hath been Gods just will, to the end others might take warning, if they would, not onely to punish the impiety of men, by famine, by the sword, by fire, and by slavery; but he hath revenged himself of the very places they possess; of the walls and buildings, yea, of the soil and the beasts that fed thereon.

For, even that land, sometime called holy, hath in effect lost all her fertility and fruitfulness; witnesseth the many hundreds of thousands which it fed in the days of the Kings of Juda and Israel; it being at this time all over, in effect, exceeding stony and barren. It also pleased God, not onely to consume with fire from heaven the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very soil it self hath felt, and doth feel the hand of God to this day. God would not spare the beasts that belonged to Amalek, no not any small number of them to be sacrificed to himself: neither was it enough that Achan himself was stoned, but that his moveables were so consumed and brought to ashes.

§. IV.

Of the vain and malicious reports of Heathen Writers, touching the ancient Jews.

OF the original of the Jews, prophane Writers have conceived diversly and injuriously. Quintilian speaks infamously of them, and of their Leader; who (saith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Egyptians. Others affirm, that while Isis governed Egypt, the people were so increased, as Jerosolymus and Judas led thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the neighbour Regions: which might be meant by Moses and Aaron: for the name of Moses was accidental, because he was taken up and saved out of the waters. But Justin, of all other most malicious, doth derive the Jews from the Syrian Kings; of whom, Damascus, saith he, was the first: and to him succeeded Abraham, Moses, and Israel. He again supposeth (somewhat contrary to himself) that Israel had ten sons, among whom he divided the land of Juda; so called of Judas his eldest, who had the greatest portion. The youngest of the sons of Israel he calleth Joseph: who being brought up in Egypt, became learned in Magickall Arts, and in the interpretation of Dreams, and signes prodigious; and this Joseph (saith he) was father to Moses: who with the rest, by reason of their foul diseases, and lest they should infect others, were banished Egypt. Further, he telleth how these men thus banished, when in the Desarts they suffered extreme thirst and famine, and therein found relief the seventh day, for this cause ever after observed the seventh day, and kept it Holy; making it a law among themselves, which afterward became a branch of their Religion. He addeth also, that they might not marry out of their own Tribes, lest discovering their uncleanness, they might also be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Egyptians. These and the like fables hath Justin.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as grossly belie them, in affirming, that in the inmost Oratorie of their Temple, they had the golden head of an Asse, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himself, having in the fifth book of his own History truly confessed of the Jews, that they worshipped one only God: and thought it most prophane to represent the Deity by any material figure, by the shape of a man, or any other creature : and they had therefore in their Temples no Image or Representation, no not so much as in any City by them inhabited. Somewhat like this hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Stephanus ; who also makes Judas with Idumea, the first parents of the Jews.

Claudius Iolani draws them from Judeans, whose parents were Spartan and Thebis ; whence it came, that the Spartans or Lacedemonians challenged kinned of the Hebrews ; but they did it as defended of Abraham, saith Josephus. Some of these reports seem to have been gathered out of divine letters, though wrested and perverted, according to the custome of the Heathen. For to have they obscured and altered the Story of the Creation, of Paradise, of the Flood ; and given new names to the children of Adam in the first age, to Noah and his sons in the second : and so to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Moses, and the rest of the Fathers, and Leaders of the Hebrews : all which feignings, as touching the Jews and their originals, Josephus against Appion, and Tertullian have sufficiently answered. For that the Hebrews were the children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth : and so Chaldeans, originally taking name either of Heber, the son of Sale, or else (saith Asomannus) of wandering, as is before remembered. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greek Coan marian, derive the Hebrews or Jews, from Araxen ; having mistaken the name of Abraham, who was the son of Heber, in the sixth descent. Their ancient names were first changed by the two grand-children of Abraham : for after Jacob, otherwise Israel, the chief part were called Israel, another part after Esaan or Edom, Edomites ; at length the remnant of Jacob, being most of the Tribe of Juda, honoured the name of Judas, the son of Jacob, and became Judeans, or Jews : as also for a time in the name of Ephraim the son of Joseph, the chief of the Patriarchs of the ten Tribes, the rest of the ten Tribes were comprehended : but were first rooted out when the Kingdome of Israel fell. The Judeans continued their names, though they suffered the same servitude not long after, under Nabuchodonosor.

The government which this Nation under-went, was first paternall : which continued till they served the Egyptians. They were secondly ruled by their Captains and Leaders, Moses and Josua, by a policie Divine. Thirdly, they subjected themselves to Judges. Fourthly, they desired a King, and had Saul for the first : Of whom, and his 30 Successors, before we intreat, we are first to speak of their government under Judges, after the death of Josua : with somewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about these times.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the memorable things that happened in the World, from the death of Josua, to the War of Troy : which was about the time of Jephtha.

§. I.

Of the Inter-regnum after Josua's death : and of Othoniel.

When Josua was now dead, who with the advice of the 70 Elders, and the high Priest, held authority over the people, and ordered that Common-weal : it pleased God to direct the Tribe of Juda (in whom the Kingdome was afterward established) to undertake the War against the Canaanites, over whom (with Gods favour, and the assistance of Siméon) they became victorious.

In the first attempt which they made, they not onely slew ten thousand, but made Adonibezek prisoner : the greatest and cruellest Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizites. This tyrants cruelty, as elsewhere hath been signified, they returned in the same kinde upon his own head : and so by the torments which he now felt in his own person (before no otherwise known unto him but by his malicious imagination) made him confesse and acknowledge Gods judgements against himself.

The Tribes of Juda and Siméon did also master and possesse during this Inter-regnum (or

(or as some think, before the death of Josua) the Cities of Azotus, Ashalon, Echron, and Hiersusalem, which they burnt ; and the jesusites after re-edified. They took also the Cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriathsepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And although it be not set down in expresse words that any one person commanded in chief over the people, as Moses and Josua did : yet it seemeth that Caleb was of greatest authority among them : and that he, with the advice of Phinees, directed and ordered their wars. For if any think that they proceeded without a Chief, the good successe which followed their undertakings, witnesseth the contrary. And it was Caleb, even while Josua governed, as appears, Jos. 10. 39. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the rest of the Captains : for the performance of which enterprise, he promised his daughter Achsab : which he performed to Othoniel his younger brother after the conquest : whose behaviour in that service was such, as (next unto the ordinance of God) it gave him the greatest reputation among them, and may be esteemed the second cause of his preferment and election for their first Judge soon after. But while those of Juda made war with their borderers, from whom they onely recovered the mountainous Countries (for they could not drive out the Inhabitants of the Vallies, because they had Chariots of Jude. 1. 15. iron.) The rest of the Tribes fought also to enlarge and establish their own Territories : In which war they laboured with variable successe : for as the house of Joseph recovered Bethel, or Luz, from the Hittites, so did the Amorites recover from Dan all the plain Countries, and forced them to save themselves in the Mountains. And now the Israelites, unmindefull of Gods benefits, and how often he had miraculously a-force-time defended them, and made them victorious over their enemies (the Elders being also consumed, who better advised them in the Inter-regnum) did not onely joyn themselves in marriage with the Heathen Nations : but (that which was more detestable) they served the Idols of Baal, and Asteroth, with other the dead gods of the Canaanites and Amorites. And therefore did the Lord God, whom they had provoked with their Idolatry, deliver them into the hands of the Aramites of Mesopotamia, whom Chusshan Rishathaim at that time commanded. But after they had felt the smart of Gods displeasure against them eight years, it pleased him to have compassion on his people, and to raise up Othoniel to be their Judge and Leader : who by God assisted, delivered his brethren from oppression, and enforced the Aramites to return into their own Desarts, and into Mesopotamia adjoining : after which the Israelites had peace forty years, during all the time of Othoniels government. This Othoniel is thought by Jostatin to have been the younger brother of Caleb, for as much as in the book of Judges, he is twice called Othoniel, the son of Cenaz, Calebs younger brother. Others do rather interpret those words [Calebs younger brother] as if they signified the meanest of his kindred. Indeed it is not likely that Calebs Daughter should marry with her own Uncle ; yet it follows not therefore that Othoniel should have been the meanest of the kindred. Wherefore we may better think that he was the Nephew of Caleb, (as some learned men expound it) and as the very words of Scripture seem to enforce. For Caleb was the son of Jephunneh, and Othoniel the son of Cenaz, Calebs younger brother ; that is, he was not brother to Caleb, but his younger brothers son : to whom it was not onely lawfull, but commendable to marry with his Cousin German Calebs daughter.

How long it was from the death of Josua, to the government of Othoniel, it cannot be found : but it seems to have been no short time. For many wars were made in that space against the people of the Land. Lailah was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites ; and the best Writers are of opinion, that between the times of Josua and Othoniel, that civil war brake out between the Benjamites and the rest of Israel, for the forcing to death of the Levites Wife. For it is written, that in those dayes there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his own eyes. And as Judah led the people against the Canaanites during the Inter-regnum, so was he commanded to do against Benjamin, even by the Lord God, whose direction they craved, as wanting a Judge to appoint what should be done ; which sheweth it to have been when Josua was dead, and before the government of Othoniel, especially considering, that all other times wherein they wanted Governours, were spent under such oppression of strangers, as would have given them no leave to have attempted such a civil war, if their power had been as great, as it was in the managing of this action; wherein they so weakened the body of their estate, by effusion of blood, that in many ages they could not bring into the field such numbers as formerly they had mustered against their bordering enemies.

§. II.

Of the memorable things of this age in other Nations: and of the difficulty in the computation of times.

Here lived in this age of Othoniel, Pandor or Pandareus, according to Homæ, the fifth King of Athens; who began to rule in the twentieth year of Othoniel, and governed forty years. He was father to Eriothens: his daughters were Progne and Philemela, so greatly mentioned in fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Thebes: of whose daughter Semele was born Dionysius, or Libet Pater: under whom Linus the Musician lived. In his time also the Cities of Melus, Paphus, and Iharfus were built.

Ida and Dactylus flourished in this age, who are said to have found out the use of Iron: but Genesis hath taught us the contrary, and that Tubalcain long before wrought cunningly both in Iron and Brass. Not long after this time, Amphion and Zethus governed Thebes: whom divers Chronologers find in Ehuds time. But S. Augustine making a repetition of those fables, which were devised among the Grecians and other Nations, during the government of the Judges, begins with Triptolemus, of whose parentage there is as little agreement. Vives upon the thirteenth Chapter of S. Augustine de Civit. Dei, and the eighteenth book, hath gathered all the opinions of this mans progenie, where he that desires his pedigree may find it. Laërtius and Eusebius make him native of Attica: and the son of Elenus King of Elenus: which Elenus by careful industry had fed the people of that Territory in the time of a great famine. This, when upon the like occasion Triptolemus could not perform, fearing the fury of the people, he fled thence by Sea in a kinde of Galley or long Boat, which carried in her Prow a graven or carved Serpent; who because he made exceeding great speed to return and to relieve his people with Corn, from some neighbour Nation: it was feigned by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the aire.

Whether the times of these Kings, which lived together with Othoniel, and after him, with therest of the Judges and Kings of Israel and Juda, be precisely set down, I cannot avow; for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars; to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life: and therefore I desire to be excused, if in these comparisons I erre with others of better judgement. For whether Eusebius and all that follow him, or his opposites (who make themselves so conversant with these ancient Kings, and with the very year when they began to rule) have hit the mark of time, of all other the farthest off and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the Authours themselves, from whom the ancientest Chronologers have borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their own works, but conjecture. Secondly, because their own disagreement and contention in those elder dayes, with that of our own age among the labourers in times, is such, as no man among them hath yet so edified any mans understanding, save his own; but that he is greatly distracted, after what pattern to erect his buildings.

This disagreement is found not only in the reigns of Heathen Kings and Princes; but even in the computation of those times which the indisputable authority of holy Scripture hath summed up, as in that of Abrahams birth; and after in the times of the Judges, and the oppressions of Israel, in the times from the egression to the building of Salomons Temple, in the Persian Empire, the seventy Weeks, and in what not? Wherefore the account of times may suffer examination, the arguments are opposite, and contentions are such, as for ought that I see, men have sought by so many ways to uncover the Sun, that the dayes thereby are made more dark, and the clouds more condensed than before: I can therefore give no other warrant, than other men have done in these computations: and therefore that such and such Kings and Kingdoms took beginning in this or that year, I avow it no otherwise than as a borrowed knowledge, or at least as a private opinion: which I submit to better judgements. Nam in prijs rebus veritas non ad arguendi querenda; in ancient things we are not to require an exact narration of the truth, sayes Diodore.

§. III.

Of Ehuds time, and of Proserpina, Orithya, Tereus, Tantalus, Tytius, Admetus, and others that lived about these times.

After the death of Othoniel, when Israel fell back to their former Idolatry, God incouraged Moab to invade and suppress them: to perform which, he joynd the forces of Ammon, and Amalec unto his own, and so (as all kinde of misery readily findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawn his help from, thereby to make them feel the difference between his grace and his displeasure) these Heathen neighbouring Nations had an easie conquest over Israel, whom God himself exposed to those perills, within which they were so speedily folded up. In this miserable estate they continued full eighteen years under Eglon King of the Moabites and his confederates. Yet, as the mercies of God are infinite, he turned not his cares for their crying repentance: but raised up Ehud the son of Gera to deliver them: by which weak man, though maimed in his right hand, yet confident in the justnesse of his quarrell, and fearing that the Israelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of those valiant Nations, he resolved to attempt upon the person of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguish, he assured himself of the following victory: especially giving his Nation no time to re-establish their government, or to choose a King to command and direct them in the Wars. According to which resolution, Ehud went on as an Embassadour to Eglon, loaden with presents from the Israelites, as to appease him, and obtaining private access, upon the pretence of some secret to be revealed, he pierc'd his body with a Poniard, made of purpose with a double edge: and shutting so the doors of his closet upon him, escaped.

It may seem, that being confident of his good success, he had prepared the strength of Israel in readinesse. For suddenly after his return, he did re-passe Jordan, and invading the Territory of Moab, overthrew their Army, consisting of 10000, able and strong men: whereof not any one escaped. After which victory, and that Samgar his Succellour had miraculously slain 600. Philistims with an Oxe goad: the Land and People of Israel lived in peace unto the end of fourscore years from the death of Othoniel, which term expired in the Worlds year 2691.

In the dayes of Ehud, Naomi, with Elimelech her husband, and with her two sons, travelled into Moab, and so the story of Ruth is to be referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourscore years which are given to Ehud, it was that Orcus King of the Molossians, otherwise Pluto, stole Proserpina, as she walked to gather flowers in the fields of Byzantium in Scitila: or (according to Pausanias) by the River Cephissus, which elsewhere he calleth Chemer, if he mean not two distinct Rivers. This stealth being made known to Pyrithous, with whom Hercules and Theseus joynd themselves, they agreed together to recover her: but Pluto, or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had (as they say) a very huge Dogge, which fastened on Pyrithous, and tare him in pieces, and had also worried Theseus, but that Hercules speedily rescued him, and by strength took and mastered the Dogge Cerberus: whereof grew the fable of Hercules his delivering Theseus out of Hell. But Zeux, as I take it, hath written this story somewhat more according to the truth. For Theseus and Pyrithous, saith he, attempted to steal Proserpina Daughter to Aidonius, King of the Molossians, who had Ceres to Wife, the mother of Proserpina: Proserpina being a general name also for all fair women. This purpose of theirs being known to Aidonius, Theseus and Pyrithous were both taken; and because Pyrithous was the principall in this conspiracy, and Theseus drawn on by a kinde of affection or enforcement, the one was given for food to Aidonius his great Dogge Cerberus, the other held prisoner, till Hercules, by the instigation of Euristheus, delivered him by strong hand. The Molossi, which Stephanus writes with a single (s) were a people of Epirus, inhabiting neer the Mountains of Pindus: of which Mountains

Oeta is one of the most famous, where Hercules burnt himself. The River of Acheron (which the Poets describe to be in Hell) riseth out of the same Hills. There is another Nation of the Molossi in Thessaly: but these are neighbours to the Callopei, faith Phararch in his Greek questions.

The rape of Orithya, the daughter of Erytheus, King of Athens, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Eubud. The Poets ascribe this rape to the North-wind, because Thrace is situate North from Athens. In this time also Tereus ravished Philomela, of which the fable was devised of her conversion into a Nightingale. For Tereus having married her sister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to see her sister, forced her in her passage, and withall cut out her tongue, that the might not complain; perswading Progne his Wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way: all which her brother-in-laws mercilesse behaviour towards her, Philomela expressed by her needle upon cloth, and sent unto Progne. In revenge whereof, Progne caused her onely son Itys to be cut in pieces, and set before Tereus her husband, so drest as it appeared to be some other ordinary food: of which when he had eaten his fill, the caused his head, hands and feet, to be presented unto him: and then fled away with such speed towards Athens, where her Father Pandion yet lived, as the Poets feigned, that she was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo findes to be Daulis in Phocis: and the Tomb of Tereus, Pausanias hath built near the Rocks Mergis, in the Territory of Athens. By which, as also by the name Daulis, where these things to are supposed to have been done (whence also Philomela is called Daulis ales) it appears that it is true, which Thucydides notes by way of digression in his Peloponnesian War, That this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odryse, (as the Poets call him Odrysius) but that Phocis a Countie in Greece not far from Attica, a City whereof is called Daulis, was in Pandion's time inhabited by Thracians, of which this Tereus was King: whence Pandion, to have amity with his neighbours, made him his son-in-law: as it is good to beleve, faith Thucydides, that Pandion King of Athens made that alliance with a neighbour King, from whom he might have succour, rather than with any Tereus, that should have held the Kingdome of Odryse, which was greatly distant from thence. The occasion that the Poets chose a Swallow for Progne to be turned into, may seem to have been, partly because, as Pausanias sayes, Daulide nec nudificant, nec habitant in tota circum regione Hirundines; as if a Swallow, remembering the wrong that was there done to her, and her sister, did forever after hate that place.

Neer this time Melampus (who is said to have understood the voices of Birds and Beasts) flourished, being also esteemed for an excellent Physician. He restored to their former health the Daughters of Prætus King of the Argives, who (as the Poets please) were made mad by Juno: and thinking themselves to be Kine, fled into the Woods, fearing to be constrained to the Plough: for in those Countries where the ground was light, they did use often to plough with Kine.

In the seven and fortieth yeer of Eubud, Tros began to reign in Dardania, and gave it his own name; about which time Phenone the chief Priest of Apollo in Delpbos, devised the Heroicall Verse.

Of the same date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Eusebius makes King of Phrygia: and also of that part of which the people were anciently Maones. Of Tantalus was devised the fable that some Poets have applied to the passion of love: and some to the covetous that dare not enjoy his riches. Eusebius calls this Tantalus the son of Jupiter, by the Nymph Pleta: Dionysius and Didymus in Zeger, give him another mother. He was said to be the son of Jupiter, as some will have it; because he had that Planet in his ascendent, betokening Wisdom and Riches. It is said, that when he made a feast to the gods, having nothing more precious, he caused his own son to be slain and drest to the banquet: of whom Ceres ate part of one of the shoulders; whereby was signified, that those men which seek after Divine knowledge, preferre nothing on earth before it: no not the care of their own children, of all else the most dearest. And where it was devised, that he had always Water and Fruit offered to his lips, and yet suffered the torment of hunger and thirst, it was meant thereby, that though he abounded (by reason of his riches) in all delicacy of the world, yet his minde being otherwise, and to higher desires transported, he enjoyed no pleasure at all by the rest. Of whom Ovid:

Quærit

Quærit aquas in aquis, & poma fugacia captat
Tantalus, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here Tantalus in water seeks for water, and doth misse
The fleeting fruit he catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This punishment, they say, was inflicted upon him, for that he discovered the secrets of the gods: that is, because he taught wisdom and vertue to mortall men: which Seneca Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly exprest in Verse. Others expound this fable otherwise, and say, That Tantalus, though he excelled in riches, yet being thirsty of more abundance, was never satisfied. Of whom Horace against covetousnesse.

Tantalus à labris sitiens fugientia captat Flumina; quid rides? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The thirsting Tantalus doth catch at streams that from him flee.
Why laughst thou? the name but chang'd, the tale is told of thee.

Others conceive, where it is feigned of Tantalus, that he gave the Nectar and Ambrosia of the gods to vain and unworthy men, that he was therefore by them in that sort punished. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus:

Immortalitatem quid furatus,
Coetantis convivis
Nectar Ambrosiamque dedit.

Because that stealing immortality,
He did both Nectar and Ambrosia give
To guests of his own age, to make them live.

Whereby it was meant, that the secrets of Divinity ought not to be imparted to the unpure Vulgar. For as the cleancest meats in a soule stomach, are therein corrupted, so the most high and reserved mysteries are often perverted by an unclean and defiled minde.

To you it is given (faith Christ in Mark) to know the mysterie of the Kingdom of God, but unto them that are without, all things be done in parables. So it is said of him, that he expounded all things to his Disciples apart. And therefore doth Gregory Nazianzene infer upon a place of S. Paul: Quod si Paulo licuisset effari ea, quorum ipsi cognitionem celum vertitum & usque ad illud progressio suppeditavit, fortasse de Deo, nobis aliquid amplius constaret; If Paul might have uttered the things, the knowledge whereof the third Heavens, and his going thither, did bring unto him, peradventure we might know somewhat more of God.

Pythagoras, faith Revelin, thought it not the part of a wife man, Asino lyram exponere, aut mysteria, quæ ita reciperet, ut sus tubam, & fidem graculus, & unguenta Scarabeus: quare silentium indixit discipulis, ne vulgo divinarum arcana patefacerent, quæ meditando facilius quam loquendo apprehenduntur; To set an Asse to a harp, or to learn mysteries: which he would handle as a Swine doth a Trumpet, or a Jay a Violl, or Scarabæus, and unclean flies sovereign oymment. Wherefore he commanded silence to his Disciples, that they should not disclose divine mysteries to the common sort, which are easier learned by meditation than by babbling. And therefore did the Egyptians communicate their mysteries among their Priests in certain Hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their secrets might be hidden from the Vulgar: and that they might bestow the more time in the contemplation of their covered meanings.

But to proceed with the contemporaries of Aod, or Eubud, with him it is also said, that Tityus lived, whom Apollo slew, because he sought to force his mother Latona. Emphorion hath it thus, that Tityus was the son of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloved of Jupiter, to avoid Juno's revenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where she was delivered of Tityus: whose Mother dying, and himself therein nourished, he was therefore called the son of the earth. Pausanias speaking of the grave of this Giant, affirms, that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lie of his stature out of Homæ:

Nine furlongs ſtrecht lies Tityus, who for his wicked deeds,
The hungry Birds with his renewing liver daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; That Apollo killing this cruell and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a City in Phock, it was ſeigned by the Poets, to the terrour of others, That he was ſtill eaten in Hell by birds, and yet ſtill lived, and had his fleſh renewed.

Admetus, King of Ibeſſaly, lived alſo in this age, whom it is ſaid that Apollo firſt ſerved as a Herd-man, and afterward, for his excellent wit, was by him advanced; but having ſlain Hyacinthus, he croſt the Hellespont, and fled into Phrygia: where, together with Nepheus, he was entertained by Laomedon, and got his bread by working in brick, for building of the walls of Troy, not by making the bricks leap into their places by playing on his Harp: according to him in Ovid, which ſaith:

*Ilion aſpicias, firmataque turribus altis

Strong Ilion thou ſhalt ſee with walls and towers high,
Built with the harp of wife Apollo's Harmony.

Thus the Poets: but others, that he laboured with his hands, as hired in this work, And that he alſo laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megarians witneſſe, ſaith Panſanias.

Cecrops, the ſecond of that name, and 7. King of Athens, and Arifſtus the 13. or, after Eufebius, the 14. King of the Argives, began alſo their reigns, as it is ſaid, in the time of this Judge: of which the firſt ruled 40. years, and the ſecond 31. years. Alſo Bellerophon lived in this age, being the ſon of Glaucus, the ſon of Sifyphus: who inticed by Antea, or Sthenobia, the wife of Prætus of the Argives, to accompany her, but reſuſing it, ſhe accuſed him to her husband, that he offered to force her: whereupon Prætus ſent Bellerophon into Lycia, about ſome affair's of weight, between him and his ſon-in-law Jobates: giving ſecret order to Jobates to diſpatch him: but Jobates thinking it diſhonourable to lay violent hands on him, employed him againſt Chimera, a Monster vomiting, or breathing fire. Now theſe (as the report is) pitying his innocency, ſent him the winged Horſe, Pegasus, ſprung up of the blood of Meduſa, formerly ſlain by the ſouldiers of Perſeus in Africa, to tranſport him; a horſe that none other could maſter or bridle but Atinerva: upon which beaſt Bellerophon over-came Chimera: and performed the other ſervices given him in charge: which done, as he returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambuſh to have ſlain him: but being victorious alſo over all thoſe, he arrived to Jobates in ſafety: whom Jobates for his eminent virtues honoured, firſt with one of his Daughters: and afterward with his Kingdom: after which he grew ſo inſolent, as he attempted to ſit up to heaven upon his Pegasus: whole pride Jupiter diſdaining, cauſed one of his ſtinging flies ſo to vex Pegasus, as he caſt off Bellerophon from his back, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died blinde; of which burthen Pegasus being diſcharged (as the fable goeth) flew back to heaven: and being fed in Jupiter's own ſtable, Aurora begged him of Jupiter to ride on before the Sun. This tale is diverſly expounded; as firſt by ſome, * That it pleaſeth God to relieve men in their innocent and undeſerved adverſity, and to caſt down thoſe which are too high minded: according to that which is ſaid of Bellerophon: that when he was expoſed to extreme hazard, or rather certain death, he found both deliverance and honour: but waxing over-proud and preſumptuous in his glorious fortunes, he was again thrown down into the extremities of ſorrow, and ever-during miſerie. Secondly by others, That under the name of Chimera, was meant a cruell Pyrat of the Lycians, whole ſhip had in her prow a Lyon, a Goate in the mid-ſhip, and a Dragon in the ſteern, of which three beaſts this Monster Chimera was ſaid to be compounded, whom Bellerophon purſued with a kinde of Galley, of ſuch ſwiftnesse, that it was called the flying Horſe: to whom the invention of ſayls (the wings of a ſhip) are alſo attributed. Many other expoliſions are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not unlikely, that Chimera was the name of a ſhip, for ſo Virgil calleth one of the greateſt ſhips of Egeus.

Iona alſo, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquities of their parents) derive their name of Iones, is ſaid to have been about Ehud's time: Homer calls them Jawer, which hath a nicer reſemblance to the word Javan. Perhaps it might be ſo that Iona himſelf took name from Javan: it being a cuſtome obſervable in the Hiſtories of all times, to revive the ancient name of a fore-father, in ſome the principall of his iſſue.

§. IV.

Of Deborah and her Contemporaries.

AFTER Iſrael had lived in peace and plenty to the end of theſe 80. years, they again began to forget the giver of all goodneſſe, and many of thoſe being worn out, which were witneſſes of the former miſerie, and of Gods deliverance by Ehud; and after him by Saugar, the reſt began to return to their former neglect of Gods commandments. For as Plenty and Peace are the parents of idle ſecuritie; ſo is ſecuritie as fruitfull in begetting and bringing forth both danger and ſubverſion: of which, all eſtates in the world have taſted by interchange of times. Therefore when their ſins were again ripe for puniſhment, Jabin King of Haſor, after the death of Ehud, invaded the territory of Iſrael; and having in his ſervice 900. iron Chariots, beſides the reſt of his forces, he held them in ſubjection twenty years, till it pleaſed God to raiſe up Deborah, the Prophetesse, who encouraged Barac to levie a force out of Nephtalim, and Zabulon, to encounter the Canaanites. That the men of Nephtalim were more forward than the reſt in this action, it may ſeem to have proceeded partly from the authority that Barac had among them, being of the ſame Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grievance, which in them was more ſenſible than in others, becauſe Haſor and Haroth the chief holds of Jabin, were in Nephtalim. So in the daies of Jeſha the Gileadites took the greateſt care, becauſe the Ammonites, with whom the War was, preſſed moſt upon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleaſed God by the left hand of Ehud to deliver Iſrael from the Moabites: and by the counſell and courage of a woman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Siſera by Jael the Kenites wife: ſo waſt his will at other times, to work the like great things by the weakeſt meanes. For the mighty Aſſyrian Nabuchodonosor, who was a King of Kings, and reſiſtleſſe, he overthrew by his own imaginations, the cauſers of his brutiſh melancholy: and changed his matchleſſe pride into the baſe humility of a Beaſt. And to approve that he is the Lord of all power, he ſometime puniſheth by inviſible ſtrength, as when ſo he ſlaughtered the Army of Senacherib by his Angell, or as he did the Egyptians in Moſes time: ſometime by dead bodies, as when he drowned Pharaoh by the waves of the Sea; and the Canaanites by haile-ſtones in the time of Joſua: ſometimes by the miniſteries of men, as when he overthrew the four Kings of the Eaſt, Chedorlaomer, and his companions, by the houſhold ſervants of Abraham. He cauſed the Moabites and Ammonites to ſet upon their own confederate the Army of the Edomites; and having ſlain them, to kill one another in the ſight of Jeſophat: and of the like to theſe a volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the Prophetesse ſpeak unto Barac in theſe words: But this journey that thou takeſt, ſhall not be for thine honour, for the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a Woman. In which victory all the strength of the Canaanite Jabin fell to the ground, even to the last man: in the end of which War it seemeth that Jabin himself also perished, as appeareth by the last Verse of the fourth of Judges.

After all which, Deborah giveth thanks to God, and after the acknowledgement of all his powerfullnesse, and great mercies, she sheweth the weak estate wherinto Israel was brought for their Idolatrie by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations, in these words: Was there a shield or spear seen among forty thousand of Israel? She also sheweth how the Israelites were severed and amazed, some of them confined over Jordan, and durst not joyne themselves to the rest; as those of Reuben in Gilead: that the Aserites kept the Sea-coast, and forsook their habitations towards the Land; and the children of Dan, who neighboured the Sea, crept into their ships for safety, shewing thereby that all were dispersed, and all in effect lost. She then cursed the Inhabitants of Meron, who dwelling near the place of the battell (belike fearing the successe) came not out to assist Israel, and then blesteth Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Sisera in her Tent: shewing the ancient affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Family of Heber were inforced in that miserable time of subjection, to hold correspondence with Jabin the Canaanite, yet when occasion offered them means, they witnesseth their love and faith to their ancient friends. Lastly, she derideth the Mother of Sisera who promised her Son the victory in her own hopes: and fancied to her self, and described the spoiles both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, she directeth her praise and thanks to God onely victorious.

Pan-in Corinthi.

From the beginning of Jabin's oppression to the end of that peace, which Deborah and Barac purchased unto Israel, there passed 40. years. In which time the Kingdom of Argos, which had continued 544. years, was translated to Mycene: The translation of this Kingdom, Vives out of Pausanias writeth to this effect: After Danaus, Lyncus succeeded in Argos, after whom the Children of Abas the son of Lyncus divided the Kingdom: of which Acrisus being eldest, held Argos it self: Prætus his brother posselt Ephyra, or Corinth, and Tyrinthos, and other Cities, with all the Territorie towards the Sea, there being many monuments in Tyrinthos, which witness Prætus possession, saith Pausanias.

Now Acrisus was fore-told by an Oracle, that he should be slain by the son of his Daughter Danae: whereupon he caused her to be inclosed in a Tower, to the end that no man might accompanie her. But the Lady being exceeding faire, it is fained that Jupiter turned himself into a golden shower: which falling into her lap, begat her with child: the meaning whereof was, that some Kings son, or other worthy man, corrupted her Keepers with gold, and enjoyed her, of whom Perseus was borne; who when he grew to mans estate, either by chance (saith Cicero) or in shewing his grand-father the invention of the discus, or leaden ball, slew him unwillingly. After this, Perseus, to avoid the infamie of Patricide in Argos, changed Kingdoms, with his Uncle Prætus: and built Mycene. This imprisonment of Danae, Sophocles reporteth otherwise: and that she was inclosed in a brazen vault under the Kings Hall with her Nurse and Keepers. Upon this close custodie Horace hath this witty observation:

*Inclusam Danaen turris abena, Robustæq; fores, & vigillum canum
Tristes excubie nunciant satis
Noturnis ab adulteris:*

*Si non Acrisium Virginie abditæ

The first Kings of the Argives were these:

Inachus the first King, who began to reign in the first yeer of Jacob, and the 61. of Isaac: from which time, to the end of Sibencus, Castor mis-reckoneth 400. years. This Kingdom before the translation, Encheirus accounteth to have stood 544. years, others but at 417. To was the daughter of this Inachus: whom the Egyptians called Isis.

The Contemporaries of Barac and Debora, were Midæ, who reigned in Phrygia: and Ilus, who built Ilium: with others mentioned in our Chronological Table, as Contemporaries with Debora.

§. V.

of Gideon, and of Dædalus, Sphinx, Minos, and others that lived in this age.
Debora and Barac being dead, the Midianites, assisted by the Amalekites, infested Israel. For when, under a Judge, who had held them in the fear of the Lord, they had enjoyed any quiet or prosperity: the Judge was no sooner dead, than they turned to their former impious Idolatry. Therefore now the neighbouring Nations did so

so master them in a short time (the hand of God being with-held from their defence) as to save themselves, they crept into caves of the mountains, and other the like places of hardest access: their enemies possessing all the plains and fruitful vallies: and in harvest time, by themselves, and the multitude of their cattell, destroying all that grew up: covering the fields as thick as grassie-boppers: which servitude lasted seven years.

Jud. 5.

Jud. 6. v. 5.

Jud. 6. v. 7.

Then the Lord by his Angell stirred up Gideon the son of Joash, afterward called Jerubbabai: whose feare and unwillingnesse, and how it pleased God to hearten him in his enterprize, it is both largely and precisely set down in the holy Scriptures: as also how it pleased God by a few select persons, namely 300. out of 32000. men, to make 10 them know that he onely was the Lord of Hosts. Each of these 300. by Gideon's appointment carried a trumpet, and light in a pitcher, instruments of more terror than force, with which he gave the great Army of their enemies an alarm: who hearing so loud a noyle, and seeing (at the crack of so many pitchers broken) so many lights about them, esteeming the Army of Israel to be infinite, and stricken with a sodain fear, they all fled without a stroke stricken, and were slaughtered in great numbers: two of their Princes being made prisoners and slain. In his return the Ephraimites began to quarrell with Gideon, because he made war without their assistance, being then greedy of glory, the victory being gotten: who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterprize) would no doubt have held themselves happy by being neglected. But Gide- 10 on appeasing them with a mild answer, followed after the enemy, in which pursuit being tyred with travell, and weary even with the slaughtering of his enemies, he desired relief from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end, that (his men being refreshed) he might over-take the other two Kings of the Midianites: which had saved themselves by flight. For they were four Princes of the Nations, which had invaded and wasted Israel: to wit, Oreb and Seeb, which were taken already, and Zebai and Zalmunna, which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth, sought the like relief from the Inhabitants of Pennel, who in like sort refused to succour him. To both of these places he threatened therefore the revenge, which in his return from the prosecution of the other two Princes, he performed: to wit, that he would tear the flesh of those of Succoth with thorns and briars, and destroy the Inhabitants and City of Pennel. Now why the people of these two Cities should refuse relief to their brethren the Israelites, especially after so great a victory: if I may presume to make conjecture, it seems likely, first, that those Cities set over Jordan, and in the way of all invasions, to be made by the Moabites, Ammonites and Midianites, into Israel, had either made their own peace with those nations, and were not spoiled by them; or else they knowing that Zebai and Zalmunna were escaped with a great part of their army, might fear their revenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and dispositions of these men: as it is not rare to finde 10 of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of men, especially of those which follow the war, that both envie and maligne others, if they perform any praiseworthy actions, for the honour and safety of their own Country, though themselves may be assured to beare a part of the smart of contrary successe. And such malicious hearts can rather be contented that their Prince and Country should suffer hazard and want, than that such men as they mislike, should be the authors or actors of any glory or good to either.

A place in Ba-sen, as it is thought.
Jud. 8. 10.

Now Gideon, how or wheresoever it were that he refreshed himself and his weary and hungry Souldiers, yet he followed the opportunity, and pursued his former victory to the uttermost: and finding Zebai and Zalmunna in Karkor (suspecting no further attempt upon them) he again surprised them, and slaughtered those 15000. remaining: 50 having put to the sword in the former attempt 120000. and withall he took Zebai and Zalmunna prisoners: whom because themselves had executed Gideon's brethren before at Tabor, he caused them both to be slain: or (as it is written) at their own request slew them with his own hands, his Son whom he first commanded to doe it, refusing it; and in his return from the consummation of this marvellous victory, he took revenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Pennel: forgiving no offence committed against him, either by strangers or by his brethren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his own children found soon after his death, according 10 to that which hath been said before. The debts of cruelty and mercy are never left unsatisfied: for as he slew the 70. Elders of Succoth, with great and unusuall torments, so were his own 70. sons, all but one, murdered by his own bastard Abimelec: The like Analogie is observed by the Rabbines, in the greatest of the plagues which God brought upon the Egyptians, who having caused the male children of the Hebrews to be slain, others of them to be cast into the river and drowned: God rewarded them even with the like measure, destroying their own first-born by his Angell, and drowning Pharaoh and his Army in the Red Sea. And hereof a world of examples might be given both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

10 In the end so much did the people reverence Gideon in the present for his victory, and their own deliverance, as they offered him the Sovereignty over them, and to establish him in the Government: which he refused, answering; I will not reign over you, neither shall my childre reign over you, but the Lord shall, &c. But he desired the people that they would bestow on him the golden ear-rings which every man had gotten. For the Israelites, neighbours, and mixt with the Midianites, used to wear them: the weight of all which was a thousand & seven hundred shekles of gold, which makes of ours 2380. li. if we follow the account of the shekle vulgar. And because he converted that gold 10 into an Ephod, a garment of gold, blew silk, purple, scarlet, and fine linen, belonging to the High Priest onely, and set up the fame in his own City of Ophra or Ephra, which drew Israel to Idolatry, the fame was the destruction of Gideon and his house. Exod. 28. Jud. 8. 28.

20 There was another kinde of Ephod besides this of the High Priests, which the Levites used, and so did David when he danced before the Ark: and Samuel while he was yet young, which was made of linnen onely.

Now if any man demand how it was possible for Gideon with 300. men to destroy 120000. of their enemies, and afterward 15000. which remained, we may remember, that although Gideon with 300. gave the first alarm, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder; yet all the rest of the Army came in to the slaughter, and pursuit: for it is written; That the men of Israel being gathered together out of Nephtali, and out of Asher, and out of Manasse, pursued after the Midianites: for this Army Gideon left in tents behinde 30 him, when he went down to view the Army of his enemies, who with the noise of his 300. trumpets came after him to the execution.

There lived with Gideon, Egeus, the son of Pandion, who reigned in Athens: Eurystheus King of Mycene: Atrous and Thyestes the sons of Pelops, who bare dominion over a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Eurystheus, the Kingdome of Mycene fell into the hand of Atrous. This is that Atrous, who holding his brother in jealousy, as an attempter, both of his Wife and Crown, slew the children of Thyestes, and causing their flesh to be drest, did therewith feast their father. But this cruelty was not unrevengeed. For both Atrous and his son Agamemnon was slain by a base son of Thyestes, yea the grand-children, and all the lineage of Atrous died by the same 40 sword.

In Gideon's time also those things were supposed to have been done, which are written of Dedalus and Icarus. Dedalus, they say, having slain his Nephew Attalus, fled to Minos, King of Crete, for succour; where for his excellent workmanship he was greatly esteemed, having made for Minos a Labyrinth, like unto that of Egypt. Afterward he was said to have framed an artificiall Cowe for Pasiphae the Queen, that she, being in love with a fair Bull, might by putting her self into the Cowe, satisfie her lust; a thing no lesse unnaturall than incredible, had not that shamelesse Emperour Domitian exhibited the like beastly spectacle openly before the people of Rome, in his Amphitheater; of purpose, as may seem, to verifie the old Fable. For so it appears by those Verses of Martial, wherein the flattering Poet magnifieth the abominable shew, as a goodly Pageant, in those vicious times.

*Iunctam Pasiphaen Diteo credite Tauro vidimus, accepit fabula prisca fidem.
Nec se miratur Caesar, longeva venustas Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.*

But concerning that which is reported of Pasiphae, Servius makes a lesse unheighth construction of it, thinking that Dædalus was of her counsell, and her Pandar for the enticing of a Secretary of Minos called Taurus, which signifieth a Bull, who begat her with childe; and that the being delivered of two sons, the one resembling Taurus, the other her husband Minos, it was feigned that she was delivered of the Monster Minotaur, half a Man, and half a Bull. But this practice being discovered, and Dædalus appointed to be slain, he fled out of Crete to Cocalus King of Sicily: in which passage he made such expedition, as it was feigned that he fashioned wings for himself and his son to transport them. For whereas Minos pursued him with boats which had oars only, Dædalus framed sails both for his own boat, and for his sons, by which he outwented those that had him in chase. Upon which new invention, Icarus bearing himself too over-bold, was over-born and drowned.

It is also written of Dædalus, that he made Images that could move themselves, and go, because he carved them with legs, arms, and hands; whereas those that preceded him, could only present the body and head of those men, whom they carried to counterfeite, and yet the workmanship was esteemed very rare. But Plutarch, who had seen some of those that were called the Images of Dædalus, found them exceeding rude.

With Gideon also flourished Linnus the Theban, the son of Apollo, and Terpsichore, who instructed Thamiris, Orpheus, and Hercules. He wrote of the Creation, of the Sun and Moons course, and of the generation of living Creatures, but in the end he was slain by Hercules his Scholar with his own Harp.

Again in this age those things spoken of Sphinx and Oedipus, are thought to have been performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by sea and land, was by the Corinthians Army, led by Oedipus, overcome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles, to those whom she mastered, was meant by the rockie and unaccessible Mountain neer Thebes, which she defended; and by Oedipus dissolving her probleme, his victorie over her. She was painted with wings, because exceeding swift, and with the body of a Lion, for her cruelty. But that which Palephatus reports of Sphinx, were more probable, did not the time disprove it, for he calls her an Amazonite, &c. the wife of Cadmus: who when by her help he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the sister of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despite full part, with her own troop he held the Mountain by Thebes, from whence she continued a sharp war upon the Thebans, till by Oedipus overthrowen. About this time did Minos thrust his brother out of Crete, and held sharp war with the Megarians and Athenians, because his son Androgeus was slain by them. He possessed himself of Megara, by the treason of Scylla, daughter of Nisus the King. He was long Master of the Sea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of delivering him every year seven of their sons: which tribute Theseus released, as shall be shewed, when I come to the time of the next Judge Thola. In the end he was slain at Camerinus or Camicus in Sicilia, by Cocalus the King, while he pursued Dædalus: and was esteemed by some to be the first Law-giver to those Islands.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Anteus the Giant, who was said to have 60. and odde cubits of length, which though Plutarch doth confirm, reporting that there was such a body found by Sertorius the Roman, in Lybia, where Hercules slew Anteus: yet for my self I think it but a loud lie. That Anteus was of great strength, and a cunning wrestler, Ensiebius affirmeth: and because he cast so many men to the ground, he was feigned to be the son of the earth. Pliny saith, that he inhabited neer the Gardens Hesperides in Mauritania. S. Augustine affirms, that this Hercules was not of Greece, but of Lybia: and the Hydra also which he overcame, Plato expoundeth to be a subtle Sophister.

§. VI.

Of the Expedition of the Argonauts.

About the eleventh year of Gideon, was the famous Expedition of the Argonauts: of which many fabulous discourses have been written, the sum of which is this: Pelias the son of Neptune, brother by the mothers side to Aeson, who was Aeson's father, reigning in Iolcos a Town of Thessaly, was warned by the Oracle of Apollo to take heed of him that wore but one shoe. This Pelias afterward sacrificing to Neptune, invited

Jason

Jason to him, who coming hastily, lost one shoe in passing over a brook: whereupon Pelias demanded of him what course he would take (supposing he were able) against one of whom an Oracle should advise him to take heed: to which question when Jason had briefly answered, that he would send him to Colchis to fetch the golden Fleece, Pelias immediately commanded him to undertake that service. Therefore Jason prepared for the voyage, having a ship built by Argus the son of Phryxus, by the counsel of Pallas: wherein he procured all the bravest men of Greece to sail with him: as Thyphes the Master of the ship, Orpheus the famous Poet, Castor and Pollux the sons of Tyndarus, Teleson and Peleus sons of Aacus, and fathers of Ajax and Achilles, Hercules, Theseus, Zetes and Calais the two winged sons of Boreas, Amphiaras the great Sooth-sayer, Meleager of Calidon that slew the great wilde Boare, Ascalaphus and Jalmenus, or Almenus, the sons of Mars, who were afterwards at the last war of Troy, Laertes the father of Ulysses, Atalanta a warlike Virgin, Idas and Lyncus the sons of Aphareus, who afterwards in fight with Castor and Pollux, slew Castor, and wounded Pollux, but were slain themselves: Lyncus by Pollux, Idas by Jupiter with lightning.

These and many other went with Jason in the ship Argo: in whose Prow was a table of the Beech of Dodona, which could speak. They arrived first at Lemnos: the women of which Island, having slain all the males, purposing to lead an Amazonian life, were nevertheless contented to take their pleasure of the Argonauts. Hence they came to the Country about Cyzicus: where dwelt a people called Doliones: over whom then reigned one Cyzicus, who entertained them friendly; but it so fell out, that loosing thereby night, they were driven by contrary windes back into their Port, neither knowing that it was the same Haven, nor being known by the Doliones to be the same men: but rather taken for some of their bordering enemies: by which means they fell to blows, inso much that the Argonauts slew the most part of the Doliones, together with their King Cyzicus: which when by day-light they perceived, with many tears they solemnized his funeral. Then departed they again, and arrived shortly in Myssa, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the son of Elateus, who went to seek Hylas the darling of Hercules, that was ravished by the Nymphs.

Polyphemus built a Town in Myssa called Cior, wherein he reigned. Hercules returned to Argos. From Myssa the Argonauts sailed into Bythinia, which then was peopled by the Bebryces, the ancient Inhabitants of the Country, over whom Amycus the son of Neptune was then King. He being a strong man, compelled all strangers to fight with him at whorlbat, in which kinde of fight he had slain many, and was now himself slain by Pollux. The Bebryces, in revenge of his death slew all upon Pollux, but his companions rescued him, with great slaughter of the people. They sailed from hence to Salmys a Town in Thrace (somewhat out of their way) wherein Phineus a Sooth-sayer dwelt, who was blinde, and vexed with the Harpies. The Harpies were said to be a kinde of Birds which had the faces of women, and foule long claws, very filthy creatures, which when the table was furnished for Phineus, came flying in, and devouring or carrying away the greater part of the victuals, did so defile the rest, that they could not be endured. When therefore the Argonauts craved his advice and direction for their voyage: You shall do well (quoth he) first of all to deliver me from the Harpies, and then afterwards to ask my counsell. Whereupon they caused the table to be covered, and meat set on; which was no sooner set down, than that presently in came the Harpies, and played their accustomed pranks: when Zetes and Calais the winged young men saw this, they drew their swords, and pursued them through the aire: Some say, that both the Harpies and the young men died of wearinesse in the fight, and pursuit. But Apollonius saith, that the Harpies did covenant with the youths, to do no more harm to Phineus, and were thereupon dismissed. For this good turn, Phineus gave them informations of the way, and advertised them withall of the dangerous Rocks, called Symplegades, which by force of windes running together, did shut up the passage; wherefore he willed them to put a Pigeon before them in the passage: and if that passed safe, then to adventure after her; if not, then by no means to hazzard themselves in vain. They did so, and perceiving that the Pigeon had only lost a piece of her taile, they observed the next opening of the Rocks, and then rowing with all their might, passed through safe, only the end of their Poop was bruised.

From thence forward, (as the tale goeth) the Symplegades have stood still: for the gods, say they, had decreed that after the passage of a ship, they should be fixed. Thence the Argonauts came to the Mariandyni, a people inhabiting about the mouth of the river Parrhenius, where Lycus the King entertained them courteously. Here Idmon a Sooth-sayer of their company was slain by a wilde Boare; also here Typhis dyed: and Ancaus undertook to steer the ship. So they passed by the River Thermodon, and Mount Caucasus, and came to the River Phasis, which runs through the land of Colchis. When they were entered the haven, Jason went to Aetes the King of Colchis, and told him the Commandment of Pelias, and cause of his coming, desiring him to deliver the golden Fleece; which Aetes, as the Fable goeth, promised to doe, if he alone would yoke together two brazen hoof Bulls, and plowing the ground with them, sowe Dragons teeth, which Minerva had given to him, being part of those which Cadmus did sowe at Thebes. These Bulls were great and fierce, and breathed out fire: Vulcan had given them to Aetes.

Whilest Jason was in a great perplexity about this task, Medea the daughter of Aetes fell into a most vehement love of him, so far forth, that being excellent in Magique, she came privily to him, promising her help if he would assure her of his marriage. To this Jason agreed, and confirmed his promise by oath. Then gave she to him a medicine wherewith she bade him to annoint both his body and his armour, which would preserve him from their violence: further she told him, that armed men would rise out of the ground, from the teeth which he should sowe, and set upon him. To remedy which inconvenience, she bade him throw stones amongst them as soon as they came up thick, whereupon they would fall together to blowes, in such wise that he might easily slay them. Jason followed her counsell; whereto when the event had answered, he again demanded the Fleece. But Aetes was so far from approving such his desire, that he devised how to destroy the Argonauts, and burn their ship; which Medea perceiving, went to Jason, and brought him by night to the Fleece, which hung on an Oak in the Grove of Mars, where, they say, it was kept by a Dragon that never slept. This Dragon was by the Magick of Medea cast into a sleep: so taking away the Golden Fleece, she went with Jason into the ship Argo; having with her, her brother Abysrus.

Aetes understanding the practices of Medea, provided to pursue the ship, whom when Medea perceived to be at hand, she slew her brother, and cutting him in pieces, she scattered his limbs in divers places; of which Aetes finding some, was faine to seek out the rest, and suffer his Daughter to passe: the parts of his son he buried in a place, which thereupon he called Tomi; the Greek word signifieth Division. Afterwards he sent many of his subjects to seek the ship Argo, threatening that if they brought not back Medea, they should suffer in her stead. In the mean while the Argonauts were driven about the Seas, and were come to the River Eridanus: which is Po in Italy.

Jupiter, offended with the slaughter of Abysrus, vexed them with a great tempest, and carried them they knew not whither; when they came to the Islands Abysrides, there the ship Argo, (that there might want no incredible thing in this Fable) spake to them and said, that the anger of Jupiter should not cease, till they came to Ausonia, and were cleansed by Circe, from the murder of Abysrus. Now they thereupon failing between the coasts of Lybia and Gallia, and passing through the Sea of Sardinia, and alongst the coast of Hetruria, came to the Isle of Sea, wherein Circe dwelt, who cleansed them. Thence they failed by the coast of the Syrens, who sang to allure them into danger: but Orpheus on the other side sang so well, that he stayed them. Only Aetes sent out unto them, whom Venus ravished, and carried to Lylybæum in Sicily to dwell.

Having past the Syrens, they came between Scylla and Charybdis, and the stragling Rocks, which seemed to cast out great store of flames and smoak. But Thetis and the Nereides, conveyed them safe through at the appointment of Juno. So they coasted Sicily, where the Beeves of the Sun were, and touched at Corcyra, the Island of the Pheaces, where King Alcinous reigned. Mean while the men of Colchis, that had been sent by Aetes in quest of the ship Argo, hearing no news of it, and fearing his anger, if they fulfilled not his will, betook themselves to new habitations: Some of them dwelt in the Mountains of Corcyra, others in the Islands of Abysrides, and some coming to to the Pheaces, there found the ship Argo, and demanded Medea of Alcinous: whereto Alcinous made answer, that if she were not Jason's wife, they should have her; but if she were already married, he would not take her from her husband. Arete, the wife of Alcinous, hearing this, married them: wherfore they of Colchis, not daring to return home, staid with the Pheaces; so the Argonauts departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this Island Atius reigned, who had a man of brasse given to him (as some of the Fables say) by Vulcan. This man had one vein in his body reaching from the neck to the heel, the end whereof was closed up with a brazen nail; his name was Talus: his custome was to run thrice a day about the Island for the defence of it. When he saw the ship Argo passe by, he threw stones at it, but Medea with her Magick destroyed him. Some say that she slew him by potions, which made him mad; others, that promising to make him immortal, she drew out the nail that stoppt his vein, by which means all his blood ran out, and he died: others there are that say he was slain by Pean, who wounded him with an arrow in the heel. From hence the Argonauts failed to Argina, where they were faine to fight for fresh water. And lastly, from Argina they failed by Eubæa and Locris home to Jleas, where they arrived, having spent four whole months in the expedition.

Some there are that by this journey of Jason, understand the myserie of the Philosophers stone, called the golden Fleece, to which also, other super-fine Chymists draw the twelve labours of Hercules. Suidas thinks, that by the golden Fleece was meant a golden book of Parchment, which is of sheep-skin, and therefore called golden, because it was taught therein how other metals might be transmuted. Others would signifie by Jason, Wisdom, and Moderation, which overcometh all perils: but that which is most probable, is the opinion of Dercilus, that the story of such a passage was true, and that Jason with the rest went indeed to rob Colchis, to which they might arrive by boat. For not far from Caucasus there are certain steep falling torrents which wash down many grains of gold, as in many other parts of the World; and the people there inhabiting use to let many fleeces of wooll in those descents of waters, in which the grains of gold remain, and the water passeth thorow, which Strabo witnesseth to be true. The many rocks, straits, sands, and currents, in the passage between Greece and the bottom of Pontus, are Poetically converted into those fiery Bulls, the armed men rising out of the ground, the Dragon cast asleep, and the like. The man of brasse, the Syrens, Scylla and Charybdis, were other hazzards and adventures which they fell into in the Mediterran Sea, disguised, as the rest, by Orpheus, under Poeticall morals: all which Homor afterward used (the man of brasse excepted) in the description of Ulysses his travels on the same In-land seas.

§. VII.

Of Abimelech, Tholan, and Jair, and of the Lapythæ, and of Theseus, Hippolytus, &c.

AFTER the death of Gideon, Abimelech his bafe son, begotten on a Concubine of the Sechemites, remembering what offers had been made to his father by the people, who desired to make him and his their perpetuall Princes; and, as it seemeth, supposing (notwithstanding his fathers religious modesty) that some of his brethren might take on them the Sovereignty, practised with the Inhabitants of Sechem (of which his mother was native) to make election of himself; who being easily moved with the glory, to have a King of their own, readily consented: and the better to enable Abimelech, they borrowed seventy pieces of silver of their Idoll Baalberith, with which Abimelech hired a company of loose and desperate vagabonds, to assist his first detestable enterprise, to wit, the slaughter of his seventy brethren, the sons of Gideon, begotten on his Wives, of which he had many; of all which none escaped but Jotham the youngest, who hid himself from his present fury: all which he executed on one stone; a cruelty exceeding all that hath been written of in any age. Such is humane ambition, a monster that neither feareth God (though all-powerfull, and whose revenges are without date, and for everlasting) neither hath it respect to nature, which laboureth the preservation of every being: but it rageth also against her, though garnished with beauty which never dieth, and with love that hath no end. All other passions and affections, by which the souls of men are tormented, are by their contraries often-times resisted or qualified. But ambition, which begetteth every vice, and is it self the childe and darling of Satan, looketh onely towards the ends by it self set down, forgetting nothing (how fearfull and inhumane soever) which may serve it: remembering nothing, whatsoever justice, piety, right or religion can offer and alledge on the contrary. It ascribeth the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the error or weaknesse of the undertakers, and rather praiseth the adventure, than feareth the like successe. It was the first sin that the World had, and began in Angels: for which they were cast into Hell, without hope of redemption. It was more ancient than man, and therefore no part of his naturall corruption. The punishment also preceded his creation, yet hath the Divell, which felt the smart thereof, taught him to forget the one as out of date, and to practise the other, as besitting every age, and mans condition.

Jotham, the youngest of Gideons sons, having escaped the present perill, fought by his best perswasions to alienate the Sechemites from the assisting of this mercilesse Tyrant, letting them know, that those which were vertuous, and whom reason and religion had taught the safe and happy estate of moderate subjection, had refused to receive as unlawfull, what others had no power to give, without direction from the King of kings: who from the beginning (as to his own peculiar people) had appointed them by whom and how to be governed. This he taught them by the Olive, which contented it self with its Fatnesse, the Figge-tree with its sweetnesse, and the Vine with the good juice it had: the Bramble onely, who was most base, cut down all the rest, and accepted the Sovereignty. He also fore-told them by a Prophetically spirit, what should befall them in the end, and how a fire should come out of the Bramble, and consume the Cedars of Libanon.

Now (as it was an easie matter to call those men back whom rage without righted on) Gaal the son of Ebed withdrew the Citizens of Sechem from the service of Abimelech: who therefore after some assaults entred the place, and mastered it; and in conclusion fired the Town, wherein their Idoll Baalberith was worshipped, and put all the people of all sorts to the slaughter. Lastly, in the assault of the Castle or Tower of Tegber, himself was wounded in the head with a stone thrown over the wall by a woman; and finding himself mortally bruised, he commanded his own Page to pierce his body, thereby to avoid the dishonour of being slain by so feeble a hand.

While Abimelech usurped the Government, the Lapithe and Centaurs made war against the Thebans. These Nations were descended of Apollo, and were the first in those parts that devised to manage horses, to bridle and to fit them: inso much, as when they first came down from the Mountains of Pindus, into the Plains, those which had never seen horsemen before, thought them creatures compounded of men and horses; so did the Mexicans; when Ferdinando Cortes the Spaniard first invaded that Empire.

After the death of Abimelech, Tholo of Issachar governed Israel 23. yeeres, and after him Jair the Gileadite 22. yeeres, who seems to be descended of Jair the son of Manasse, who in Moses time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the same after his own name, Havoth Jair. For to this Jair there remained thirty of those Cities which his ancestor had recovered from the Amorites. Of these Judges, because there is nothing else written, it is an argument, that during all their times Israel, lived without disturbance, and in peace.

When Jair judged Israel, Priamus began to reign in Troy, who at such time as Hercules sacked Ilium, was carried away captive with his sister Hesione into Greece, and being afterward redeemed for ranfome, he re-built and greatly strengthened and adorned Troy; and so far enlarged his Dominions, as he became the supreme Lord in effect of all Asia the lesse. He married Hecuba the Daughter of Cisseus King of Thrace, and had in all (saith Cicero) fifty sons, whereof seventeen by Hecuba, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recover his Aunt Hesione, took Helena the Wife of Menelaus, the cause of the war which followed.

Thebes the tenth King of Athens, began likewise to reign in the beginning of Jair: some Writers call him the son of Neptune and Aithra: but Plutarch in the Story of his life, findes him begotten by Aegus, of whom the Grecian Sea between it and Asia the lesse took name. For when Atinor had mastered the Athenians, so far as he forc't them to pay him seven of their sons every yeer for tribute, whom he inclosed within a Labyrinth, to be devoured by the Monster Atinotaur: because belike the sons of Taurus, which he begat on Pasiphae the Queen, had the charge of them: among these seven Thebes thrust himself, not doubting by his valour to deliver the rest, and to free the Country of that slavery occasioned for the death of Androgeus, Mimos his son.

And having posselt himself of Ariadnes affection, who was Atinos daughter, he received from her a bottom of thred, by which he conducted himself through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the Labyrinth, made in all like that of the City of Crocodiles in Egypt; by mean whereof having slain Atinotaur, he found a ready way to return. But whereas his father Aegus had given order, that if he came back with victory and in safety, he should use a white sail in signe thereof, and not that mournfull black saile under which they left the port of Athens: This instruction being either forgotten or neglected, Aegus descreyng the ship of Thebes with a black sail, did cast himself over the Rocks down into the Sea, afterward called of his name Aegum.

One of the first famous acts of Thebes, was the killing of Scyron, who kept a passage between Megara and the Peloponnesian Isthmos, and threw all whom he mastered into the Sea, from the high Rocks. Afterward he did the like to Cercyon, by wrestling, who used by that art to kill others. He also rid the Countrey of Procrustes, who used to bend down the strong limbs of two trees, and fastned by cords such as he took, part of them to one, and part to the other bough, and by the springing up tare them asunder. So did he root out Periphetes and other mischievous theeves and murderers. He overthrew the Army of the Amazons, who after many victories and vastations, entred the Territory of Athens. Thebes having taken their Queen Hippolita prisoner, begat on her Hippolitus; with whom afterward his mother-in-law Phaedra, falling in love, and he refusing to abuse his fathers bed, Phaedra perswaded Thebes, that his son offered to force her: after which it is feigned, that Thebes besought Neptune to revenge this wrong of his sons by some violent death. Neptune taking a time of advantage, sent out his Sea-Calves, as Hippolitus passed by the sea-shore, and so affrighted his horses, as casting the Coach over, he was (by being intangled therein) torn in pieces. Which miserable and undeserved destiny, when Phaedra had heard of, she strangled her self. After which it is feigned, that Diana intreated Aesculapius to set Hippolitus his pieces together, and to restore him to life: which done, because he was chaste, she led him with her into Italy, to accompany her in her hunting, and field sports.

It is probable that Hippolitus, when his father sought his life, thinking to escape by Sea, was affronted thereat, and did receive many wounds in forcing his passage and escape; which wounds Aesculapius, to wit, some skilfull Physician, or Chirurgion, healed again: after which he passed into Italy, where he lived with Diana, that is, the life of a Hunter, in which he most delighted. But of those ancient prophane Stories Plutarch saith well, that as Cosmographers in their descriptions of the World, where they finde many vast places whereof they know nothing, fill the same with strange Beasts, Birds, and Fishes, and with Mathematicall lines; so do the Grecian Historians and Poets imbroder and intermixe the Tales of ancient times, with a world of fictions and fabulous discourses. True it is, that Thebes did many great things in imitation of Hercules, whom he made his pattern, and was the first that gathered the Athenians, from being dispersed in thin and ragged Villages: in recompence whereof, and for devising them Laws to live under, and in order, he was by the beggarly, mutable, and ungratefull multitude, in the end banished. Some say, per ostracismum, by the Law of Lots, or names written on shells, which was a device of his own.

His stole Helen (as they say) when she was fifty yeeres old, from Aphidna, which City Castor and Pollux overturned, when they followed after Thebes to recover their sister. Erasistratus and Pausanias write, that Thebes begot her with childe at Argos, where she erected a Temple to Lucina: but her age makes that Tale unlikely to be true, and so doth Ovid, Non tamen ex facta fructum tulit ille petrum, &c. The rape Ensebius findes in the first of Jair, who governed Israel twenty two yeeres, to whom succeeded Jephtha or Jepte, six yeeres, to whom Ibzan, who ruled seven yeeres, and then Abdon eight yeeres: in whose time was the fall of Troy. So, as if Thebes had a childe by her in the first of Jair, (at which time we must count her no lesse than fifteen yeers olds; for the women did not commonly begin so young as they do now) she was then at least two and fifty yeers old at the destruction of Troy: and when she was stolen by Paris, eight and thirty: but herein the Chronologers do not agree. Yet Ensebius and Bunting, with Halicarnassens, do in effect consent, that the City was entred, and burnt in the first yeer of Demophoon King of Athens, the Successour of Mnestheus, the Successour of Theseus, seventeen dayes before the Summer Tropick; and that about the eleventh of September following, the Trojans crost the Hellspont into Thrace, and wintered there, and in the next spring that they navigated into Sicilia, where wintering the second yeer, the next Summer they arrived at Lawentum, and builded Laavinum. But S. Augustine hath otherwise, That when Polyphides governed Sicyon; Mnestheus, Athens; Tantanes, Affyria; Habdon, Israel; then Eneas arrived in Italy, transporting with him in twenty ships the remainder of the Trojans: but the difference is not great; and hereof more at large in the story of Troy at hand.

Of the war of Thebes, which was in this age.

IN this age was the war of Thebes, the most ancient that ever Greek Poet or Historian wrote of: Wherefore the Roman Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truly against the Peripateticks) that the World had a beginning, urgeth them with this objection:

— Si nulla fuit genitrix illis origo
Rerumque & mundi, semperque æterna fuere,
Cur supra bellum Thebanum, & Juværa Troje,
Non alias alii quoque res cecinere Poetæ?

If all this world had no original,
But things have ever been as now they are:
Before the siege of Thebes, or Troyes last fall,
Why did no Poet sing some elder warre?

It is true, that in these times Greece was very salvage, the Inhabitants being often chased from place to place, by the Captains of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon he dwelt his own, longer than he could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercourse they used little; neither did they plant many trees, or sowe more corn than was necessary for their sustenance. Money they had little or none; for it is thought that the name of money was not heard of in Greece, when Homer did write, who measures the value of gold and brasse by the worth in cattell: saying, that the golden armour of Glaucus was worth an hundred Beeves; and the copper armour of Diomedes worth nine.

Robberies by land and sea were common and without shame, and to steal horses or kine was the usuall exercise of their great men. Their Towns were not many, whereof those that were walled were very few, and not great. For Myrcna the principall City in Peloponnesus was a very little thing, & it may well be thought that the rest were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancy, and though in some small Towns of that half Isle of Peloponnesus, the Inhabitants might have enjoyed quietnesse within their narrow bounds; as likewise did the Athenians, because their Country was so barren, that none did care to take it from them: yet that the land in generall was very rude, it will easily appear to such as consider what Thucydides the greatest of their Historians hath written to this effect, in the Preface to his History. Wherefore, as in these later times, idle Chroniclers use when they want good matter, to fill whole books with reports of great Frosts, or dry Summers, and other such things which no man cares to read; so did they who spake of Greece in her beginnings, remember only the great Floods which were in the times of Ogyges and Deucalion: or else rehearse fables of men changed into birds, of strange Monsters, of adultery committed by their gods, and the mighty men which they begat, without writing ought that favoured of humanity before the time of the war of Thebes: the brief whereof is this.

Oedipus the son of Laius King of Thebes, having been cast forth when he was an infant, because an Oracle foretold what evil should come to passe by him, did afterwards in a narrow passage, contending for the way, slay his own father, not knowing either then or long after, who he was. Afterward he became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queen Jocasta, called by Homer, Epicafe: on whom, not knowing her to be his mother, he begat two sons, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in proceesse of time, finding out by good circumstances, who were his Parents, he understood the grievous murthre and incest he had committed, he tore out his own eyes for that grief, and left the City. His Wife (and Mother) did hang her self. Some say, that Oedipus having his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly cursing his sons, because they suffered their father to be cast out of the Town, and aided him not. Howsoever it were, his two Sons made this agreement, that the one of them should reign one year, and the other another year, and so by course rule interchangeably. But this appointment was ill observed. For when Polynices had after a yeers government, reigned the Kingdom to his brother: or (according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the first yeer, he refused to give over the rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fled unto Argos, where Adrastus the son of Talaus then reigned, unto whose Palace coming by night, he was driven to seek lodging in an out-house, on the back-side.

There he met with Tydeus the son of Oeneus, who was fled from Calydon: with whom striving about their lodging, he fell to blowes. Adrastus hearing the noise, came forth and took up the quarrell. At which time perceiving in the shield of Tydeus a Bore, in that of Polynices a Lion, he remembered an old Oracle by which he was advised to give his two Daughters in marriage to a Lion and a Bore: and accordingly he did bestow his Daughter Argia upon Tydeus, and Deipyle upon Polynices, promising to restore them both to their Countries. To this purpose levying an Army, and assembling as many valiant Captains as he could draw to follow him, he was desirous among others to carry Amphiaræus the son of Oicleus a great Soothsayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiaræus, who is said to have fore-seen all things, knowing well that none of the Captains should escape, save onely Adrastus, did both utterly refuse to be one in that expedition, and perswaded others to stay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyle the Wife of Amphiaræus, offering unto her a very fair Bracelet, upon condition that she should cause her Husband to assist him. The Sooth-sayer knowing what should work his destiny, forbade his Wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the Bracelet was in hereye so precious a Jewell, that she could not refuse it. Therefore whereas a great controversy between Amphiaræus and Adrastus, was by way of compromise put unto the decision of Eriphyle, either of them being bound by solemn oath to stand to her appointment: the ordered the matter so, as a Woman should that did love a Bracelet better than her Husband. He now finding that it was far more easie to fore-see than avoid destiny, sought for such comfort as revenge might afford him, giving in charge unto his sons, that when they came to full age, they should kill their mother, and make strong war upon the

Now had Adrastus assembled all his forces, of which, the seven chief Leaders were himself, Amphiaræus, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (in stead of whom some name Meeteus) all Argives, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Etolian, and Parthenopeus the Arcadian, son of Meleager and Atalanta. When the Army came to the Nemæan Wood, they met a woman, whom they desired to help them to some water; the having a childe in her arms, laid it down, and led the Argives to a Spring: but ere she returned, a Serpent had slain the childe. This woman was Hyppyle the Daughter of Thous the Lemnian, whom she would have saved when the women of the Isle slew all the

the males by conspiracie, intending to lead an Amazonian life. For such her Piety the Lemnian wives did tell her to Pyrrus, and the Pyrrus to Lycurgus Lord of the Countrey about Nemea, whose young son Opheles, or Archemorus she did nurse, and lost, as is shewed before. When upon the childes death she hid her self for fear of her master, Amphiaraus told her sons where they should find her : and the Argives did both kill the Serpent which had slain the child, and in memory of the chance, did institute solemne funeral games, called Nemean, wherein Adrastus won the prize with his swift horse Areon, Tydeus with the whorlbats, Amphiaraus at running and quoying, Polynices at wrestling, Parthenopaus at shooting, and one Laodocus in darting. This was the first institution of the Nemean games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many 10 ages. There are, who think that they were ordained in honour of one Opheles a Lacedemonian. Some say by Hercules, when he had slain the Nemean Lion : but the common opinion agrees with that which is here set down.

From Nemea the Argives marched onwards, arrived at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them sent Embassadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Covenants between him and Polynices. This message was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was thoroughly resolved to hold what he had, as long as he could : which Tydeus perceiving, and intending partly to get honour, partly to trie what mettle was in the Thebans, he made many challenges, and obtained victory in all of them, not without much envie and malice of the people, who layd fifty men in ambush to intercept him at his 20 return to the Army, of which fifty he slew all but one, whom he sent back to the City as a reporter and witness of his valour. When the Argives understood how resolved Eteocles was, they presented themselves before the City, and encamped round about it. Thebes is said to have had at that time seven gates, which belike stood not far asunder, seeing that the Argives (who afterward when they were very far stronger, could scarce muster up more than four than Thebes had gates) did compass the Towne, Adrastus quartered before the gate Hemolides, Capaneus before the Ogygean, Tydeus before Creon, Amphiaraus at Proctus, Hippomedon at Anchais, Parthenopaus at Eleus, and Polynices at Hypsis. In the mean season, Eteocles having armed his men, and appointed Commanders unto them, took advice of Tiresias the Soothsayer, who promised victory to 30 the Thebans, if Menæcius the son of Creon, a principall man of the City, would vow himself to bee slain in honour of Mars the god of war. So full of malice and pride is the Devil, and lo envious at his Creators glory, that he not onely challengeth honour due to God alone, as oblations and sacrifice withall Divine worship, but commandeth us to offer our selves and our children unto him, when he hath sufficiently clouded mens understanding, and bewitched their wits with ignorance and blind devotion. And such abominable sacrifice of men, maidens, and children hath he exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Gauls, Germans, Cyprians, Egyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or fear they were most filled with superstition. But as they grew more wise, so did he waxe lesse impudent in cunning, though not lesse malicious 40 in desiring the continuance of such barbarous inhumanitie. For King Diphris in Cyprus without advice of any Oracle, made the Idoll of that Countrey rest contented with an Oxe in stead of a man. Tiberius forbade humane sacrifices in Africa, and crucified the Priests in the groves where they had practised them. Hercules taught the Italians to drown men of hay in stead of the living : yet among the salvages in the West Indies these cruell offerings have been practised of late ages : which, as it is a sufficient argument that *Satan*s malice is onely covered and hidden by this subtilty among civil people : so it may serve as a probable conjecture of the barbarities then reigning in Greece. For Menæcius, as soon as he understood that his death might purchase victory to his people, bestowed himself (as he thought) upon Mars, killing himself before the gates 50 of the City. Then was a battell fought, wherein the Argives prevailed so far at the first, that Capaneus advancing ladders to the walls, got up upon the rampart : whence, when he fell, or was cast down, or (as Writers have it) was stricken down by Jupiter with a thunder-bolt, the Argives fled. Many on each part were slain in this battell, which caused both sides to desire that Eteocles and Polynices might try out the quarrell in single fight : whereto the two brethren according, flew each other.

Another battell was fought after their death, wherein the sons of Asfacus behaved themselves very valiantly : Ismarus one of the sons slew Hippomedon, which was one of of the seven Princes : Parthenopaus being another of the seven (who was said to have been lo faire, that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was slain by Amphidicus, or, as some say, by Periclymenus the son of Neptune : and the valiant Tydeus, by Medonippos : yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Medonippos was brought unto him by Amphidicus : which he cruelly tore open, and swallowed up the brains. Upon which fact, it is said, that Pallas, who had brought from Jupiter such remedy for his wounds, as should have made him immortall, refused to bestow it upon him : whereby perhaps was meant that his honour which might have continued immortall, did perish through the beastly rage that he shewed at his death.

10 The host of the Argives being wholly discomfited, Adrastus and Amphiaraus fled : of whom Amphiaraus is said to have been swallowed quick into the earth, neer to the River Ismenus, together with his Chariot, and so lost out of mens sight, being peradventure overwhelmed with dead carcases, or drowned in the River : and his body never found, nor greatly sought for. Adrastus escaped on his good horse Areon, and came to Athens ; where sitting at an altar, called the Altar of Mercy, he made supplication for their aid to recover their bodies. For Creon having obtained the government of Thebes after the death of Eteocles, would not suffer the bodies of the Argives to be buried : but caused Antigone, the onely daughter then living of Oedipus, to be buried quick, because she had sought out and buried the body of her brother Polynices, contrary to *Creon*s 20 Edict. The Athenians condescending to the request of Adrastus, did send forth an Army under the conduct of Theseus, which took Thebes, and restored the bodies of the Argives to sepulture : at which time Evanthe the wife of Capaneus threw her self into the funeral fire, and was burnt willingly with her husband. But it little contented the sons of those Captains which were slain at Thebes, that any lesse revenge should be taken of their fathers death, than the ruine of the City : wherefore ten year after, having levied forces, Agialcus the son of Adrastus, Diomedes of Tydeus, Promachus of Parthenopaus, Sthenelus of Capaneus, Thersander of Polynices, and Eurypylus of Medonippos, marched thither under the conduct of Alcmaeon, the son of Amphiaraus : with whom also went his brother Amphilochus. Apollo promised victory, if Alcmaeon were their Captain, whom 30 afterward by another Oracle he commanded to kill his own mother.

When they came to the City, they were encountered by Laodamas the son of Eteocles then King of the Thebans (for Creon was onely Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the battell, and slew Agialcus, yet was he put to the worst, and driven to flee, or (according to Apollodorus) slain by Alcmaeon. After this disaster, the Citizens began to desire composition ; but in the mean time they conveyed themselves with their wives and children away from thence by night, and so began to wander up and down, till at length they built the Town called Ectheia. The Argives, when they perceived that their enemies had quitted the Town, entering into it, sacked it, threw down the walls, and laid it waste ; howbeit it is reported by some, that the Town was saved by Thir- 40 sander the son of Polynices, who causing the Citizens to return, did there reign over them. That he saved the City from utter destruction, it is very likely ; for he reigned there, and led the Thebans to the War of Troy, which very shortly after ensued.

§. VII.

Of Jephtha, and how the three hundred years which he speaketh of, Judg. 11. 23. are to be reconciled with the places, Acts 13. 20. 1 Reg. 6. 1. together with some other things touching Chronologie about these times.

10 After the death of Jair (neer about whose time these things hapned in Greece, and during whose government, and that of Thobas, Israel lived in peace and in order) they revolted again from the Law and Service of God, and became more wicked and idolatrous than ever. For whereas in the former times they worshipped Baal and Astoro- 20 roth, they now became followers of all the Heathen Nations adjoyning, and embraced the Idols of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Moabites, and Ammonites : with those of the Philistines. And as before it pleased God to correct them by the Aramites, by the Amalekites, and Midianites : so now he scourged them by the * Ammonites, and afterward by the Philistines.

Now among the Israelites, those of Gilead being most oppressed, because they bordered upon Judg. 10.

* The persecution of the Ammonites lasted 18 years, & ended in the year of the world 2220. in which year Jephtha began, Jud. 11.

upon the Ammonites, they were inforced to seek Jephtha, whom they had formerly despised and cast from them, because he was base born; but he (notwithstanding those former injuries) participating more of godly compassion, than of devilish hatred and revenge, was content to lead the Gileadites to the War, upon condition that they should establish him their Governour after victory. And when he had disputed with Ammon for the Land, disproved Ammon right, and fortified the Title of Israel by many arguments, the same prevailing nothing, he began the war; and being strengthened by God, overthrew them: and did not only beat them out of the Plains, but forc't them over the mountains of Arabia, even to Mimith, and Abel of the vineyards, Cities express't heretofore in the description of the Holy Land. After which victory it is said, that he performed the vain vow which he made, to sacrifice the first living creature he encountered, coming out of his house to meet him; which happened to be his own daughter, and only child, who with all patience submitted her self, and only desired two months time to bewail her Virginity on the mountains of Gilead; because in her the issues of her Father ended: but the other opinion, that she was not offered, is more probable, which Borheus and others prove sufficiently.

After these things the children of Israel, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either envious of Jephtha's victory, or otherwise making way to their future calamity, and to the most grievous slavery that ever Israel suffered, quarrelled with Jephtha, that they were not called to the War, as before time they had contested with Gideon. Jephtha hereupon inforced to defend himself against their fury, in the encounter slew of them 42000, which so weakened the body of the Land, as the Philistines had an easie conquest of them all not long after. Jephtha, after he had judged Israel six years, died: to whom succeeded Izban, who ruled seven years: after him Elon was their Judge ten years: in all which time Israel had peace. Eusebius finds not Elon, whom he calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this Judge was omitted.

Now before I go on with the rest, it shall be necessary upon the occasion of Jephtha's account of the times, Jud. 11. 28. (where he says that Israel had then posselt the East side of Jordan 300. years) to speak somewhat of the times of the Judges, and of the differing opinions among the Divines and Chronologers: there being found three places of Scriptures touching this point, seeming repugnant or disagreeing: the first is in this dispute between Jephtha and Ammon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second is that of S. Paul, Acts 13. the third is that which is in the first of Kings. Jephtha here lengtheneth the possession of Gilead for 300. years: S. Paul giveth to the Judges, as it seems, from the end of Josua to the last of Heli, 450. years. In the first of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Egypt, to the foundation of Solomon's Temple, there were consumed 480. years. To the first, Beroaldus findeth Jephtha's 300. years to be but 266. years, to wit, 18. of Josua, 40. of Othniel, 80. of Aod and Samgar, 40. of Deborah, 40. of Gideon, 3. of Abimelech, 23. of Ishai, and 22. of Jair: But Jephtha (saith Beroaldus) putteth or proposeth a certain number for an uncertain: Sic ut dicat annum aqi propi tercentisimum, ex quo nullus litem ea de re moverit Israeli; So he speaketh (saith he) as meaning, that then it was about, or well-nigh, the three hundred year, since Israel possessed these Countries, no man making question of their right. Codoman on the contrary finds more years than Jephtha named by 65. to wit, 365, whereof 71. were spent in Israel's captivity, at several times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) Jephtha forbore to repeat the whole sum, or any great part, lest the Ammonites should have justly objected, that 71. of those years the Israelites were in captivity, and vassals to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name three hundred years, it was enough for prescription, he omitted the rest.

To justify this account of 365. years, besides the 71. years of captivity or affliction, so to be added to Beroaldus his 266. he addeth also 28. years more, and so maketh up the summe of 365. These 28. years he findeth out thus: twenty years he gives to the Seniors between Josua and Othniel: and where Beroaldus alloweth eighteen years to Josua his government, Codoman accounts that his rule lasted 26. according to Josuephus; whereas Saint Augustine and Eusebius give him 27. Melanchthon 32. The truth is, that this addition of 28. years, is far more doubtfull than the other of 71. But though we admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the years of affliction (to wit, 34. years of the 71.) if we adde them to the 266. years of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of these, we have the just number of 300. years. Neither is it strange that Jephtha should leave out more than halfe of the years of affliction: seeing, as it is already said, the Ammonites might except against the 71. years, and say, that during these years, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the Countries in question. Martin Luther is the author of a third opinion, making those 300. years remembered by Jephtha, to be 306. which odde years, saith he, Jephtha omitteth. But because the years of every Judge, as they reigned, cannot make up the number of 306. but doe onely compound 266. therefore doth Luther adde to this number the whole time which Moses spent in the Deserts of Arabia 10 Petraea; which forty years of Moses added to the number which Beroaldus findeth of 266. make indeed 306.

But I see nothing in the Text to warrant Luther's judgment herein: for in the dispute between Jephtha and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon, in these words: Because Israel took my Land, when they came up from Egypt, from Arnon unto Jaboc, &c. now therefore restore those Lands quietly; or in peace. So by this place it is plain, that the time is not to be accounted from Moses' departure out of Egypt: but from the time that the Land was posselt. For it is said, Quia cepit Israel terram moe-an, Behold Israel took my Land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Jephtha's answer also confirmeth in these words: 10 When Israel dwelt in Heshbon, and in her Towns, and in Arer, and in her Towns, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300. years: why did ye not then recover them in that space? so as this place speaks it directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300. years: and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents that Israel had to possesse it, it seemeth somewhat strained to mee: for we doe not use to reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes intents or purposes, but from their victories and possessions.

Junius nevertheless likes the opinion of Luther, and says, that this time of 300. years hath reference, and is to take beginning from the first of Jephtha's narration: when he makes a brief repetition of Moses whole journey: to wit, at the sixteenth Verse of the eleventh Chapter of Judges, in our translation in these words: But when Israel came up from Egypt, &c. and therefore Moses his 40. years (as he thinks) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305. years: and not only the time in which Israel posselt Gilead, according to the Text, and Jephtha's own words: of which I leave the judgment to others; to whom also I leave to judge, whether we may not begin the 480. years, from the deliverance out of Egypt to the Temple, even from the first departure out of Egypt, and yet finde a more probable reconciliation of Saint Paul's and Jephtha's account with this reckoning, than any of those that as yet have been signified. For first, touching Jephtha's three hundred years of possession of the East side of Jordan, it is to be remembered, that for a good while before the Israelites posselt it, Sehon and Og had disposselt Moab and Ammon thereof: so that when the Israelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of possession which they had, passed to Israel; and so Jephtha might say, that they had posselt those Countries 300. years, reckoning 266. years of their own possession, and the rest of the possession of the two Kings, Sehon and Og, whose right the Israelites had by the law of conquest.

The second place disputed is this of S. Paul, Acts 13. that from the end of Josua, to the beginning of Samuel, there past 450. years. And this place Luther understandeth also besides the letter (as I find his opinion cited by Fundus Krentzheimius, and Beza) for I have not read his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moses, to the last year of Heli, but 357. years: and this he doth the better to approve the time, so from the egression out of Egypt to the building of the Temple, which in the first of Kings 6. is said to be 480. years.

Now so far as much as S. Paul (as it seems) findes 450. years from the death of Josua, to the last of Heli, and leaves but thirty years for Saul and Samuel, who governed 40. for David who ruled 40. and for Solomon who wore the Crown three whole years ere that the foundation of the Temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was error in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of S. Paul: to wit, Then afterward he gave unto them Judges about 450. years, unto the time of Samuel the Prophet: the words [then afterward] being clearly referred to the death, or after the death of Josua, as shall be hereafter proved. But where Saint Luke, rehearsing the words of Saint Paul, wrote 350. years (saith Luther) the Scribe in the transcription being deceived by the affinity of those two Greek words, whereof the one signifieth 300. and the other 400. wrote Tetracosiois, for Triacosiois; 400. years for 300 years; and 450. for 350. This he seeketh to strengthen by many arguments: to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary judgment to this hath Codoman: where Luther and Beza begin at Moses death, he takes his account from the death of Josua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430. years: to wit, of the Judges (not reckoning Sampsons years) 319. and of years of servitude and affliction under strangers, 111. The reason why he doth not reckon Sampsons twenty years, is, because he thinks that they were part of the 40. years, in which the Philistines are said to have oppressed Israel. For it is plaine, that during all Sampsons time, they were Lords over Israel. So then of the Judges, besides the 111. years of servitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I have said) 319. years, which two sums put together, make 430. years. And whereas Saint Paul nameth 450. years, he finds 20. years to make up Saint Pauls number, to have been spent after the death of Josua by the Seniors, before the Captivity of Cushan, or the election of Othniel: which 20. years added to 430. make 450. according to Saint Paul. To approve this time of the Elders, he citeth two places of Scripture, namely the 24. of Josua, and the second of Judges, in each of which places it is written, that Israel served the Lord all the dayes of Josua, and all the dayes of the Elders that over-lived Josua: so as to these times of the Elders, Codoman giveth 20. years, which make as before 450. according to Saint Paul. Neither would it breed any great difficultie in this opinion, if here also the 20. years of the Seniors between Josua and Othniel should be denied. For they which deny these years, and make Othniels 40. to begin presently upon the death of Josua, as in the beginning of this reckoning they have 20. years lesse than Codoman, so toward the end of it (when they reckon the years of affliction apart from the years of the Judges) in the number of Sampsons years, and of the forty years of the Philistines oppressing the Israelites, they have 20. years more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40. years of oppression all of them a-part from Sampsons 20. but Codoman, as is said, makes Sampsons 20. to be the one half of the forty of the Philistines oppressions; so that if the 20. years of the Seniors be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the Text seems to enforce) that the Philistines in any Inter-regnum, before Sampson judged Israel, vexed the Israelites 40. years, besides the 20 while Sampson was their Judge; and so the reckoning will come to 450. years between the end of Josua, and the beginning of Samuel, though we admit not of an Inter-regnum of the Seniors between Josua and Othniel: For, if the times of their affliction be summed, they make 111. years, to which if we add the years of the Judges, which are 339. we have the just sum of 450. And this computation either one way or other, may seem to be much more probable, than theirs that correct the Text, although we should admit of their correction thereof, and read with them 350. for 450. For whereas they conceive that this time of 350. years, is to begin immediately, or soon after the death of Moses: certainly the place of Saint Paul doth evidently teach the contrary, though it be received for true that there was vitium scriptoris in the rest. For these be Saint Pauls words: And about the time of forty years, God suffered their manners in the wilderness: and he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and divided their Land to them by lot. Then afterward he gave unto them Judges about 450. years, unto the time of Samuel the Prophet. So as first in the eighteenth verse he speaketh of Moses, and of his years spent in the Wilderness, then in the nineteenth verse he cometh unto the acts of Josua; which were, that he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and divided their Land to them by lot. In the twentieth Verse it followeth, Then afterward he gave them Judges about 450. years, &c. and therefore to reckon from the death of Moses, is wide of Saint Pauls meaning, so far as my weak understanding can pierce it. The only inconvenience of any weight in opinion of Codoman touching this place in the Acts, is, that it seems irreconcilable with the account, 1 Reg. 6. 11. For if indeed there were spent 450. years between the end of Josua and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there must needs be much more than 480. years between the beginning of the Israelites journeying from Egypt, and the foundation of the Temple by Solomon. To this difficulty

Codoman

Codoman answereth, that these 480. years, 1 Reg. 6. 1. must begin to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their journeying from Egypt, which he makes to be 25. years after the beginning of Othniels government; from whence if we cast the years of the Judges, with the years of servitude (which sums, according to his account, of which we have already spoken, make 397. years) and so to these years add the 40. of Samuel, and Saul, and the 40. of David, and the 3. of Solomon, we shall have the just sum of 480. years. Neither is it hard, saith he, that the annus egressionis, 1 Kings 6. 1. should be understood egressionis non incipientis, sed finitæ, the year of their coming out of Egypt (for so it is in the originall) or the year after they came out of Egypt, may well be understood for the year after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandering from thence. For so we find that things which were done forty years after they had set foot out of Egypt, are said to have been done in their going out of Egypt; as Psalm 114. When Israel came out of Egypt, Jordan was driven back. And Deut. 4. 45. These are the testimonies which Moses spake when they came out of Egypt. And thus far it seems we may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the ab exitu, to be as much as quum exivissent, or ab exitu finitio: for if Junius, Deut. 4. 45. do well read quum exivissent, for in exitu, as it seems that herein he doth well, why may not we also, to avoid contradiction in the Scripture, expound ab exitu to be, postquam exivissent?

The next point to be cleared, is how their journeying should be said not to have had end until the 25. year after the victory of Othniel. To this Codoman answereth, that then it had no end, till when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not until this time: at which time the Danites at length seated themselves, as it is declared, Judg. 18. For doubtlesse to this time the Expedition may most conveniently be referred. And thus without any great inconvenience to him appearing, doth Codoman reconcile the account of Jephtha, and of Saint Paul, with that in the first Kings, cap. 6. Now whereas it is said, that the Expedition of the Danites was when there was no King in Israel: to this Codoman answereth, that it is not necessary that we should suppose that Othniel lived all those 40. years of rest, of which Judg. 3. 11. so that by the 25. year after his victory, either he might have been dead, or at least, as Grægon did, he might have refused all Sovereignty, and so either way it might truly be said that at this time (to wit, the 25. year after Othniels victory) there was no King in Israel. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as consonant to other Chronologers, grounding their opinions on the plain Text, where it is indisputable, as it is in itself round enough and coherent, might perhaps be received as good: especially considering, that the speeches of Saint Paul have not otherwise found any interpretation, maintaining them as absolutely true, in such manner as they found, and are set down. But seeing that he wanteth all help of authority, we may justly suspect the supposition whereupon his opinion is grounded; it being such as the consent of many Authors would hardly suffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the conquest of Laish, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the five and twentieth year of Othniel? Or what other probability hath he than his own conjecture, to shew that Othniel did so renounce the office of a Judge after five and twenty years, that it might then be truly said there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his own eyes?

Now concerning the rehearsal of the Law by Moses, and the stopping of Jordan, they might indeed be properly said to have been, when Israel came out of Egypt: like as we say that King Edward the first was crowned when he came out of the Holy Land, for so all journeyings with their accidents commonly take name from the place either whence or whither they tend. But I think that he can finde no such phrase of speech in Scripture as limiteth a journey by an accident, or faith by converting the proposition, when Jordan was turning back, Israel came out of Egypt. Indeed most unproperly it were to give date unto actions commenced long after, from an expedition finished long before, namely, to say, that King Edward at his arrivall out of Palestina did win Scotland, or died at Carlisle. How may we then believe that enterprize performed so many years after the division of the Land (which followed the conquest at the journeyes end) should be said to have been at the time of the departure out of Egypt? Or who will not think it most strange, that the most notable account of time, serving as the only guide for certain ages in sacred Chronologic, should not take name and beginning ginning from that illustrious deliverance out of Egypt, rehearsed often by God himself among the principall of his benefits to Israel, whereof the very day and moneth are recorded in Scripture (as likewise are the year and moneth wherein it expired) and the form of the year upon that occasion changed; but should have reference to the furnishing of a Town by six hundred men, that robbed a Chappell by the way, and stole from thence Idols to be their guides, as not going to work in Gods Name? For this accident whereupon Codoman buildeth, hath either no time given to it, or a time far distant from that which he supposeth, and is indeed rather by him placed in such a year, because it best stood with his interpretation so to have it, than for any certainty or likelihood of the thing it self.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirm, that the Apostle S. Paul did not herein labour to set down the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but only to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, delivered them out of bondage, and ruled them by Judges and Prophets unto the time of Saul, did raise up our Lord Jesus Christ out of the seed of David the King, in whose succession the Crown was established, and promise made of a Kingdome that should have no end. Now in rehearsing briefly thus much which tended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherein he sheweth Christ to have been the true Messias) the Apostle was so far from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the History being so well known and believed of the Jews to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large of the 40. years consumed in the Wilderness, whereof no man doubted, saying, that God suffered their manners in the Wilderness about 40. years. In like manner he proceeded, saying, that from the division of the Land unto the dayes of Sammuel the Prophet, in whose time they required to have a King, there passed about 450. years. Neither did he stand to tell them, that an hundred and eleven years of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339. years of the Judges: for this had been an impertinent digression from the argument which he had in hand. Wherefore it is not a work so needfull as laborious, to search out of this place that which the Apostle did not here intend to teach, when the sum of 480. years is so exprefly and purposely set down.

Now that the words of S. Paul (if there be no fault in the copy through error of some Scribe) are not so curiously to be examined in matter of Chronologie, but must be taken, as having reference to the memory and apprehension of the vulgar, it is evident by his ascribing in the same place 40. years to the reigns of Saul: whereas it is manifest that those years were divided between Saul and Sammuel, yea, that far the greater part of them were spent under the government of the Prophet, howsoever they are here included in the reign of the King. As for those that with so much cunning forsake the generall opinion, when it favoureth not such exposition as they bring out of a good minde, to help where the need is not over-great; I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The words of S. Paul were sufficiently justified by Beroaldus, as having reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in those dayes, that the 111. years of servit ude were to be reckoned apart from the 339. years ascribed to the Judges; which account the Apostle would not in this place stand to contradict, but rather chose to speak as the vulgar, qualifying it with a quasi, where he saith, quasi quadringentis & quinquaginta annis; As it were four hundred and fifty years. But Codoman being not thus contented, would needs have it be so indeed, and therefore dis-joynes the members to make the account even. In so doing he dasheth himself against a notable Text, whereupon all Authours have builded, (as well they might and ought) that purposely and precisely doth cast up the years from the departure out of Egypt, unto the building of Solomons Temple, not omitting the very moneth it self.

Now (as commonly the first apprehensions are strongest) having already given faith to his own interpretation of S. Paul, he thinketh it more needfull to finde some new exposition for that which is of it self most plain, & to examine his own conjecture upon a place that is full of controversie. Thus by expounding after a strange Method, that which is manifest by that which is obscure, he loseth himself in those wayes wherein before him never man walked. Surely if one should urge him to give reason of these new opinions, he must needs answer, that Othaniel could not govern above 25. years, because then was the taking of Laiſh; at which time there was no King in Israel; That the

Dimitis

Danites must needs have taken Laiſh at that time, because else we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple to any action that might be termed the coming of Israel out of Egypt, without excluding the years of servitude; And that the years of servitude must needs be included, for that otherwise he himself should have spent his time vainly, in seeking to pleasure S. Paul with an exposition. Whether this ground be strong enough to uphold a Paradox, I leave it to the decision of the judicious Reader.

And now to proceed in our story. To the time of Jephtha are referred the death of Hercules, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the provisions which her husband Menelaus, reigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon King of Mycena, made for her recovery. Others referre this rape of Helen to the Fourth year of Ithacan: from which time, if the warre of Troy (as they suppose) did not begin till the third of Ailon or Elon, yet the Greeks had six years to prepare themselves: the rule holding not true in this War, Longa preparatio belli celerem affert victoriam; That a long preparation begets a speedy victorie: for the Greeks consumed ten years in the attempt; and Troy, as it seems, was entered, sacked, and burnt in the third year of Habdon.

Three years after Troy taken, which was in the first year of Habdon, Aeneas arrived in Italy. Habdon in the eighth year of his rule, died, after hee had been the Father of 40. sons, and 30. grand-children. And whereas it is supposed, that the 40. years of *Israel*s oppression by the Philistims (of which Judg. 13. v. 1.) took beginning from the ninth year of Fair, and ended with the last of Habdon: I see no reason for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cause of quarrell against Jephtha, for not calling them to war over Jordan, if the Philistims had held them in servitude in their own territories; and if Ephraim could have brought 42000. armed men into the field, it is not likely that they were then oppressed: and had it been true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather have fought against the Philistims with so powerfull an Army for their own deliverance, than against their own brethren the Israelites? but Ammon being overthrown, it seemed at that time, that they feared no other enemy. And therefore these 40. years must either be supplied elsewhere, as in the time of Sampson, and afterwards: or else they must be referred to the inter-regnum between the death of Habdon, and the deliverance of Israel by Sampson, such as it was.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Warre of Troy.

§. I.

Of the Genealogie of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets, how they have observed historical truth.

He Warre at Troy, with other stories hereupon depending (because the ruine of this Citie, by most Chronologers is found in the time of Habdon Judge of Israel, whom in the last place I have mentioned) I rather choose here to treat of in one entire narration, beginning with the lineal descent of their Princes, than to break the story into pieces by rehearsing a-part in divers years, the diversity of occurrences.

The Historie of the ancient Kings of Troy is uncertain, in regard both of their originall, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Tencer and Dardanus were the two founders of that Kingdome. This is the opinion of Virgil: which if he (as Reineccius thinks) took from Beroſus, it is the more probable: if Annins borrowed it of him, then it rests upon the authoritie of Virgil, who saith thus:

*Creta Jovis magni medio jacet insula Ponto:
Mons Idaeus ubi, & gentis cruentula nostra.*

N n

Avidis

Centum

*Centum Urbes habitant magnas, uberrima regna:
 Maximus inde Pater (sistit audita recorde)
 Teucrus Rhætas primùm est advectus ad aras:
 Optavitq; locum regno. Nondum Ilium & arces
 Pergamæ steterant: habitabant vallibus imis.
 Hinc Mater cultrix Cybele, Corybantiq; ara, Idaemq; nemus.*

In the main Sea the Ile of Creete doth lye:
 Where Jove was born, thence is our progeny.
 There is a mount Ida: there in fruitfull Land
 An hundred great and goodly Cities stand.
 Thence (if I follow not mistaken fame)
 Teucer the eldest of our grand-fires came To the Rhætan shores: and reigned there,
 Ere yet fair Ilium was built, and ere
 The Towers of Troy: their dwelling place they sought In lowest Vales. Hence Cybels rites were brought:
 Hence Corybantian Cymbals did remove;
 And hence the name of our Idaean grove.

Thus it seemeth by Virgil, who followed surely good authority, that Teucer first gave name to that Countrey, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the same book he speaks thus:

*Est locus, Hesperiam Graii cognomine dicunt:
 Terra antiqua, potens armis atq; ubere glebe,
 Oenotrii coluere viri: nunc fama minores
 Italiam dixisse, duci de nomine gentem.
 Hæ nobis propria sedes: hinc Dardanus ortus:
 Jassusq; Pater, genus à quo principe nostrum.*

Hesperia the Græcians call the place:
 An ancient fruitfull Land, a warlike race,
 Oenotrians held it: now the later progenie
 Gives it their Captains name, and calls it Italy;
 This seat belongs to us; hence Dardanus,
 Hence came the author of your stock, Jassus.

*Atq; equidem memini (fama est obscurior annis) Auruncos ita fere senes, hic ortus ut agris
 Dardanus Idæus Phrygia penetravit ad urbes, Threiciamq; Samum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur.
 Hinc illum Coryti Tyrrhena ab sede profectum,
 Aurea nunc solio stellantis regia cæli Accipit &c.*

Some old Auruncans, I remember well,
 (Though time have made the fame obscure) would tell
 Of Dardanus, how born in Italy,
 From hence he into Phrygia did flee.
 And leaving Tusaine (where he erst had place)
 With Corytus did fall to Samothrace;
 But now intronized he sits on high,
 In golden Palace of the starry skie.

But contrary to this, and so many Authors, approving and confirming it, Reineccius thinks that these names, Troes, Teucris, and Thracæ, are derived from Tiras or Thiras the son of Japhet: and that the Dardaniæ, Mysians, & Ascanians, mixt with the Trojans, were Germane Nations, descended from Ashkenaz, the son of Gomer: of whom the Countrey, Lake, and river of Ascanius in Asia took name. That Ashkenaz gave name to those places and people, it is not unlikely: neither is it unlikely, that the Ascanii, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times pass into Europe: that the name of Teucer came of Tyras, the conjecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Teucer, whereas Halicarnassæus makes him an Athenian, I find none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shewed) reporteth him to be of Crete, whose authority is the more to be regarded, because he had good means to find the truth, which it is probable that he carefully sought, and in this did follow, seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles he did flatter) whether Teucer were of Crete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus, and others that think him a Phrygian, by which report he was the Son of Scamander and Ida, Lord of the Countrey, not founder of the Citie, and his Daughter or Niece Batis was the second wife of Dardanus founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinks that Atlas reigned in Samothracia, and gave his daughter Electra to Corytus, or Coritus: and that these were parents to Coryse, first wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds otherwise; and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the son of Electra by Jupiter, which Electra was the daughter of Atlas, and wife to Coritus King of Hetruria, to whom the bare Jassus, Annus out of his Berossus finds the name of Camboblacon, to whom he gives the addition of Corytus, as a Title of dignity, making him Father of Dardanus and Jassus; and further telling us very particularly of the faction between these Brethren, which grew to such heat, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and thereupon fled into Samothrace. The obscurity of the history gives leave to Annus of saying what he list. I, that love not to use such libellous will forbear to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the Son of Jupiter, it must have been of some elder Jupiter than the Father of those that lived about the War of Troy. So it is likewise probable that Atlas the Father of Electra was rather an Italian than an African, which also is the opinion of Boccace. For (as hath often been said) there were many Jupiters, and many of almost every name of gods: but it was the custome to ascribe to some one the aas of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my self with making any narrow search into these fabulous antiquities, but set down the Pedigree according to the generall fame; allowing to Teucer such Parents as Diodorus gives, because others giving him none, and carrying the line of Dardanus in manner following.

Deu. l. 4. 3.
 Boccace de 2^{da}.

N n 2

Many by valour have deserv'd renown
 Ere Agamemnon; yet lye all opprest
 Under long night, unwep't for, and unknown:
 For with no sacred Poet were they blest.

Yet so it is, that whilst these writers have with strange fables, or (to speak the best of them) with Allegories far strained, gone about to enlarge the commendations of those noble undertakers: they have both drawn into suspicion that great vertue which they sought to adorn, and filled after-ages with almost as much ignorance of the History, as admiration of the persons. Wherefore it is expedient that we seek for the knowledge of such actions, in Histories; learning their qualities who did manage them, of Poets, in whose works are both profit and delight; yet small profit to those which are delighted otherwise: but such as can interpret their fables, or separate them from the naked truth, shall find matter in Poems, not unworthy to be regarded of Historians. For those things excepted which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much disagreement of Authors, written of this great war. All writers consent with Homer, that the rape of Helen by Paris the son of Priamus, was the cause of taking arms: but how he was hereunto emboldened, it is doubtful.

§. II.

Of the rape of Helen: and strength of both sides for the War.

H Herodotus fetcheth the cause of this rape from very far; saying, That whereas the Phœnicians had ravished Io, and carried her into Egypt, the Greeks, to be revenged on the Barbarians, did first ravish Europa, whom they brought out of Phœnicia into Creta, and afterward Medea, whom they fetcht from Colchis, denying to restore her to her father, till such time as they might be satisfied for the rape of Io. By these deeds of the Greeks, Paris (as the same Herodotus affirms) was emboldened to doe the like; not fearing such revenge as ensued. But all this narration seems frivolous. For what had the King of Colchis to doe with the injury of the Phœnicians? Or how could the Greeks, as in revenge of Io, plead any quarrell against him, that never had heard the name of Phœnicians? Thucydides, a writer of unquestionable sincerity, maketh it plain, that the name of Barbarians was not used at all in Homer's time, which was long after the war of Troy: and that the Greeks themselves were not then called all by one name, Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were unreasonable to think, that they should have sought revenge upon all Nations, as barbarous, for the injury received by one: or that all people else should have esteemed of the Greeks, as of a people opposed to all the world; and that even then when as the Greeks had not yet one common name among themselves. Others with more probability say, that the rape of Helen was to procure the redelivery of Hesione, King Priamus's sister, taken formerly by Hercules, and given to Telamon. This may have been true: for Telamon (as it seems) was a cruel man, seeing his own son Tenex durst not come in his sight, after the war of Troy, but fled into Cyprus, onely because his brother Ajax (which Tenex could not remedy) had slain himself. Yet, were it so, that Hesione was ill entreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely that Priamus's brother would seek to take her from her husband, with whom he had lived about thirty years, and to whom shee had borne children which were to succeed in his Dominion. Whereupon I think that Paris had no regard either to the rape of Europa, Medea, or Hesione, but was merely incited by Venus, that is, by his lust, to doe that which in those dayes was very common. For not onely Greeks from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greeks, as Herodotus discourseth; but all people were accustomed to steal women and cattell, if they could by strong hand or power get them: and having stolen them either to sell them away in some farre Countrey, or keep them to their own use. So did Theseus and Pirithous attempt Proserpina; and so did Theseus (long before Paris) ravish Helen. And these practices, as it appears in Thucydides were so common, that none durst inhabite neer unto the Sea, for fear of piracy, which was accounted a trade of life no lesse lawfull than merchandise: wherefore Tyndareus, the father of Helen, considering the beauty of his daughter, and the rape which Theseus had made, caused all her wooers, who were most of the principall men in Greece, to binde themselves by solemn oath, that if she were taken from her husband, they should with all their might help to recover her. This done, he gave free choice of a husband to his daughter, who chose Menelaus, brother to Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greeks unto Troy in revenge of Helen's rape, was partly the oath which so many Princes had made unto her Father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping: for Agamemnon, besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, was Lord of many Ilands: he was also rich in money, and therefore the Argadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom he embarked for Troy in his own ships, which were more than any other of the Greek Princes brought to that expedition.

Thus did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or led by reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon, and Menelaus; or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprise, take arms against the Trojans. The Greek Fleet was (by Homer's account) 1200. sayl, or thereabouts: but the vessels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build ships with decks; onely they used (as Thucydides saith) small ships, meet for robbing on the Sea; the least of which carried fifty men, the greatest 120. every man (except the Captains) being both a Mariner and a Souldier. By this proportion it appears that the Grecian army consisted of 100000. men or thereabout. This was the greatest army that ever was raised out of Greece: and the greatness of this armie doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which ten whole years did stand out against such forces: yet were the Trojans which inhabited the Citie, not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon said in the second of Homer's Iliads; but their followers and aides were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Misissia, and the greatest part of Asia the lesse, took part with the Trojans. The Amazons also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Assyria (though some think out of Aethiopia) came to their defence.

§ III.

Of the Grecians journey, and Embassage to Troy, and of Helena's being detained in Egypt, and of the sacrificing of Iphigenia.

W Herefore the Greeks, unwilling to come to trvall of arms, if things might be compounded by treaty, sent Menelaus and Ulysses Embassadors to Troy; who demanded Helen, and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus's house. What answer the Trojans made hereunto it is uncertain. Herodotus from the report of the Egyptian Priests, makes it very probable, that Helen was taken from Paris before his return to Troy. The sum of his discourse is this. Paris in his return with Helena, being driven by foul weather unto the coast of Egypt, was accused for the rape of Helen by some bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuary. Proteus then King of Egypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her husband should require them: dismissing Paris without further punishment, because he was a stranger. When therefore the Greeks demanding Helen, had answer, that she was in Egypt, they thought themselves deluded, and thereupon made the warre, which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the City taken, they perceived indeed shee had not been there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to ask his wife of Proteus. Homer, and the whole Nation of Poets (except Euripides) vary from this History, thinking it a matter more magnificent, and more gracefull to their Poems, for the retaining of a fair Lady, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to deliver her. Yet in the fourth of his Odysseys, Homer speaks of Menelaus's his being in Egypt, before he returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not easily believed that hee made for pleasure: and if hee were driven thither by contrary Winds, much more may we think that Paris was likely to have been driven thither by foul Weather. For Paris immediately upon the rape committed, was enforced to flye, taking such Windes as he could get, and rather enduring any storm, than to commit himself to any Haven in the Greek Seas: whereas Menelaus might have put into any port in Greece, and there have remained with good entertainment, untill such time as the Wind had come about, and served for his Navigation.

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirm the saying of the Egyptian Priests; which is, that if Helen had been at Troy, it had been utter madnesse for Priamus to see so many miseries befall him, during the warre, and so many of his sonnes slain for the pleasure of one, who neither was heir to the Kingdome (for Heſtor was elder) nor equall in vertue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seem that Lusian spake not more pleasantly than truly, when he said that Helen, at the warre of Troy, was almost as old as Queen Hecuba, considering that she had been ravished by Theseus the companion of Hercules, who took Troy when Priamus was very young; and considering further, that she was sister to Castor and Pollux (he and Pollux being said by some to have been twinned) who sailed with the Argonauts, having Telamon the father of Ajax in their company, before the time that Hesione was taken; on whom Telamon begat Ajax, that was a principall Commander in the Trojan warre. But whether it were so that the Trojans could not, or would not restore Helen, so it was that the Ambassadors returned ill contented, and not very well entreated, for there wanted not some that advised to have them slain. The Greeks hereupon incensed, made all haste towards Troy: at which time Calchus (whom some say to have been a Runnagate Trojan, though no such thing be found in Homer) filled the Captains, and all the Host with many troublesome answers and divinations. For he would have *Agamemnon*s daughter sacrificed to appease Diana, whose anger, he said, withstood their passage. Whether the young Lady were sacrificed, or whether (as some write) the goddesse was contented with a Hinde, it is not needfull here to be disputed of. Sure it is, that the malice of the Devill, which awaits for all opportunities, is never more importunate, than where mens ignorance is most. Calchus also told the Greeks, that the taking of Troy was impossible, till some fatal impediments were removed: and that till ten years were past, the Town should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding, the Greeks proceeded in their enterprise, under the command of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his Brother Menelaus; Achilles the most valiant of all the Greeks, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phoenix; Ajax and Teucer, the sonnes of Telamon; Idomeneus and his companion Marion; Nestor and his sons Antilochus and Thrasymides; Ulysses, Mneſtheus the son of Petrus, Captain of the Athenians; Diomedes the son of Tydeus, a man of singular courage; the wife and learned Palamedes, Alcalaphus, and Falmenus, the sons of Mars; who had sailed with the Argonauts; Philoctetes also the son of Peaan, who had the arrows of Hercules, without which Calchus said, that the Citie could not be taken; Ajax the son of Oileus, Penelcus, Theas, Emelus, Tyſandrus, Euripilus, Athamas, Sthenelus, Tlepolemus the son of Hercules; Podalyrius, and Machon, the sons of Aſculapius; Epeus, who is said to have made the wooden Horſe, by which the town was taken; and Proteſſlaus, who first leapt on shore, neglecting the Oracle that threatned death to him that landed first.

§. IV.

Of the Acts of the Græcians at the ſiege.

THese, and many other of lesse note, arriving at Troy, found such sharp entertainment, as might easily persuade them to think that the warre would be more than one years work. For in the first encounter, they lost Proteſſlaus, whom Heſtor slew, and many other, without any great harm done to the Trojans: save only that by their numbers of men, they wan ground enough to incamp themselves in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principall impediment which the Greeks found, was want of victuals, which grew upon them by reason of their multitude, and the finalnesse of their vessels wherein they could not carry necessaries for such an Army. Hereupon they were compelled to send some part of their men, to labour the ground in Cherroneſſe: others to rob upon the Sea for the relief of the Camp. Thus was the warre protracted nine whole years, and either nothing done, or if any skirmishes were, yet could the town receive little losse by them, having equall numbers to maintain the field against such Greeks as continued the siege, and a more safe retreat if the enemy got the better.

Wherefore Ovid saith, That from the first year, till the tenth, there was no fighting at all, and Heraclide commends as very credible, the report of Herodotus, that the Greeks did not lye before Troy the first nine years: but onely did bear up and down the Seas, exerci-exercising their men, and enriching themselves, and so by waſting the enemies countrie, did block up the Town, unto which they returned not, untill the fatal time drew near when it should be subverted.

This is confirmed by the enquire which Priamus made, when the Greek Princes came into the field, the tenth year, for he knew none of them; and therefore sitting upon an high tower (as Homer tells) he learned their names of Helen: which though it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all have been supposed that he should be ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselves before the town so many years together. Between these relations of Thucydides and Herodotus, the difference is not much; the one saying, that a few of the Greeks remained in the Camp before Troy, whilst the rest made purveyance by land and by sea: the others that the whole armie did spend the time in waſting the Sea-coasts. Neither doe the Poets greatly disagree from these authors: for they make report of many towns and Ilands waſted, and the people carried into Captivity; in which actions Achilles was employed, whom the armie could not well, nor would have spared, if any service of importance had been to be performed before the Citie. Howsoever it was, this is agreed by generall consent, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Camp, and a great pestilence arose among the Greeks: which Homer saith, that Apollo sent in revenge of his Priests daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let goe, for any ransom: but Heraclides interpreting the place, saith, that by Apollo was meant the Sunne, who raised pestilent Fogs, by which the armie was infected, being lodged in a moorish piece of ground. And it might well be that the camp was over-pestered with those, who had been abroad, and now were lodged all close together: having also grounded their ships within the fortifications.

About the same time arose much contention between Agamemnon and Achilles about the bootie, whereof Agamemnon, as Generally, having first chosen for his part a captive woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himself another, then Ajax, Ulysses, and to the rest of the chiefe Captains in order: when the Soothsayer Calchus had willed that Agamemnons woman should be restored to her father *Apollo*s Priest, that so the Pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage, and say, that hee alone would not lose his part of the spoile, but would either take that which had been given to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Ajax, or to Ulysses. Hereupon Achilles defied him, but was faine to suffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Concubine by strong hand, nor to revenge her losse otherwise than by refusing to fight, or to send forth his Captains. But the Greeks, encouraged by their Captains, presented themselves before the Citie without him and his troops.

The Trojans were now relieved with great succours, all the neighbour Countries having sent them aide: partly drawn to that warre by their Commanders who assisted Priamus for money, wherewith he abounded when the warre began (as appears by his words in Homer), or for love of himselfe and his sons, or hope of marriage with some of his many and fair daughters; partly also (as we may well ghesse) incited by the wrongs received of the Greeks when they waſted the Countries adjoining unto Troy. So that when Heſtor issued out of the town, he was little inferior to his enemies in numbers of men, or qualitie of their Leaders. The principall Captains in the Trojan armie, were Heſtor, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, and the other sons of Priamus: Aeneas, Antenor, and his sons, Polydamas, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Aſius, and the sons of Panthus, besides Rhesus, who was slain the first night of his arrivall; Memnon, Queen Penthesilea, and others who came towards the end of the war. Betweene these and the Greeks were many battels fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tombe of King Ilus upon the Plain; and another at the very trenches of the Camp, wherein Heſtor brake through the fortifications of the Greeks, and began to fire their ships; at which time Ajax, the son of Telamon, with his brother Teucer, were in a manner the onely men of note that remaining unwounded, made head against Heſtor, when the state of the Greeks was almost desperate.

Another battell (for so antiquitie calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who having obtained leave, drew forth Achilles troops, relieving the wearie Greeks with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Ulysses, and the rest of the Princes though sore wounded, yet were driven to put on armour, and with help of Patroclus, repelled repelled the Trojans very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was lost, and his body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought back into the Camp: the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torn from him by Hector . It was the manner of those wars, having slain a man, to strip him, and hale away his body, not restoring it without ranfome, if he were one of marke. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foot, slightly armed, and commonly followed the success of their Captains; who rode not upon horses, but in Chariots, drawn by two or three horses, which were guided by some trusty followers of theirs, which drave up and down the field, as they were directed by the Captains, who by the swiftnesse of their horses presenting themselves where need required, threw first their Javelins, and then alighting, fought on foot, with swords and battle-axes, retiring into the ranks of footmen, or els returning to their Chariots when they found cause, and so began again with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were lost or broken. Their arms defensive were helmets, breast-plates, boots of brasse, or other mettall, and shields commonly of leather plated over. The offensive were swords and battel-axes at hand; and stones, arrows or darts when they fought at any distance. The use of their Chariots (besides the swiftnesse) was to keep them from weariness, whereto the leaders were much subject, because of their armour, which the strongest and stoutest were heaviest, also that from them they might throw their Javelins downwards, with the more violence. Of which weapon I find not that any carried more than one or two into the field: wherefore they were often driven to return to their tents for a new one when the old was gone. Likewise of armours they had little change or none; every man (speaking of the chiefe) carried his own compleat, of which if any piece were lost or broken, he was driven to repair it with the like, if he had any fitting, taken from some Captain whom he had slain, and stripped: or else to borrow of them that had by such means gotten some to spare. Whereas therefore Achilles had lost his armour which Hector (as is said before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was faine to await the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very desirous, that he might revenge the death of Patroclus his dear friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himselfe unto Achilles, not onely restoring his concubine Briseis, but giving him very great gifts, and excusing former matters as well as he might. In the next battell Achilles did so behave himself, that he did not onely put the Trojans to the worst, but also slew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be beleev'd) he chased three times about the walls of Troy. But great question may be made of Homer's truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would stay alone without the Citie (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Trojans were fled into it: nor that he could leap over the rivers of Xanthus and Simois, as he must have done in that fight: nor that the Trojans, perceiving Hector in such an extremitie, would have forbidden to open some of their gates and let him in. But this is reported onely to grace Achilles, who having (by what means soever) slain the noble Hector, did not onely carry away his dead body, as the custome then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thrusting leathern thongs into them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragging him shamefully about the field, selling the dead body to his father Priamus for a very great ranfome. But his cruelty and covetousness were not long unrevenge'd; for he was shortly after slain with an arrow by Paris, as Homer says, in the Scæan Gate; or as others, in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to have married Polixena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too far in love, having slain so many of her brethren; and his body was ranfomed (as Lycophron saith) at the self-same rate that Hector's was by him sold for. Not long after this, Penthesilea Queen of the Amazons arrived at Troy, who after some proofe given of her valour, was slain by Pyrhus the son of Achilles.

S. V.

Of the taking of Troy, the wooden Horse, the Book of Dares and Dyctis, the Colonies of the reliques of Troy.

Finally, after the death of many worthy persons on each side, the Citie was taken by night, as all Writers agree: but whether by the treason of Antenor and Antenor, or by a wooden Horse, as the Poets, and common Fame (which (which followed the Poets) have delivered, it is uncertain. Some write that upon one of the gates of Troy, called Scæa, was the image of a horse, and that the Greekes entering by that gate, gave occasion to the report, that the Citie was taken by an artificial horse. It may well be that with some wooden engine, which they called a horse, they either did batter the walls, as the Romans in after-times used to do with the Ramme: or scaled the walls upon the sudden, and so took the Citie. As for the hiding of men in the hollow body of a wooden horse, it had been a desperate adventure, and serving to no purpose. For either the Trojans might have perceived the deceit, and slain all those Prisoners of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which also by such a mainstay this report they are said to have thought upon: for they might have left it a few dayes without the Citie (for it was unlikely, that they should the very first day both conclude upon the bringing it into the town, and break down their walls upon the sudden to doe it:) by which means they who were shut into it, must have perished for hunger, if they had not by issuing forth unseasonably discovered the invention. Whereas further it is said, that this horse was so high and great, that it could not be brought into the town through any of the gates, and that therefore the Trojans were faine to pull down a part of their wall to make way for it, through which breach the Greekes did afterwards enter; it is hereby manifest, that the inclosing of so many principall men was altogether needlesse, considering that without their help there was way sufficient for the armie, so that the surprizing of any gate by them was now to no purpose.

John Baptista Gramay in his Historie of Asia, discoursing of this warre, saith that the Greekes did both batter the walls with a wooden engine, and were also let into the Citie by Antenor, at the Scæan gate: the townsmen sleeping and drinking without fear or care, because the fleet of the Greeks had hoisted saile, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Trojans into security. That the Citie was betrayed, the books of Dares and Dyctis must prove, which whether we now have the same that were by them written, it may be suspected; for surely they who have made mention of these writers in ancient times, would not, as they did, have followed the reports of Homer and others quite contrarie in most points to these two authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they having served in that war made against the common report, had it not been that either those books were even in those times thought frivolous, or else contained no such repugnance to the other Authours as now is found in them.

Also concerning the number of men slain in this warre, which Dares and Dyctis say to have been above 600000. on the Trojan side, and more than 800000. of the Greeks, it is a report meerly fabulous; for as much as the whole Fleet of the Greeks was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their armie and deeds as much as he could, to be somewhat lesse than 1200. saile, and the armie therein transported over the Greek seas, not much above 100000. men, according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common fashion of men to extoll the deeds of their Ancients: for which cause both Homer magnified the Captains of the Greeks that served in the warre, and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending and extolling the Trojans and their Citie, from which the Romans descended. Yea, the Athenians long after in the warre which Xerxes the Persian King made against all Greece, did not forbear to vaunt of the great cunning which Mænefius the son of Petens had shewed in marshalling the Grecian army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had been a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yeeld unto Gelon King of almost all Sicily, the Admirall of their Seas, notwithstanding that he promised to bring 200. good fighting ships, and 30000. men for their defence.

The like vanitie possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the world, which have striven to bring their descent from some of the Princes that warred at Troy: all difficulties or unlikelihoods in such their Pedegree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeed, or in most probability, came of the Trojans, were the Albanes in Italie; and from them the Romans, brought into that Country by Æneas: the Venetians first seated in Padua, and the Countrey adjoining, by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Helimus, the son of King Priamus. To which Hellenicus addeth, that the posteritie of Hector did assemble such of the Trojans as were left, and reigned over them about Troy.

of the distresses and dispersions of the Greeks returning from Troy.

Concerning the Greeks, they tasted as much miserie as they had brought upon the Trojans. For Thucydides notes, that by reason of their long abode at the siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driven by their borderers from their ancient seats: many were expelled their Countries by faction: some were slain anon after their arrivall: others were debarr'd from the Sovereignty among the people, by such as had stayed at home. The cause of all which may seem to have been the dispersion of the Armie, which, weakened much by the calamities of that long warre, was of little force to repell injuries, being divided into so many pieces under severall Commanders, not very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising upon the division of the bootie, and the like occasions) at the time when they should have set sail, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediatly, the other to stay and perform some sacrifices to Minerva. Hereupon they fell to hot words, half the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them failed to the Ile of Tenedos; where when they arrived, they could not agree among themselves, but some returned back to Agamemnon; others were dispersed, each holding his own course. But the whole fleet was fore vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not be perswaded in haste.

They who returned safe were Nestor, and Pyrrhus, whom Orestes afterwards slew: also Idomeneus and Philoctetes, who nevertheless, as Virgil tells, were driven soon after to seek new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Petilia in Italie. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was forthwith slain by his wife, and by the Adulterer Aegisthus, who for a while after usurped his Kingdom. Menelaus wandering long upon the Seas, came into Egypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather seem) to fetch her. Ulysses, after ten years, having lost all his company, got home in poor estate, with much ado recovering the mastership of his own house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driven into exile, and fain to seek out new habitations.

Ajax the son of Oileus was drowned; Teucer fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Darus, who was Lord of the Fapiges in Apulia; some of the Locrians were driven into Africa, others into Italy, all the East part whereof was called Magna Græcia, by reason of so many towns which the Greeks were driven to erect upon that coast. Finally, it appears in Homer, that the Græcian Ladies, whose husbands had been at the war of Troy, were wont to call it, The place where the Greeks suffered miserie, and the unlucky City not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy, and those that warred there: the overthrow of which City, as hath been said, happened in the time of Habdon Judge of Israel, whom Samphon, after a vacancie or Inter-regnum for certain years, succeeded.

CHAP. XV.

Of Samphon, Eli, and Samuel.

§. I.

Of Samphon.

2970.

HE birth and acts of Samphon are written at large in the 13. 14. 15. and 16. of Judges; and therefore I shall not need to make a repetition thereof. But these things I gather out of that Storie, First, that the Angel of God forbade the wife of Manoah the mother of Samphon, to drink Wine or strong drink, or to eat any unclean meat after shee was conceived with child; because those strong liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrink the child in the mothers wombe. Though this were even the counsell of God himself, and delivered by his Angell, yet it seemeth that many women of this age have not read, or at least will not believe this precept: the most part forbearing nor drinks, nor meats, how strong or unclean soever, filling themselves with all sorts of wines, and with artificiall drinks far more forcible: by reason whereof, so many wretched feeble bodies are born into the world, and the races of the able and strong men in effect decayed.

Secondly, it is to be noted, that the Angel of God refused the sacrifice which Manoah would have offered him, commanding him to present it unto the Lord: and therefore those that profess divination by the help of Angels, to whom also they sacrifice, may assuredly know that they are devils who accept thereof, and not good Angels, who receive no worship that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Samphon was twice betrayed by his wives, to wit, by their importunitie and deceitfull tears: by the first he lost but a part of his goods; by the second his life. Quem nulla vis superare potuit, voluptas everit: Whom no force could over-master, Voluptuousnesse overturned.

Fourthly, we may note, that he did not in all deliver Israel from the oppression of the Philistims; though in some sort he revenged, and defend led them: for notwithstanding that he had slain 30. of them in his first attempt, burnt their Corn in harvest time, and given them a great overthrow instantly upon it: yet so much did Israel fear the Philistims, as they assembled 3000. men out of Juda, to besiege Samphon, in the rock or mountain of Etam, using these words: Knowest thou that the Philistims are rulers over us?

After which they bound him, and delivered him unto the Philistims, for fear of their revenge; though he was no sooner loosened, but he gave them another overthrow, and slew 1000. with the jaw-bone of an Ass.

Lastly, being made blind, and a prisoner by the treason of his wife, hee was content to end his own life, to be avenged of his enemies, when he pulled down the pillars of the house at the feast whereto they sent for Samphon, to deride him; till which time he bare his affliction with patience: but it was truly said of Seneca; Patentia sepe lesa vertitur in furorem; Patience often wounded is converted into furie: neither is it at any time so much wounded by pain and losse, as by derision and contumelie.

§. II.

Of Eli, and of the Ark taken; and of Dagons fall, and the sending back of the Ark.

THE Storie of Eli the Priest, who succeeded Samphon, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the destruction of his house, for the wickedness of his sons, which he suppressed not, neither did he punish them according to their deserts: whose sins were horrible, both in abusing the Sacrifice, and prophaneing and polluting the holy places: though Levi Ben Gerson, to extenuate this filthy offence of forcing the women by the sons of Eli, hath a contrary opinion. In this time therefore it pleased God to cast the Israelites under the swords of the Philistims; of whom there perished in the first encounter 4000. and in the second battell 30000. footmen; among whom the sons of Eli being slain, their father (hearing the lamentable success) by falling from his chair, brake his neck. He was the first that obtained the High-Priesthood of the stock of Ithamar the son of Aaron, before whose time it continued successively in the race of Eleazar the eldest brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the first, Eleazar the second, Phinees the son of Eleazar the third, Abisue the son of Phinees the fourth, his son Becai the fifth, Ozi the son of Becai the sixth, and then Eli, as Josephus and Lyranns out of the Hebrew Authors have conceived. In the race of Ithamar the Priesthood continued after Eli, to the time of Salomon, who cast out Abiathar, and established Sadoek and Achimaas and their successours. The Ark of God which Israel brought into the field, was in this battell taken by the Philistims. For as David witnesseth, God greatly abhorred Israel, so that he forsook the habitation of Shilo: even the Tabernacle where he dwelt among men, and delivered his power into captivity, &c.

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the Ark whereby himself was represented should fall in the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people: so did he permit the Chaldeans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon; the Romans to overthrow the second Temple; and the Turks to overthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the sacrament, or representation, which was the Ark, than in God himself, they would have observed his Lawes, and served him onely: which whensoever they did, they were then victorious. For after the captivitie they had no Ark at all, nor in the times of the Machabees: and yet for their pietie it pleased God to make that familie as victorious as any that guarded themselves by the signe in stead of the substance. And that the Ark was not made to the end to be carried into the field as an ensigne, David witnessed when he fled from Abylon. For when the Priests would have carried the Ark with him; he forbade it, and caused it to be turned into the Citie, using these words: If I shall find favour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me again: if not, let him doe to me as seemeth good in his eyes.

The Trojans believed that while their Palladium or the image of Minerva was kept in Troy, the Citie should never be overturned: so did the Christians in the last fallall battell against Saladine carry into the field, as they were made believe, the very Crosse whereon Christ died; and yet they lost the battell, their bodies, and the wood. But Chrysostome upon Saint Matthew (if that be his work) giveth a good judgement, speaking of those that wore a part of Saint Iohns Gospell about their necks, for an amulet or preservative: Si tibi ea non profunt in auribus, quomodo prederunt in collo? If these words doe not profit men in their eares, (to wit, the hearing of the Gospell preached, how should it profit them by hanging it about their necks? For it was neither the wood of the Ark, nor the wood of the Crosse, but the reverence of the Father that gave the one for a memorie of his Covenant; and the Faith in his Sonne, which shed his blood on the other for redemption, that could or can profit them and us, either in this life or after it.

The Philistims returning with the greatest victorie and glorie which ever they obtained, carried the Ark of God with them to Azotus, and set it up in the house of Dagon their Idoll: but that night the Idoll fell out of his place, from above to the ground, and lay under the Ark. The morning following they took it up, and let it again in his place. And it fell the second time, and the head brake from the body, and the hands from the armes, shewing, that it had no power nor understanding in the presence of God; for the head fell off, which is the seat of reason and knowledge, and the hands (by which we execute strength) were lundered from the armes. For God and the devill inhabit not in one house, nor in one heart. And this Idoll could not endure the representation of the true God, it is not to be marvelled, that at such time as it pleased him to cover his only begotten with flesh, and sent him into the world, that all the Oracles, wherein the Devill decidered and betrayed most all men, lost power, speech and operation at the instant. For when that true light which never had beginning of brightness, brake through the clouds of a Virgins body, shining upon the earth which had been long obscured by Idolatrie, all those foul and stinking vapours vntil then, Plutarch rehearseth a memorable accident in that age concerning the death of the great god Pan, as he stileth him; where (as ignorant of the true cause) he searcheth his brains for many reasons of so great an alteration: yet finds he none out but frivolous. For not only this old Devill did then die as he supposed, but all the rest, as Apollo, Jupiter, Diana, and the whole rabble became speechlesse.

Now while the Philistims triumphed after this victorie, God strook them with the grievous disease of the Hamorrhoides, of which they perished in great numbers. For it is written, that the Lord destroyed them. I will therefore by general consent ordered, that the Ark should be removed from Azotus to Gath or Geth, another of the five great Cities of the Philistims; to prove, as it seemeth, whether this disease were fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediately: but when it was brought to Gath and received by them, the plague was yet more grievous and mortall. For the hand of the Lord was against this Citie with a very great destruction, and he smote the men of the Citie both small and great, &c. And being not yet satisfied, they of Gath sent the Ark to Eckron or Acaron, a third Citie of the Philistims: but they also felt the same smart, and cryed out, that themselves and their people should be slain thereby. For there was a destruction and death throughout all the Citie. In the end, by the advice of their Priests the Princes of the Philistims did not onely resolve to return the Ark, but to offer gifts unto the God of Israel, remembering the plague which had fallen on the Egyptians, when their hearts were hardened to hold the people of God from their inheritance, and from his service by strong hand. Wherefore confessing the power of the God of Israel to be almighty, and that their own Idols were subject therunto, they agreed to offer a sin-offering, using using these words; So ye shall give glorie to the God of Israel, that he may take his hand from you, and from your gods, and from your land. And what can be a more excellent witnessing, than where an enemy doth approve our cause? according to Aristotle; Pulchrum est testimonium, quo nostra probantur ab hostibus. So did Pharao confesse the living God, when he was plagued in Egypt: and Nabuchodonosor and Darius, when they had seen his miracles by Daniel.

This counsell therefore of the Priests being embraced, and the golden Hamorrhoides, and the golden Mice prepared, they caused two milch kine to be chosen, such as had not been yoked, and a new Cart or Carriage to be framed: but they durst not drive or direct it to any place certain, thereby to make tryall whether it were indeed the hand of God that had stricken them. For if the Ark of God were carried towards Bethhemesh, and into the territory of Israel, then they should resolve that from God only came their late destruction. For the Philistims knew that the milch Kine which drew the Ark, could not be forced from their calves, but that they would have followed them wheresoever; much lesse when they were left to themselves, would they travel contrary way. For in the darkest night in the world, if calves be removed from their dammes, the kine will follow them through woods and deserts by the foot, till they find them. But the kine travelled directly towards Bethhemesh: and when they came into the fields thereof, to wit, of one Josias of the same Citie, they stood still there; which when the Princes of the Philistims perceived, they returned to Eckron. After which, God spared not his own people the Bethhemeshites, in that they presumed to look in the Ark. And because they knew God and his commandments, and had been taught accordingly; he strook them more grievously than he did the heathen: for there perished of them fifty thousand and seventy. From hence the Ark was carried to Kiriath-jearim, and placed in the house of Abinadab; where it is written that it remained twenty years in the charge of Eleazar his son, until David brought it to Hierusalem.

Now whereas it is said, that in the mean while the Ark was in Nob, Mispa, and Gallata, it was the Tabernacle, which was at this time fevered from the Ark, or at least, it was for the present occasion brought to these places, and anon returned to Kiriath-jearim.

of Samuel, and of his Government.

These Tragedies overpast and ended, Samuel, to whom God appeared while he was yet a child, became now Judge and Governour of Israel. He was descended of the familie of Chore or Korach. For Levi had three sons; Gerfon, Cheath, and Merari: Cheath had Amram and Izaar; of Amram came Moses and Aaron; of Izaar, Chore; and of the familie of Chore, Samuel. His father Elcana a Levite, was called an Ephraean; not that the Levites had any proper inheritance, but because hee was of Mount Ephraim, like as Jesse, David's father, was called an Ephraean, because born at Ephrata, or Bethleem. Hannah his mother being long fruitlesse, obtained him of God by prayers and tears: it being an exceeding shame to the Jewish women to be called barren, in respect of the blessing of God, both to Abraham, that his seed should multiply as the Stars of Heaven, and the sands of the Sea; as in the beginning to Adam, Increase and multiply, &c. and in Deuteronomie the seventh; There shall be neither male nor female barren among you.

Samuel was no sooner born, but that his mother, according to her former vow, dedicated him to God, and his service; to which she delivered him even from the dugges. For as the first-born of all that were called Nazarites, might be redeemed till they were five years old for five sheckles, and between five years and twenty, for twenty sheckles: so was it not required by the Law, that any of the race of the Levites should be called to serve about the Tabernacle, till they were five and twenty years old.

Saint Peter reckons in the Acts the Prophets from Samuel, who was the first of the writers of holy Scriptures, to whom usually this name of a Prophet was given, & yet did Moses account himselfe such a one; as in the 18. of Deuteronomie, The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet like unto mee, &c. But hee is distinguished from thole that Tribe of Ephraim, preceded him, who were called Seers; as before time in Israel, when a man went to seek an answer of God, thus he spake; Come and let us goe to the Seer: for hee that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appear by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; not that God had altogether withdrawn his grace from Israel: but as the Chaldean Paraphrast hath it, those revelations before Samuel's time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherein Samuel judged were Matspa or Mispa, seated on a hill in Benjamin neer Judah: also Gilgal and Bethel, of which we have spoken else-where.

The Philistims taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation of War at Mitspa in the beginning of Samuel's government, gathered their Armie, and marched towards the Citie: at whose approach the Israelites stricken with fear, and with the memorie of their former slaughters and servitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them; who was then performing his sacrifice when the Philistims were in view. But God being moved with Samuel's prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at the first entrance into Arabia:) it pleased him with thunder and tempest to disperse and beat down the Army of the Philistims, according to the prophetic of Hanna, Samuels Mother, The Lords adversaries shall be destroyed, and out of Heaven shall he thunder upon them. &c. Josephus affirms, that a part of the Philistims were swallowed with an earthquake: and that Samuel himself led the Israelites in the prosecution of their victory. After which Samuel erected a Monument in memorie of this happy success, obtained by the miraculous hand of God, which Josephus called Lapidem fortis: Samuel, Ebenezer, or the stone of assistance: and then following the opportunitie and advantage of the victorie, the Israelites recovered divers Cities of their own formerly lost, and held long in the possession of the Philistims, who for a long time after did not offer any invasion or revenge. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts, the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backs, and to the North of them, that they might not be assaulted from divers parts at once; having the Philistims towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanite toward the North and East, and the Idumite on the South. The estate being thus settled, Samuel for the ease of the people gave audience and judgement in divers places by turns, as hath been else-where said.

CHAP. XVI. Of SAUL.

Of the deliberation to change the government into a Kingdome.

UT when age now began to over-take Samuel, and that hee was not able to undergoe the burthen of so carefull a government, he put off from himself the weight of the affairs on his sons, Joel and Abijah, who judged the people at Beersheba, a Citie, the very utmost towards the South of Judah. And as the place was inconvenient and far away, so were themselves no lesse removed from the justice and vertue of their Father: For the thirst of covetousnesse, the more it swalloweth, the more it drieth, and desireth, finding taste in nothing but gain; to recover which, they set the Law at a price, and sold Justice and Judgement to the best Chapmen. Which when the Elders of Israel observed, and saw that Samuel as a naturall man (though a Prophet) could not so well discern the errors of his own, they prayed him to consent to their change of government, and to make them a King, by whom they might be judged as other Nations were; who might also lead them to the War, and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable success which followed the rule of Eli his sons, when those of Samuel by their first blossomes promised to yield fruit no lesse bitter, they saw no way to put the government from out his race, whom they so much revered, but by the choyce of a King.

In a cause of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsell from God: which surely hee did not for the establishing of his own Sonnes, who being as they were. God would not have approved his election. Now as it appears by the Text, this speech or motion displeasing him, he used his best arguments to dehort them: which when he perceived to be over-feeble, he delivered unto them from Gods revelation; the inconveniences and miseries which should befall them. And yet, all which he fore-shewed was not intolerable, but such as hath been born, and is so still, by free content of the Subjects towards their Princes. For first he makes them know that the King will use their sons in his own service to make them his Horse-men, Chariotiers, and Foot-men; which is not only not grievous, but by the Vassals of all Kings, according to their birth and condition, desired: it being very agreeable to Subjects of the best qualitie to command for the King in his Warres; and to till the ground no lesse proper and appertaining to those that are thereto bred and brought up: so are likewise the offices of women-servants to dresse meat, to bake bread, and the like. But where is immediately it is threatened, He will take your Fields and your Vineyards, and your best Olive trees, and give them to his servants; with other oppressions: this hath given, and gives daily occasion to such as would be ruled by their own discretion, to affirme that Samuel describeth here unto them the power of a King governed by his own affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others upon further examination construe this Text farre otherwise, as teaching us what Subjects ought with patience to bear at their Sovereigns hand. The former opinion is grounded first upon that place of Deuteronomie, where God foresheweth this change of government from Judges to Kings; and after he had forbidden many things unto the Kings, as many wives, covetousnesse, and the like, he commandeth that the Kings which were to reign over Israel, should write the Law of Deuteronomie, or cause it to be written: and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the dayes of his life; that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, and to keep all the words of this Law, and these ordinances for to doe them: that he may prolong his dayes in his Kingdom, he and his Sons. But to take away any other mans field, say they, is contrary to the Lawes of God, in the same book written. For it is said, That which is just and right shalt thou follow, that thou mayst live. Now if it be not permitted to carry away grapes more than thou canst eat out of another mans vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much lesse lawful to take the vineyard it self from the owner, and give it to another. Neither are the words of the Text (say they) such as do warrant the Kings of Israel, or make it proper unto them, to take at will any thing from their vassals. For it is not said that it shall be lawful for the King, or the King may do this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your sonnes: and again, This shall be the manner of the King that shall reign over you. God thereby fore-shewing what power, severed from pietie (because it is accountable to God onely) will do in the future. And hereof we find the first example in Ahab, who took from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the trust which God had put in him, of governing well his people. For God commanded, That his people should be judged with righteous judgement. Wherefore, though the King had offered unto Naboth composition, as a Vineyard of better value, or the worth in money, which he refused: yet because he was falsely accused, and unjustly condemned (though by colour of Law,) how grievously Ahab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell us. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Ahab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Israel. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a living Law, even as David testifieth of himself: Posuisti me in caput gentium: For this of S. Augustine is very true: Simulata innocentia, non est innocentia: simulata aequitas, non est aequitas: sed duplicatur peccatum in quo est iniquitas & simulatio, Feigned innocence, and feined equity, are neither the one nor the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled, in which there is both iniquity & dissimulation. Such in effect is their disputation, who think this place to contain the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well known to all; being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true Law of free Monarchies: which Treatise I may not presume to abridge, much lesse here to insert. Only thus much I will say, That if practice doe shew the greatnesse of authoritie, even the best Kings of Judah and Israel were not so tyed by any lawes, but that they did whatsoever they pleased in the used great care and policie that they should have no Smithes to make them swords or spears: neither was it long before, that of the Bethshemites, and places adjoining, there perished by the hand of God more than 50000. and therefore in these respects, even occasion it self invited them to enlarge their Dominions upon their borderers: Fabes Gilead being one of the neerest. Besides, it may further be conjectured, that the Ammonites were emboldened against Fabes Gilead, in respect of their weakness: since the Israelites destroyed a great part of them, for not joyning with them against the Benjamites: at which time they did not only slaughter the men and male-children, but took from them their time they did not only slaughter the men and male-children, but took from them their young women, and gave them to the Benjamites: and therefore they were not likely to have been increased to any great numbers: and if they had recovered themselves of this 10 great calamitie, yet the Ammonite might flatter himself with the opinion, that Israel, having for long time been disarmed by the Philistims, was not apt to succour those whom they had so deeply wounded and destroyed. But contrariwise, when the tidings came to Saul, of their danger, and that the Ammonites would give them no other condition to ransom themselves, but by pulling out their right eyes, by which they should be utterly disabled for the Warre, as elsewhere hath been spoken: Saul, both to value himself in his first years reign, and because perchance he was descended of one of those 400 Maids taken from the Gileadites, and given to the Benjamites, gave order to assemble the forces of Israel, hewing a yoke of Oxen into pieces, and sending them by messengers over all the coasts, protesting thus: That whoever came not forth after Saul, and after Samuel, should his Oxen be served: threatening the people by their goods, and not by their lives at the first. Seven dayes had Saul to assemble an Armie, by reason that the Gileadites had obtained the respite of these seven dayes to give Nahas the Ammonite an answer: who, could they have obtained any reasonable condition, were contented to have severed themselves from Israel, and to become Vassals and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the mean while Saul assembled the forces which repaired unto him at Besec, neer Jordan, that he might readily passe the river; which done, he might in one day with a speedie march arrive at Fabes, under the Hills of Gilead.

The Armie by Saul led, consisting of three hundred and thirty thousand, he returned an answer to those of Fabes, that they should assure themselves of succour by the next 30 day at noon. For, as it seemeth, Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, & went on all night; for in the morning watch he surprized the armie of Nahas the Ammonite. And to the end that he might set on them on all sides, he divided his forces into three parts, putting them to the sword untill the heat of the day, and the wearinesse of Sauls troop enforced them to give over the pursuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more carelesse and secure, in that those of Fabes promised the next morning to render themselves and their Citie to their mercie. After this happy successe, the people were so far in love with their new King, that they would have slain all those Israelites that murmured against his election, had not himselfe forbidden and resisted their resolutions. Such is the condition of worldly men, as they are violent lovers of the prosperous, and base Vassals of the time that flourisheth; and as despitfull and cruell without cause against those, whom any misadventure, or other worldly accident hath thrown down.

After the Army removed, Samuel summoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and, as some Commenters affirm, anointed King: and here Samuel used an exhortation to all the Assembly, containing precepts, and a rehearsal of his own Justice, during the beginning of his government to that day. After Saul had now reigned one year before he was established in Gilgal, or Galgala, he strengthened himself with a good guard of 3000. chosen men, of which he assigned 1000. to attend on Fonathan his son at Gibeab, the Citie of his nativitie: the rest he kept about his own person in Micmas, and in the Hill of Bethel.

S. IIII.

Of Sauls disobedience in his proceedings in the Warres with the Philistims and Amalekites, which caused his small rejection.

Jonathan with his small Armie or Regiment that attended him, taking a time of advantage, surprized a Garrison of Philistims: the same, as some think, which Saul pass by, when he came from Rama, when he was first anointed by Samuel, which which they think to have been Cariath-jearim: because a place where the Philistims had a Garrison, 1 Sam. 10. is called the hill of God, which they understand of Cariath-jearim: but Junius understands this Garrison to have been at Gebah in Benjamin neer Gibba, where Fonathan abode with his thousand followers. Howsoever, by this it appeareth that the Philistims held some strong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territorie of Israel: and now being greatly enraged by this surprize, they assembled thirty thousand armed Chariots, and six thousand Horse, wherewith they invaded Judea, and encamped at Machmas, a Citie of Benjamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Hierusalem, and in the midst of the Land between the Sea and Jordan. With this sudden invasion the Israelites were stricken in to great a fear, as some of them hid themselves in the caves of the mountains; others fled over Jordan into Gad and Gilead: Saul himself with some 2000. men of ordinarie, and many other people, staid at Galgala in Benjamin, not far from the passage of Josua when he led Israel over Jordan. Here Saul by Samuels appointment was to attend the coming of Samuel seven dayes: but when the last day was in part spent, and that Saul perceived his forces to diminish greatly, he presumed (as some expound the place, 1 Sam. 13. 9.) to exercise the office which appertained not unto him, and to offer a burnt offering, and a peace offering unto God, contrary to the Ecclesiasticall Lawes of the Hebrews, and Gods Commandements: others expound the word, obtulit, in this place, by obtulit per Sacerdotes, and so make the sin of Saul not to have been any intrusion into the Priests office, but first a disobedience to Gods Commandement, in not staying according to the appointment, 1 Sam. 10. 8. secondly, a diffidence or mistrust in Gods help, and too great relying upon the strength of the people, whose departing from him he could not bear patiently; and lastly, a Contempt of the holy Prophet Samuel, and of the help which the prayers of so godly a man might procure him. But whatsoever was his sin, notwithstanding his excuses, he was by Samuel reprehended most sharply, in termes unfitting his estate, had not extraordinary warrant been given to Samuel so to doe, from God himself; at which time also Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdome should be conferred to another (a man after Gods own heart) both from Saul and his posteritie.

After this, Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeab, where Saul, when he had taken view of his armie, found it to consist of 600. men: for the most were fled from him and scattered, yea and among those that staid, there was not any that had either sword or spear, but Saul and his son Fonathan onely. For the Philistims had not left them any Smith in all Israel, that made weapons; besides, they that came to Saul, came hastily, and left such weapons and armour as they had behind them in their garrisons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul should be able the year before, or in some part of this very year, to succour Fabes Gilead with 300. and thirty thousand men, if there had not now been any yron weapon to defend themselves withall, save onely in the hand of Saul and Fonathan his son. But howsoever, all the rest of the people were formerly disarmed by the Philistims, and all those crafts-men carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left unto the Israelites onely files to sharpen and amend such stiffe as served for the Plough, and for nought else: yet that they had some kind of armes, it is manifest, or else they durst not have attempted upon the Philistims as they did. And it is not said in the Text that there was not any yron in all Israel, but onely that there was not any found amongst those 600. souldiers which staid with Saul after Samuels departure: and it seemeth that when Samuel had sharply reprehended Saul, that his own guards forlook him, having but 600. remaining of his 3000. ordinarie souldiers, and of all the rest that repaired unto him, of which many 50 were fled from him before Samuel arrived.

With this small troop he held himself to his own city of Gibeab, as a place of more strength, & better assured unto him, than Gilgal was. Neither is it obscure how it should come to passe that the Philistims should thus disarm the most part of the Israelites, howsoever in the time of Samuel much had been done against them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by sword or spear, but by thunder from Heaven: and when these crafts-men were once rooted out of the Cities of Israel, no marvell if they could not in a short peace under Samuel be replanted again. For this tyrannie of the Philistims is to be understood, rather of the precedent times, than under Samuel: and yet under him him is to be thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policy, not suffering their Artificers to teach the Israelites, and so even to the times of Saul kept them from having any store of armour. The same policy did Nabuchodonosor use after his Conquest in Babylonia: Dionysius in Sicily, and many other Princes else where in all ages. But these lost weapons in part the Israelites might repair in Gilead, for over Jordan the Philistims had not invaded. The rest of their deficiencies were such as antiquity used, and their present necessity ministered unto them; to wit, clubs, bowes, and slings. For the Benjamites exceeded in casting stones in slings; and that these were the naturall weapons, and the first of all nations, it is manifest; and so in the first of Chronicles the 12. Chapter it is written of those that came to succour David against Saul, while he lurked at Siklag, That they were 16 weaponed with bowes, and could use the right and the left hand with stones, and with a sling it was that David himself slew the Gyant Goliath.

While the State of Israel stood in these hard termes the Philistims having parted their army into three troops, that they might spoil and destroy many parts at once; Jonathan, strengthened by God, and followed with his Equire onely, scaled a mountain, whereon a company of Philistims were lodged: the rest of their army (as may be gathered by the successe) being incamped in the plain adjoining. And though he were discovered before he came to the hill top, and in a kind of derision, called up by his enemies: yet he so behaved himself, as with the assistance of God he slew 20. of the first Philistims that he encountered. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarm, and being ignorant 20 of the cause, fled away amazed altogether. In which confusion, fear, and jealousy, they slaughtered one another in stead of enemies: whereupon those Hebrews which became of their party, because they feared to be spoiled by them, took the advantage of their destruction, and slew of them in great numbers. And lastly, Saul himself taking knowledge of the rout and disorder, together with those Israelites that shrouded themselves in mount Ephraim, set upon them, and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a most happy and glorious victory over them. Here was that prophesie in Deuteronomie fulfilled by Jonathan, That one of those which feared God, should kill a thousand, and two of them ten thousand.

This done, the small army of Israel made retreat from the pursuit. And although Saul 30 had bound the people by an oath not to take food til the evening, yet his son Jonathan, being infebbled with extreme labour and emptinesse, tasted a drop of honey in his passage: for which Saul his father would have put him to death, had not the people delivered him from his crueltie.

The late miraculous victorie of Saul and Jonathan, seems to have reduced unto the Philistims remembrance their former overthrow, likewise miraculous in the dayes of Samuel; so that for some space of time they held themselves quier. In the mean while Saul being now greatly encouraged, undertook by turns all his bordering enemies, namely, the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zobah, against all which he prevailed. He then assembled all the forces he could make, to wit, 2 10000. men, and 40 receiving the commendement of God by Samuel, he invaded Amalec, wasting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petraea, and the Desart belonging to the Amalekites, from Havilah towards Tigris unto Shur, which bordereth Egypt; in which warre hee took Agag their King prisoner. But whereas he was instructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compassion, because they first of all attempted Israel, when they left Egypt in Moses time: he notwithstanding did not only spare the life of Agag, but reserved the best of the beasts and spoil of the Countrey, with pretence to offer them in sacrifice to the living God. Therefore did Samuel now a second time make him know that God would cast him from his royall estate, to which he was raised when he was of base condition, and, as the Text hath it, little in his own eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voyce of God by Samuel, had there been no former precept to that effect: yet seeing Saul could not be ignorant how severely it pleased God to enioyn the Israelites to revenge themselves upon that Nation, he was in all unexcusable. For God had commanded that the Israelites should put out the remembrance of Amalec from under heaven. For the cruelty which the predecessors of this Agag used against the Israelites, especially on those which were over-wearied, faint, sick, and aged people, was now to be revenged on him, and his Nation, above 400. years afterward; and now hee was to pay the debt of bloud, which his forefathers borrowed from the innocent: for Saul having also sinned in the same kind, as these words of Samuel witness: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be childlesse 1 Sam. 15. 33. among other women; at which time Samuel himself (after he had been by many bootlesse intreaties perswaded to stay a while with Saul) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilead, and soon after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see Saul until the day of his death.

§. V.

Of the occurrents between the rejection of Saul and his death.

10 NOW while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a King for Israel, among the sons of Israh: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a sort to perform, till it pleased God to direct him, how hee might avoid both the suspicion, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the providence of God, that by his cautious care and wisdom hee sought to avoid the inconveniences or dangers of this life: then do these men mistake the nature of his divine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath given them, do no otherwise avoid the perills and dangers thereof, than as men stupefied in the opinion of fate or destinie, neglecting either to beg counsell at Gods hands by prayer, or 20 to exercise that wisdom or foresight, wherewith God hath enriched the mind of man for his preservation: Neither did the all-powerfull God (who made and could destroy the world in an instant) disdain here to instruct Samuel, to avoid the fury of Saul, by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the sons of Israh, Samuel, by God directed, made choise of David, the youngest, having refused Eliab, the first born: who though he were a man of a comely person and great strength; yet unto such outward appearance, the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God seeth not as man seeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. He also refusing 1 Sam. 16. the other six brethren, made choise of one whom his father had altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flock; for of him the Lord said to Samuel, Arise and anoint him; for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neither was it long after this that Saul began to seek the life of David: in which bloody mind hee continued till he died, overcome in battell by the Philistims.

The Philistims having well considered (as it seems) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilst they had sitten still and forborne to give impediment to his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new tryall of their fortune, as justly fearing that the wrongs, which they had done to Israel, might be repaid with advantage; if ever opportunity should serve their often injured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of these antient enemies. Now for the qualitie of their Souldiers, and all warlike provisions, the Philistims had 40 reason to think themselves equall, if not superiour to Israel. The successe of their former wars had for the most part been agreeable to their own wishes: as for late disasters, they might, according to humane wisdom, impute them to second causes; as to a tempest happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarm, whereby their Armie, possessed with a needlesse fear, had fallen to rout.

Having therefore multered their forces, and taken the field, encamping so neer to the Armie which King Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the trial of a battell, each part kept their ground of advantage for a while, not joyning in grosse, but maintaining some skirmishes, as refusing both of them to passe the Valley that lay between their Camps. Just causes of fear they had on both sides; especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had bin confounded by the angry hand of God. Upon this occasion perhaps it was, that they sought to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any stroak from heaven were to be feared, Goliath of Gath, a strong Giant, fearing neither God nor Man, undertook to defie the whole Hoste of Israel, provoking them with despicable words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand; offering condition, that the partie vanquished in Champion, should hold it self as overcome in grosse, and become vassall unto the other. This gave occasion to 50 David, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had anointed, to make a famous entrance into publique notice of the people. For no man durst expose himselfe to encounter the great strength of Goliath, untill David sent by his friend on an errand to the Camp) accepted the combat, and obtained the victorie, without other arms, offensive or defensive, than a sling, wherewith he overthrew that haughty Gyaunt, and after with his own sword strook off his head. Hereupon the Philistims, who should have yielded themselves as subjects to the Conquerour, according to the covenant on their own side propounded, fled without stay, and were pursued and slaughtered even to their own gates. By this victory the Philistims were not so broken, that either any of their Towns were lost, or their people discouraged from infesting the Territories of Israel. But David, by whom God had wrought this victorie, fell into the grievous indignation of his Master Saul, through the honour purchased by his well-deserving. For after such time as the spirit of God departed from Saul, and came upon David, hee then became a cruell Tyrant, faithlesse, and irreligions. Because the high Priest Ahimilech fed David in his necessitie with hallowed bread, and armed him with a sword of his own conquest, taken from Goliath; Saul not only by his wicked Edomite Dag murdered this Ahimilech and 85. Priests of Nob, but also he destroyed the Citie, and smote with the edge of the sword both man and woman, both child and suckling, both Oxe and Ass, and sheep. And he that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemy to God and his people, and also spared and preserved the best of his Cattell, contrary to the Commandement and Ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel, had not now any mercy in store for the innocent, for the Lords servants, the Priests of 10 Israel. Yea, hee would have slain his own son Jonathan, for pitying and pleading David's innocencie; as also once before for tasting the honey, when his fainting for cruelty made him forget his fathers unreasonable commination. The companions of cruelty are breach of faith towards men, and impiety towards God. The former hee shewed in denying David his daughter, whom he had promised him; and again in taking her away from him to whom he had given her: also in that when as David had twice spared his life in the Territory of Ziph, and Saul twice sworn to do him no hurt, and confessed his errors, yet he sought still to destroy him, by all the means he could. His impiety towards God he shewed, in that he sought counsell of the Witch of Endor, which was the last preparative for his destruction. For whereas when he sought counsell from God, he had bin alwaies victorious: from the Oracle of the Devil this successe followed, that both himself, and his three sons, with his nearest and faithful servants, were all slaughtered by the Philistims: his body with the bodies of his sons (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hung over the walls of Bethshan; and there had remained till they had found buriall in the bowels of ravenous birds; had not the gratefull Gileadites of Jabes stolne their carcasses thence, and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had governed 10 Israel, together with Samuel. 40. years, and by himself after Samuel 20. years, according to Cedrenus, Theophilus and Iosephus. But yet it seemeth to me, that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long: For in the beginning of the 25. chapter, it is written, that Samuel died; and in the rest of the same chapter the passages are written of David, 40 Nabal, and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly ensued.

An exceeding valiant man he was, and gave a fair entrance to all those victories which David afterward obtained: for he had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations; crushed the Syrians, and their adherents; broken the strength of the Amalekites; and greatly wasted the power and pride of the Philistims.

Of such as lived with Samuel and Saul; of Hellen, and Hercules, and of their issues: upon occasion of the Dores, with the Heracleidae, entering Peloponnesus about this time. 50

IN the second year of Samuel, according to Eusebius, was David born: after Codomenus, later, and in the ninth year: after Bunting in the tenth. For David, faith hee, was thirtie years old when hee began to reigne: whence it followeth, that hee was born in the tenth of the fortie years, which are given to Samuel and Saul. About the eleventh year of Samuel, Aeneas Silvius the son of Posthumus began his reign over the Latines in Alba, who governed that State one and thirtie years. There are who place before him Latinus Silvius, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from from Aeneas, and fourth King of Alba, whereof I will not stand to dispute. In the eleventh of Samuel, Dercilas sat in the Throne of Assyria, being the one and thirtieth King; he ruled that Empire forty years. In this age of Samuel the Dores obtained Peloponnesus, and at once with the Heracleidae, who then led and commanded the Nation, possesse a great part thereof, 328. years before the first Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Eratosthenes. For all Greece was anciently possessed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz: the Ionians, Dorians, and Aeolians: at length it was called Hellas, and the people Hellenes, of Hellen the son of Deucalion, Lord of the Countrie of Phthiotis in Thessaly. But before the time of this Hellen, yea, and long after, Greece had no name common to all the 10 Inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till such time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the Plantation of many Colonies, and sundry great victories obtained, the issues of Hellen had reduced much of the Countrie under their obedience, calling themselves generally by one name, and yet every severall Nation after some one of the posteritie of Hellen, who had reigned over it. And because this is the farthest antiquitie of Greece, it will not be amisse to recount the Pedegree of her first planters.

Lapetus (as the poets fable) was the son of Heaven and Earth, so accounted, either because the names of his Parents had in the Greek tongue such signification: or perhaps for his knowledge in Astronomie and Philosophie.

Lapetus begat Prometheus, and Ephimetheus: of whom all men have read that have read Poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion; and Epimetheus, Pyrrha; Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha reigned in Thessalie, which was then called Pyrrha (as Cretensis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrrha the Queen. In Deucalions time was that great flood, of which wee have spoken else-where. Deucalion begat Hellen: whose sons were Xuthus, Dorus, and Aeolus: of Dorus and Aeolus, the Dores and Aeolians had name. The Aeolians inhabited Bœotia. The Dores having first inhabited sundry parts of Thessaly, did afterward seat themselves about Parnassus, and finally became Lords of the Countries about Lacedæmon: Xuthus the eldest son of Hellen, being banished by his brethren, for having diverted from them to his own use some part of their Fathers goods, came to Athens: where 30 marrying the Daughter of King Erichtheus, he begat on her two sons, Achæus and Ion. Of these two, Achæus, for a slaughter by him committed, fled into Peloponnesus: and seating himself in Laconia, gave name to that region: from whence (as some write) he afterwards departed; and levying an Armie, recovered the Kingdome of his Grandfather in Thessalie.

Ion being General for the Athenians when Enmolpus the Thracian invaded Attica, did obtain a great victorie, and thereby such love and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. Hee divided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing every one to some occupation, or good course of life. When the people multiplied, he planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Aegialos or Aegialia: In 40 which Countrie Solinus then reigning, thought it safer to give his Daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heir, than to contend with him. So Ion married Helice, and built a Town called by his Wives name in Aegialia, where he and his posteritie reigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gave to that Land denomination. But in after-times the Dores assisting the Nephewes of Hercules, invaded Peloponnesus, and overcoming the Achæans, possessed Laconia, and all those parts which the Achæi had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achæi driven to seek a new seat, came unto the Ionians, desiring to inhabit Aegialia with them, and alleged in vain, that Ion and Achæus had been brethren. When this request could not be obtained, they fought by force to expell the Ionians, which they performed; but they lost their King Tismenes, the son of Orestes, in that War.

50 Thus were the Ionians driven out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remove into Attica, from whence after a while they sailed into Asia, and peopled the Western coast thereof; on which they built twelve Cities, inhabited by them, even to this day, at the least without any universall or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the Ionians into Asia hath been mentioned of all which have written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. years after the warre of Troy, and 60. years after the descent of the Heracleidae into Peloponnesus. These Heracleidae were they of whom the Kings of Sparta issued; which race held that Kingdome about 700. years. Of their Father

Hercules many strange things are delivered unto us by the Poets, of which some are like to have been true, others perhaps must be allegorically understood. But the most approved Writers think that there were many called Hercules, all whose exploits were by the Greeks ascribed to the son of Alcmena, who is said to have performed these 12. great labours.

First, he slew the Nemean Lyon: secondly, he flew the serpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: the third was the overtaking a very swift Hart: the fourth was the taking of a wild Bore alive, which haunted mount Erymanthus in Arcadia: the fifth was the cleansing of Augias his Oxen-stall in one day, which he performed by turning the River Alpheus into it: the sixth was the chasing away of the Birds from the Lake Stymphalis: the seventh was the fetching a Bull from Crete: the eighth was the taking of the Mares which Diomedes King of Thrace fed with humane flesh: the ninth was to fetch a Girdle of the Queen of the Amazons: the three last were, to fetch Geryon Beeves from Gades: the golden Apples of the Hesperides; and Cerberus from Hell. The Mythological interpretation of these I purposely omit, as both over-long to be here set down, and no less perplexed than the labours themselves. For some by Hercules understand Fortitude, Prudence, and Constancy, interpreting the Monsters, Vices. Others make Hercules the Sun, and his travells to be the twelve signes of the Zodiac. There are others who apply his works historically to their own conceits; as well assured, that the exposition cannot have more unlikelihood, than the fables. That he took Elis, Pylus, Oechalia, and other towns, being assisted by such as either admired his virtues, or were beholding unto him; Also that he slew many Theeves and Tyrants, I take to be truly written, without addition of Poetical vanitie. His travells through most part of the world, are, or may seem, borrowed from Hercules Libycus. But sure it is that many Cities of Greece were greatly bound to him: for that hee (bending all his indeavours to the common good) delivered the Land from much oppression. But after his death, no City of Greece (Athens excepted) required the virtue and deserts of Hercules, with constant protection of his Children, persecuted by the King Eurytheus. This Eurytheus was Sonne of Stenobolus, and grand-child of Perseus; he reigned in Mycene, the mightiest City then in Greece. So it was that imposed those hard tasks upon Hercules, who was bound to obey him (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murder, which in his madnesse he had committed upon his own children; but as others say, because he was his Subject and Servant: wherefore there are who commend Eurytheus for employing the strength of Hercules to so good a purpose. But it is so generally agreed by the best Writers, that Hercules was also of the stock of Perseus, and holden in great jealousy by Eurytheus because of his virtue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous services, wherein hee was employed, so that he grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many Wives and Concubines above three score Children. These Children Eurytheus would faine have got into his power, when Hercules was dead: but they fled unto Cepex King of Thracina, and from him for he durst not withstand Eurytheus to Athens. The Athenians not onely gave them entertainment, but lent them aid, wherewith they encountered Eurytheus, Iolaus the brothers son of Hercules, who had assisted him in many of his travells, was captain of the Heraclidae. It is said of him, that being dead he obtained leave of Pluto to live again till he might revenge the injuries done by Eurytheus: whom when he had slain in battell, hee died again. It seems to me, that whereas hee had led Colonies into Sicily, and abode there a long time forgotten: he came again into Greece to assist his cousins, and afterwards returned back. When the Peloponnesians understood that Eurytheus was slain, they took Atrius the Sonne of Pelops to their King: for hee was rich, mighty, and favoured of the People. Against him the Heraclidae marched under Hyllus, the sonne of Hercules. But to avoid effusion of blood, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echeneus King of the Tegeata, a people of Arcadia, who assisted Atrius, with condition, that if Hyllus were victor, he should peaceably enjoy what he challenged as his right: otherwise the Heraclidae should not enter Peloponnesus in an hundred years. In that combat Hyllus was slain, and the Heraclidae compelled to forbeare their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned under Aristodemus (as the best authority doth shew, though some have said, that they came under the conduct of his children) and brought with them the Dorcs, whom whom they planted in that Country, as is before shewed, having expelled the Achai, over whom the issue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Eurytheus four generations.

§. VII.

of Homer and Hesiod, and many changes in the world, that happened about this age.

- About this time that excellent learned Poet Homer lived, as many of the best Chronologers affirm. He was by race of the Maones, descended (as Functius imagineth) of Berofus his Anamaon, who gave name to that people. But this Functius imagineth Homer the Poet to have been long after these times, rashly framing his Era according to Archilochus in the tract, or rather fragment de temporibus, and makes seven more of this name to have flourished in divers Cities in Greece. Whence, perhaps, spring the diversitie of opinions, both of the time, and of the native Citie of Homer. According to this Archilochus, Functius finds Homer about the time of Manasse King of Juda, and Numa of Rome. He was called Melisseus from the place of his birth, and at length Homer, because blind men follow a guide, which signification among others, is in the verbe homer: for this Homer in his later time was blind. * Clemens Alexandrinus recites many different opinions touching the question of the time when Homer lived. So also Aulus Gellius and Tatianus Affyrinus in his Oration ad gentes. Paterculus reckons that Homer flourished 950. years before the Consulship of Marcus Vinutius: which Mercator casteth up in the worlds year 3046. and after Troy taken, about 260. years: and about 250. years before the building of Rome; making him to have flourished about the time of Jehoshaphat King of Juda. But Clemens Alexandrinus and Tatianus above named, mention Authors that make him much antienter. The difference of which authors in this point is not unworthy the Readers consideration, that by this one instance hee may ghesse of the difficultie, and so pardon the errors in the computations of antient time: seeing in such diversitie of opinions a man may hardly find out what to follow.
- Grates* the Grammarians (as Clemens Alexandrinus reports) gave being to Homer about 80. years after Troy taken, near the time that the Heraclidae returned into Peloponnesus: and Erastophanes after Troy 100. years. Theopompus 500. years after the armie of Greece sailed into Phrygia for the waite of Troy. Euphorion makes him contemporarie with Gyges, who began to reign in the 18. Olympiad (which was 45. years after Rome was built) and Sofibus saith, that he was 90. years before the first Olympiad: which hee seeks to prove by the times of harillus and his sonne Nicander. Philechorus placeth him 180. after Troy: Aristarchus 140. in the time of the seating of the Colonies in Ionis. Apollodorus affirms that he lived while Agesilans governed Lacedemon; and that Lycourus in his young years about 100. years after the Ionian plantations, came to visit him, near 240. years after Troy taken. Herodotus finds Homer flourishing 622. years before Xerxes enterprise against the Grecians: which Beroaldus accounteth at 168. years after the Trojan war. Eusebius seems to make him to have been about the time of Josias King of Juda, 124. years before Rome built: though elsewhere in his Chronologie hee notes that some place him in the time of Samuel, and others in the end of David, and others in other ages. In his Evangelicall Preparation, where out of Tatianus Affyrinus he citheth sundry opinions touching the time when Homer lived, he reckoneth many other Greek writers more antient than Homer; as Linus, Philammon, Epimenides, Phemius, Aristaus, Orpheus, Musaeus, Thamyras, Amphion, and others.
- Now whether Homer or Hesiodus were the elder, it is also much disputed. Aulus Gellius reports that Philechorus and Xenophanes affirm, that Homer preceded Hesiod: and the contrary, that Luc. Accius the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian, make Hesiod of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaves it uncertain which of these learned fablers was first born: but hee finds that they lived together some certain years, where he confirms himself by an Epigram, written upon a Trevis, and left by Hesiod in Helicon.

Cornelius Nepos reports that they both lived 160. years before Rome built: while the Silvius reigned in Alba, about 140. years after the fall of Troy. Euthymenes finds them both 200. years after Troy taken, in the time of Acastus the son of Pelias, King of of Thesaly. For my selfe, I am not much troubled when this Poet lived; neither would I offend the Reader with these opinions, but only to shew the uncertainty, and disagreement of Historians, as well in this particular, as in all other questions and dispute of time. For, the curiositie of this mans age is no lesse ridiculous, than the inquisition why he began his Iliads with the word Menin, as perhaps containing some great myserie. In derision whereof Lucian feigning himself to have been in Hell, and to have spoken with Homer, there asked him the cause why he began his book with that word: who answered, That he began in that sort, because it came in his head so to doe.

It seemeth that Senyes, or, after Macrobius, Senemires ruled Egypt at this time: for Tanpherisobris was his successeur, who preceded Naphres, father in law to Solomon.

About the end of Sauls government, or in the beginning of Dauids time, according to Cassiodorus, the Amazones with the Cymmerians invaded Asia, Latinus Sylvius then ruling in Italy. And besides the overthrow of that famous state of Troy (which fell 103 years before Dauids time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the world, not onely by reason of those Northern Nations: but there sprung up somewhat neerly together, six Kingdomes into greatnesse, not before erected. In Italy that of the Latines: in the South part of Greece, those of Lacedaemon, Corinth, and the Achai. In Arabia, Syria, Soba, and Damascus, the Adads made themselves Princes, of which there were ten Kings, which began and ended with the Kings of Israel in effect: and somewhat before these, the State of the Israelites having now altered the forme of government, began to flourish under Kings, of which David, in a few years, became master of all those neighbouring Nations, who by enterchange of times had subjected the Judeans, corrupted their religion, and held them under in a most abject and and grievous slavery; to wit, the Edumians, Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Iturians, and the rest of the Arabians, with the Philistims, Jebsites, Geshurites, Machathites; all which acknowledged David for their Sovereigne Lord, and paid him tribute.

CHAP. XVII. OF DAVID.

of Dauids estate in the time of Saul.

He hazards which David ran into while he was yet onely designed King, and lived as a private man, expecting the Empire, were very many. The first personall act of fame, was his killing of Goliath in the view of both armies, whereby he became known to Saul, and so highly affected of Jonathan the sonne of Saul, that he loved him as his own soul: Inasmuch as when Saul sought to persuade his sonne that David would assuredly be the ruine of his house, and estate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cause; Jonathan could never be persuaded, never forc'd, nor ever wearied from the care of Dauids life, and well doing. It was not long after this signall act of David, but that Saul became exceeding jealous of him, though he were become as his household servant, and his Esquire, or Armor-bearer. Saul being vexed with an evill spirit, was adviced to procure some cunning Musician to play before him upon the Harp, whereby it was thought that he might find ease; which came to passe accordingly. He entertained David for this purpose, and began to favour him, giving him a place of Command among the men of warre. But the jealous Tyrant soon waxed wearie of his good affection, and sought to kill David, being thereunto moved onely through envie of his vertue. This passion first brake forth in the midst of his raving fit, at which time he threw a spear at David that was then playing on his Harp to do him ease.

Enrich. & Coll.
in Chap.

Consortinus remembreth one Asclepius a Physician, who practised the curing of the Frenzie, by the like Musick: and tempered thereby those diseases which grew from passion. That Pythagoras did also the like by such a kind of harmony, Seneca in his third book of Anger witnesseth. But the madnesse of Saul came from the cause of causes: and and was thereby incurable, howsoever it sometimes left him, and yeelded unto that Musick, which God had ordained to be a mean of more good to the Musician than to the King.

Saul having failed in such open attempts, gave unto David the command over 1000 souldiers to confront the Philistims withall. For he durst not trust him as before, about his person, fearing his revenge. Now the better to cover his hatred towards him, hee promised him his daughter Merab to wife: but having married her to Adriel, him, hee promised him his younger daughter Michol, but with a condition, to present him with an hundred foreskins of the Philistims: hoping rather (in respect of the valour of that Nation) that the Philistims would take Dauids head, than hee their foreskins. This hope failing, when as now Dauids victories begat new fears and jealousies in Saul, hee practised with Jonathan, and afterwards with his own hands attempted his life, but his purposes were still frustrated. After all this he sought to murder him in his own house, but Michol his wife delivered him. So David sought Samuel at Ramah, and being pursued by Saul, fled thence unto Nob in Benjamin, to Abimelech, then to Achis the Philistim, Prince of Geth: where to obscure himselfe, he was forc'd to counterfeite both similitude and distraction. But being ill assured among the Philistims, he covered himselfe in the Cave of Adullam: and after conveying such of his kinsfolks as were not fit to follow him, into Maab, he hid himself in the deserts of Ziph, Maab, and the hills of Engad: where he cut off the lap of Sauls garment, and spared his life: as he did a second time to Achis of Geth the second time, and was kindly entertained, in regard of the hatred with which his master Saul was known to persecute him.

Of Achis David obtained * Siglag in Simcon, pretending to invade Judea: but he bent his forces another way, and strook the Amalekites, with other enemies of Israel, letting them live to complain upon him. Achis supposing that David had drawn bloud of his own Nation, thought himself assured of him: and therefore preparing to invade Israel, summoneth David to assist him, who dissembling his intent, seemeth very willing thereto. But the rest of the Philistim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his disposition, liked not his company, and therefore he withdrew himself to Siglag. At his return he found the town burnt, his two wives, with the wives and children of his people, taken by the Amalekites: Hereupon his followers mutined, but God gave him comfort, and assurance to recover all again: which he did.

This armie of the Philistims commanded by Achis, encountered Saul at Gilboa, in which he and his three sons were slain. The newes, with Sauls Crown and bracelets, were brought to David at Siglag, in his return from being victorious over Amaleck, by a man of the same Nation, who avowed (though falsely; that himself at Sauls request had slain him. David, because he had accused himself, made no scruple to cause him to be slain at the instant: and the sooner, because the probabilities gave strong evidence withall. Otherwise it followeth not that every man ought to be believed of himself to his own prejudice. For it is held in the law; Confessione eorum non habenda est pro explorato crimine, nisi approbatio alia instruit religionem cognoscens. The prisoners confession must not be taken for an evidence of the crime, unlesse some other proof inform the conscience of the Judge. For a man may confesse those things of himself, that the Judge by examination may know to be impossible. But because it is otherwise determined in the title de custodia eorum l. si confessus, & in cap. de penis l. qui sententiam, therefore doth the Glossie reconcile these two places in this sort: Si quis in iudicio sponte de seipso confiteatur, & postea maneat in confessione, id est satis. If any man in judgement do confesse of himself, of his own accord, and after doth persevere in his confession, it is enough. That David greatly bewailed Saul, it is not improbable; for death cutteth asunder all competition: and the lamentable end that befell him being a King, with whom in effect the strength of Israel also fell, could not but stirre up sorrow, and move compassion in the heart of David.

The victorie which the Philistims had gotten, was so great, that some Towns of the Israelites, even beyond the river of Jordan, were abandoned by the Inhabitants, and left unto the enemy, who took possession of them without any resistance made. Wherefore it may seem strange that a nation so warlike and ambitious as were the Philistims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and seek to make the Conquest entire.

Most

Most like it seems, that the civil war immediately breaking out between David and the House of Saul, wherein Judah was divided from the rest of Israel; gave them hope of an easie victory over both; and thereby caused them to attempt nothing at the present, lest by so doing they should enforce their disagreeing enemies to a necessary reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part should continue the other; by which means both the victors, and the vanquished, would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were united.

Of the beginning of Davids reign, and the war made by Abner for Ishboeth.

After the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the warre, sought to advance Ishboeth (or Ishboeth, according to Josephus) though he had no right to the Kingdom of Israel; for Ishboeth the first son of Jonathan lived. Against this Abner and Ishboeth, David made a defensive war; till Abner part from him, and entered the border of Judah; at which time he sent Joab with such forces as he had, to resist Abner. Ishboeth remaining in Gilead, and David in Hebron. The armies encountered each other near Gibeon, where it seemeth that Abner made the offer to trie the quarrell on the hands of a few; like to that combat between the Lacedemonians and the Argives, remembered by Herodorus, 300. being chosen of each Nation, of which number three persons were only left unslain. The like tryall by a farre lesse number was performed by the Horatii and Curiatii, for the Romans and Latines. The same challenge Goliath the Philistin made, whom David slew: a custome very antient. Edward the third offered the like tryall in his own person to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelve chosen of each part, in this war of David with the house of Saul, to wit, so many of Benjamin, and as many of Judah: whose force and valour was so equal, as there survived not any one to challenge the victory. But the quarrell staid not here; for the Army of Judah prest Abner in gresse, and brake him. Three hundred and sixty men of Abners companions were slain, and but twenty of Judah, whereof Ishboeth the brother of Joab was one: who when he would needs pursue Abner, and by Abners perswasions could not be moved to quit him, he was forced to turn upon him, wounded him to death with the stroke of his spear. For though Ishboeth was an excellent foot-man, and, as it is written in the Text, as light as a wild Roe, and, as Josephus reporteth, contended not onely with men, but with horses; and hoped to have gotten great fame if he could have mastered Abner: (who, as Ishboeth perswaded himself, had by being overthrown, and flying away, lost his courage) yet here it fell out true, That the race is not to the swift.

That this civil warre lasted two years, we find it written in the second of Samuel, the second Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is again made probable, that this contention lasted longer; and therefore the matter resteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbines conceive that Ishboeth had then reigned two years, when this was written, the Warre as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the party of Ishboeth after this, and till such time as there grew jealousy between him and Ishboeth for Saus Concubine: neither did the death of Ishboeth instantly follow; but how long after the murder of Abner it happened, the same doth not certainly appear.

§. III.

Of the death of Abner slain by Joab, and of Ishboeth by Rechab and Baanah.

Abner, reconciled to David, was anon by Joab murdered; for Joab could not endure a companion in Davids Favour, and in the commandment of his forces; by which he was grown so powerful, as David forbore to call him to account: for thus much he confesseth of himself; I am this day weak, and these men, the sons of Zerviah, be too hard for me. In this sort David complained after Abners death, and to make it clear that he hated this fact of Joab, he followed him with this publique imprecation; Let the blood fall on the head of Joab, and on all his fathers house: and let them be subject to ulcers, to the leprosy, to lameness, to the sword, and to poverty, &c. For could any thing have withstood the ordinance of God, this murder committed by Joab might greatly have endangered Davids estate, Abner being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This mischance therefore David openly bewailed, so that all Israel perceived him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held, being generall of the men of warre, was of such importance, that the Kings themselves were faine to give them great respect, as hath been already shewed more at large. This office Joab held in the army of Judah, and thought himself worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtain the whole Kingdom. For he was near to David in kindred, and had been partaker of all his adversitie; wherefore hee did not think it meet, that an old enemy should in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indeed he was by nature so jealous of his dignitie and place, that he afterward slew Amasa his own kinsman, and the Kings, upon the same quarrell, taking it in high disdain to see him joyned with himself as captain of the hoste of Judah; much lesse could hee brooke a superiour; and such a one as had slain his brother, and been beaten himself in battell. But howsoever Joab did hate or despise Abner, David esteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great man in Israel, excusing the oversight by which he might seem to have perished, by affirming that he died not like a fool, nor a man vanquished, But as a man falleth before wicked men, so (saith he) diddest thou fall. And certainly it is no error of wit, nor want of valour & vertue in him, whom a stronger hand destroyeth unawares, or whom subtilty in free trust bringeth to confusion. For all under the sun are subject to worldly miseries and misadventures. Howsoever Ishboeth meant to have dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, he depaired greatly of his estate, and with him all Israel were posselt with great fear: in so much as two of Ishboeths own Captains, Rechab and Baanah, murdered Ishboeth, and presenting his head to David, received the same reward that the Amalekite lately did, for pretending to have slain Saul. Ishboeth being dead, all the Elders of Israel repaired to David at Hebron, where he was the third and last time annointed by generall consent.

§. IV.

Of the flourishing time of Davids Kingdom, the taking of Jerusalem, with two overthrowes given to the Philistines, and the conduction of the Ark to the City of David.

When David was now established in the Kingdom, his first enterprize was upon the Jebusites, who in derision of his force, and confident in the strength of the place (as is thought) manned their walls with the blind and lame of their Citie; which David soon after entered, all their other forces notwithstanding. For having mastered the fort of Zion (which was afterward the Citie of David) he became Lord of Jerusalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Jebusites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moses and Joshua, and after them almost 400 years. There are who expound this place otherwise: Except thou take away the blind and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some think that it was meant by the Idols of the Jebusites: others, that it had reference to the Covenant made long before with Isaac, and Jacob: the one blind by nature and age, the other made lame by wrestling with the Angel, and that therefore till those (that is, till that Covenant) be broken, David ought not to molest them. But for my self, I take it with Josephus, that they armed their walls with certain impotent people at first, in scorn of Davids attempt. For they that had held their Citie about 400. years against all the children of Israel, Joshua, the Judges, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it also against David.

When he had now posselt himself of the very heart and Center of the Kingdom, and received congratulatory Embassadours and presents from Hiram King of Tyre: he entertained divers other concubines, and married more wives, by whom he had ten sons in Jerusalem, and by his former wives, he had six in Hebron where he reigned 7 years.

The Philistines hearing that David was now annointed King, as wel of Judah as of Israel, they thought to try him in the beginning, before he was fully warm in his seat. And being encountered by David at two severall times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giants; as they were at both times overthrown. After which he called the place Baalperazin.

Then David assembled 30000. choice Israelites to conduct the Ark of God from the house of Abinadab in Gibeon to the Citie of David; which businesse was interrupted by the death of Hazzab the son of Abinadab, whom the Lord slew for presuming to touch the Ark, though it were with intent to stay it from taking harm, when it was shaken. But after three years it was with great solemnity brought into the Citie with sacrifices, musick, dances, and all signs of joyfulness, in which David himself gladly bare a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the Ark, and afterward told him in scorn, That he was uncovered as a fool in the eyes of the maidens his servants; namely, that he forgot his regall dignity both in apparell and behaviour; and mixed himself among the base multitude, dancing as fools doe in the wayes and streets: not that she disliked David's behaviour (as I take it) though she made it the colour of her derision; but rather the abundant griefe, which this spectacle stirred up, beholding the glory of her husband to whom she was delivered lastly by force, and remembering the miserable end of her father and brethren, out of whose ruines she conceived that the son of Isbhai had built this his greatnesse: together with the many new wives and concubines embraced since his possession of Jerusalem, made her break out in those despitefull teares, for which she remained barren to her death.

1 Chro. c.3. This done, David consulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the Temple or house of God: but was forbidden it, because he was a man of warre, and had shed blood. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest homicide; having threatned, not in vain, that he would require the blood of a man, at the hand of man and beast. The wars which David had made were just, and the blood therein shed was of the enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Hereby it appears how greatly those Princes deceive themselves, who think by blood-shed and terrour of their wars, to make themselves in greatnesse like to the Almighty, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercy and goodnesse, or seek the blessednesse promised by our Saviour unto the peace-makers.

Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of David's founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon he received both a confirmation of the Kingdom to him and his heirs, and that happy promise of the everlasting Throne, that should be established in his seed.

S. V.

The overthrow of the Philistims and Moabites.

2 Sam. 8. v. 1. Soon after this David overthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerlesse, and unable to make any invasion upon Israel in haste. For it is written, Acceptit animum Amgaris à manu Philistheorum; which place our English Geneva converts in these words, And David took the bridle of bondage out of the hand of the Philistims. The Latin of Junius giveth another and a better sense; for by that bridle of Amgar was meant the strong City of Gath, or Geth, and so the Geneva hath it in the marginall note. This Citie of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Cesarea, set on the frontier of Palestina, at the entrance into Judaea and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thereinto their retreat in all their invasions; which being taken by David and demolished, there was left no such frontier town of equall strength to the Philistims on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath stood, the Hebrews call Amme, whereof and of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Pliny in his first book, and chap. 13. This exposition is made plain, and confirmed in the first of Chro. the 18.

Junius in c. 8. of the 2. of Sam.

1 Sam. 13.

There was no nation bordering the Jewes that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistims did, who before the time of Saul, (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leave one Smith in all their Cities and Villages of that kind, but inforced them to come down into their territorie, for all yron work whatsoever they needed; so as the Israelites till this time of David, were seldom free from paying tribute to the Philistims.

After this he gave them four other overthrows: but the war of the Moabites and Arabians came between. In the first of which he was indangered by Isbhai-benob, the head of whose spear weighed 300. shekles of brasse, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Abishai succoured David, and slew the Philistim, whereupon the the Countsellours and Captains of David (left the light of Israel might by his losse be quenched) vowed that he should not thenceforth hazard himself in any battell. The 2 Sam. 21. v. 17. second and third encounter and overthrow of the Philistims was at Gob, a place neerer Gesar, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, he invaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his adversity hee sought succour, and left his parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no, it is not known.

The Rabbines feign that Moab slew those kinsfolkes of David, which lived under his protection in Saul's time; but questionlesse David well knew how that Nation had been 10 always enemies to Israel, and took all the occasions to vex them that were offered. And he also remembered that in the 23. of Deut. God commanded Israel not to seek the peace or prosperity of the Moabites; which David well observed, for he destroyed two parts of the people, leaving a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, he led his army by the border of Ammon toward Syria Zobah, the region of Adadazer the son of Rehob King thereof. The place is set down in the description of the holy Land: to which I referre the Reader.

S. VI.

The warre which David made upon the Syrians.

10 It is written in the Text: David smote also Hadadazer, &c. as hee went to recover his border at the river Euphrates. Now whether the words (as hee went to recover his border) bee referred to David or Hadadazer, it is not agreed upon. Junius thinks that the article (hee) hath relation to David, who finding Tobu oppress by Hadadazer, overthrew the one, and succoured the other. But the ancient and most received opinion, that this recovery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if David had intended any such enterprize towards Euphrates, hee was in farre 30 better case to have proceeded after his victory than before: seeing that (Adadazer being taken) hee had now left no enemy on his back, either to pursue him, to take victuals and supplies from him, or to stop the passages of the mountains upon him at his return.

Again, seeing David was either to passe through a part of Arabia the desert, or by the plains of Palmyrena, his army consisting of footmen, for the most, if not all: Hee had now both horse and chariots good store to carry his provisions through those unculivated places, by which hee was to have marched before hee could have reached Euphrates, or any part thereof. But we find that David returned to Jerusalem, after hee had twice overthrown the Syrian army, not bending his course towards the river 40 Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Whereby it may appear, that it was the Syrian, and not king David, that was going to enlarge his border, as afore is said.

The King of Syria, Damascena, and of Damascus, whereof that region is so called, hearing that Adadazer was overthrown by the Israelites, fearing his own estate, and the loss of his own country which adjoined to Syria Zoba of Hadadazer, sent for an Army of Aramites or Syrians to his succour: but these, as it appeareth, came too late for Adadazer, and too soon for themselves: for there perished of those supplies 22000. This King of Damascus, Josephus, (out of Nicholans an ancient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name and family as also those other Adads were: which now began to grow up in greatnesse, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the 50 Syrians, as is shewed heretofore. David having now reduced Damascus under his obedience, left a garrison therein, as he did in Edom: having also sackt the adjoining Cities of Beth & Berathi, belonging to Adadazer, of which Cities Ptolomie calleth Beth, Taub: and Berathi he nameth Barathena, Tobu or Thoi, whose country of Hamath joyned to Adadazer (as in the description of the holy Land the Reader may perceive) sent his son Fo- 2 Sam. 8. ram to congratulate this successe of David: partly because he had war with Adadazer, & partly because he feared David now victorious. He also presented David with vessels of gold, silver, and brasse, all which, together with the golden shields of the Aramites, and the the best of all the spoiles of other Nations, David dedicated unto God at his return. Funius translated the words (Clypeos aureos) by umbones, as if all the parts of the targets were not of gold, but the bosses only. The Septuagint call them bracelets: Aquila, golden chains. But because Roboam made shields of brass in place of these of Adadazer, at such time as Shicab the Egyptian sack'd the Temple of Jerusalem, it may be gathered thereby that those of Adadazer were golden shields.

1 Sam. 1.

Maachab the North part of Tracemius remembered in Deut. 3. 14. Ishob or Thob a country near Gad under the rocks of Armon. 2 Sam. 10.

This done, David sent Embassadors unto Hanum King of the Ammonites, to congratulate his establishment in his fathers Kingdom: for David, in the time of his affliction under Saul, had been relieved by Nahash, the father of Hanum. But this Ammonite being ill advised, and over-jealous of his estate, used David's messengers so barbarously, and contemptuously (by curtailing their beards, and their garments) as hee thereby drew a warre upon himself, which neither his own strength, nor all the aydes purchased, could put off or sustain. For notwithstanding that hee had waged three and thirtie thousand Souldiers of the Amalekites, and their confederates; to wit, of the vassalls of Adadazer twenty thousand, and of Maachab and Ishob thirteen thousand (for which hee disbursed a thousand talents of silver) yet all these great Armies, together with the strength of the Ammonites, were by Joab and his brother Abishai easily broken and put to ruine: and that without any great losse or slaughter at that time. And it is written, that when the Aramites fled, the Ammonites also retreated into their Cities, the one holding themselves within the walls, the other in their desarts adjoining, till Joab was returned to Jerusalem.

Helam or Chelem which Ptolemy calleth Alamatha near the founts of Euphrates. 2 Sam. 10.

* See 2. 18. 5.

Hadadazer hearing that Joab had dismissed his Armie, assembled his forces again, and sent all the Companies that hee could levie out of Mesopotamia; who under the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam, on the South side thereof. David hearing of this new preparation, assembled all the ablest men of Israel, and marched toward the Syrian Armie in Palmyrena, not yet entered into Arach, and to wit, at Helam, a place no lesse distant from Damascus, towards the North-east, than Jerusalem was towards the Southwest. Now David (speaking humanely) might with the more confidence goe on towards Euphrates (which was the far-30 thest-off journey that ever he had) because hee was now Lord of Damascus, which lay in the midway. Hee also posselt himself of * Thadmor or Palmyrena, which Salomon afterward strongly fortified; and this Citie was but one dayes journey from Helam, and the river Euphrates. So had hee two safe retreats, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this encounter between David and the Syrians, they lost 40000. horsemen, and 700. chariots, together with Shobach Generall of their Armie. The Chronicles call these 40000. Souldiers, footmen, and so Funius converts it, and so is it very probable. For the Armie of Israel consisting of footmen, could hardly have slaughtered 40000. horsemen, except they quitted their horse and fought on foot. So are the chariots taken in this battell, numbered 40 at 7000. in the first of Chronicles the ninth; in which number, as I conceive, all the Souldiers that served in them, with the conductors, are included: so are these dyed of the Syrians in this warre against David, before hee forc'd them to tribute, 100000. footmen, besides all their horsemen and waggoners, and besides all those that Joab slew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites, before Rabbah. Notwithstanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered strength again, and afflicted the Kings of Juda often: but the Kings of Israel they impoverished even to the last end of that State.

David having now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians, from the partie and confederacy of Ammon: He sent out Joab the Lieutenant of his Armies to forrage and destroy their territorie, and to besiege Rabbah, afterward Philadelphia, which after a while the Israelites mastered and posselt. The Kings Crown which weighed a talent of gold, garnished with precious stones, David set on his own head, and carried away with him the rest of the riches and spoile of the Citie. And though David stayed at Jerusalem, following the war of Uriah his wife, till such time as the Citie was brought to extremity, and ready to be entered: yet Joab in honour of David forbore the last assault, & entrance thereof, till his masters arrivall. To the people he used extreme rigour (if wee may so call it being exercised against heathen Idolaters,) for some of them hee tare with har-rowes, some hee sawed asunder, others hee cast into burning kills, in which hee baked tyle and brick.

Of David's troubles in his reign, and of his forces.

10 BUt as victory begetteth securitie, and our present worldly felicity a forgetfulness of our former miseries, and many times of God himself the giver of all goodnesse; so did these changes, in the fortune and state of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly hee had to please God in the precise observation of his Lawes and Commandements: For having now no dangerous apparent enemy (against whom hee was wont to ask counsell from the Lord) hee began to be advised by his own humane affections and vain desires: For hee was not only satisfied to take Uriah's wife from him, and to use her by stealth; but hee imbrodered his adultery with Uriah's slaughter, giving order to his trustie servant Joab to 2 Sam. 2. 15. marshall him in the front or point of those Israelites, which gave an assault upon the suburbs of Rabbah, when there was not as yet any possibilitie of prevailing. And that 10 which could no lesse displease God than the rest, hee was content that many others of his best servants and souldiers should perish together with Uriah, hoping thereby to cover his particular ill intent against him. After which hee began by degrees to fall from the highest of happinesse, and his dayes then to come were filled with joyes and woes interchangeable, his troden-down sorrows began again to spring, and those perils which he had pulled up by the roots (as hee hoped) gave him an after-harvest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased GOD to take the witness of David's own mouth against him, as David himself did against the Amalekite, which pretended to have slain Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death hee suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded unto him his 30 own error in the person of another, to wit, of him that took the poor mans sheep that had none else, the bereaver being Lord of many, Hee then vowed it to the living Lord, that such a one should die the death. And hereof, although it pleased God to pardon David for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced; yet hee delivered him Gods justice together with his mercy in the tenour following; Now therefore the sword shall never depart from thy house, &c. because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, & hast slain Uriah with the sword of the children of Ammon. Soon after this, David lost the child of adulterie which he begot on Bersheba. Secondly, his own son Amnon, being in love with his half sister Thamar, by the advice of his cousin-german the sonne of Shimeah David's brother, posselt her by force: which when hee had performed, 40 he thrust her from him in a careless and despitfull manner. Two years after which foul and incestuous act, Abalom caused him to be murdered, at the feast of his sheeplearing: not perchance in revenge of Thamars ravishment alone; but having it in his heart to usurp the Kingdom, in which, because he could not in any sort be assured of Ammon, he thought his affairs greatly advanced by his destruction. So the one brother having ravished his own sister, and then despitd her; the other after a long dissembled malice first made his own brother drunken, and then slaughtered him, which done, he fled away, and lived under the safeguard of Talmai King of Gessur, near Damascus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen King. Thirdly, when Abalom by the invention of Joab (but chiefly because of the great affection of David towards his sonne) was brought again, first to the Kings favour, and then to his presence; he began instantly to practise against David his father, seeking by the pretence of common justice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his fathers equite, to win unto himself a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction, threatened by the Lord as a punishment of David's sinne.

The company which Abalom gathered at the first were but 200. men: which he carried with him from Jerusalem to Hebron, pretending, though impiously, the performance of a vow to God. There when Achiotophel repaired unto him, and many troops of people people from all places, he proclaimed himself King, & was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawfull Prince) accepted to readily, that David doubting to be set upon on the sudden, durst not trust himself in his own Citie of Jerusalem, nor in any other walled town for fear of surprize: but incamped in the fields and deserts with some 600. of his guard, and few else. The Priests hee left in Jerusalem with the Ark of God, from whom he desired to be advertised of those things that chanced; to whom he directed Hushai his trustie friend, and servant, praying him to make himself in all his outward actions and counsells of Abisalom's party and confederacy, thereby the better to discover unto him the purposes of Achitophel, a revolting Counsellour, whose practices be greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Mephiboseth the son of Jonathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred David's prosperity had smothered, but his adversity illightned) holding himself upon the advantage of a mountain side, cast stones at David, and most despightfully cursed him to his face: but David attending no private revenges, forbade Abishai to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the roll of his revenge, to his sonne Salomon. Abisalom being now possessor of Jerusalem, was advised by Achitophel to use his fathers concubines in some such publique place, as all Israel might assure themselves, that he was irreconcilable to his father: whereof being perswaded, they would then resolutely adhere to Abisalom and his cause, without fear of being given up upon a reconciliation between them. This salvage and impious (though crafty counsell) Achitophel indeed urged for his own respect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction; who most of all other inflamed Abisalom against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold David: I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house, and will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour, and he shall lye with thy wives in the sight of the Sunne: for thou diddest it secretly, but I will doe this thing before all Israel, and before the Sunne. He also gave advice to Abisalom, that himself with an armie of 12000. men might be employed at the instant for the surprizing of David, which had willingly been embraced by Abisalom, had not Hushai David's faithfull servant given counter-advice, and swayed by perswading Abisalom that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel to pursue his father, than by such a troop, which David's valour and those of his attendants might either indanger or resist. This delay in Abisalom, and advantage of time gained by David, was indeed, after God, the losse of the one, and delivery of the other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shewed) the success which followed, disposed of his own estate, and then forsook both the party and the care of Abisalom, and of his own life.

David being advertised of this enterprize against him, marched away all night, and past Jordan, possessing himself of Mahanaim in the Tribe of Gad: the same wherein Isoboth himself in the war against David after Saul's death seated himself. To which place there repaired unto him Shobi the son of Nahash the Ammonite, whom David loved, the same which Iosephus calleth Shiphar. And though it be greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most generall and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hannum, whom David for his fathers sake established in the Kingdome, after Hannums overthrow: in thankfulness whereof hee relieved David in this his extremity. There came also to David's assistance Machir of Lodabar, Guardian in former times to Mephiboseth, and among others Barzillai the Gileadite, who willingly fed David and all his company.

In the mean time both the King and Abisalom prepared to fight; Abisalom made Amasa Commander of the armie of Israel, the same place which Joab held with David, an office next the King himself, like unto that of the Maiors of the Palace anciently in France. David, perswaded by his company, stayed in Mahanaim, & disposed the forces he had to Joab, Abishai, and Ittai, giving them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Abisalom. But Joab, besides that he was very cruell by nature, remembered that Abisalom had lately disposed of his government to Amasa, and therefore the victory being obtained, and news brought him that Abisalom hung by the hair of his head on a tree, when he could not perswade the messenger to return and kill him, hee himself with his own servants dispatcht him.

It

It appeared also by the sequell that Joab affected Adonijah whom he afterward acknowledged, David yet living; and fearing the disposition of Abisalom, he embraced the present advantage offered.

Hereof, together with news of the victorie, when knowledge was brought to David, hee mourned and sorrowed, not only as a man that had lost a sonne, but as one that had out-lived all his worldly joyes, and seen every delight of life interred. For hee so hid himself from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward after so great a victorie, covered themselves also in the citie, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather deserved death than recompence. Whereupon Joab presenting himself before David, perswaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present, and to shew himself to the armie. For first, he told him that he had discountenanced his faithfull servants, who had that day preserved his life; inferring that nothing could be more dangerous to a King, than not onely not to acknowledge so great a love and constancie in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resolutely expose themselves to great perils for his sake: but on the contrary, grieve and lament at their good success. For, no doubt, they might all have bought their peace of Abisalom at an easie rate. Secondly, he urged that it was generally believed, that he loved his enemies, and hated his friends; and that hee witnessed by this his mourning, that he had not any respect of his Princes, and others his faithfull servants, but would more have joyed if they had all perished, and Abisalom lived, than in the victory by their faithfulness and approved valour gotten.

Lastly, he used this prevalent argument, That if the King came not out and shewed himselfe publickly to his men of warre, that they would all that very night abandon him, and return: concluding with this fearful threatening, And that will be worse unto thee than all the evil that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By these overbold and arrogant speeches (though perchance uttered with a good intent) Joab raised David from his bed of sorrow, and brought him to the gates of the Citie among the people, whom he assured of his love and affection, especially Amasa, who commanded the armie of Abisalom, to whom he promised the office of Lieutenantship, the same which Abisalom had given him, and which Joab now enjoyed. For David doubted, that if Amasa were not satisfied, he might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now under his commandement.

This done, the King marched towards Jordan homeward, where in his passage hee pardoned Shimei, who had lately reviled him to his face: but this remission was but externall, as appeared afterward. Hee also accepted of Mephiboseth his excuse, whom Ziba had falsely accused and betrayed.

Hee also intreated Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberall host, to follow him to Jerusalem, that hee might reward his service done him; who excusing himself by his age, appointed his sonne Chimham to attend the King.

At Gizal on this side Jordan, all the Tribes assembled, and after some contention which of them ought to have most interest in David, the Armie brake, and David returned to Jerusalem. But Sheba the son of Bichri, a Benjamite, of the faction of the house of Saul, finding some discontent among the Israelites, withdrew them from David, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest, and it seemeth that many of the people of the out Tribes, and in effect of all but Juda, bare still a good affection to the issues of their first King. David employed his reconciled Captain Amasa, to give him contentment, and to witness his trust, as also because hee conceived that Amasa had interest in those revolts of Israel more than Joab had. He received commandement from David to assemble the Armie within three dayes, which hee forefollowed: but being on ward on his way, Abishai, Joab's brother, was sent after him, with David's guard and best Souldiers, whom also Joab accompanied: and overtaking Amasa neer Gibeon, pretending to embrace him, gave him a wound, whereof hee fell dead, being no lesse jealous of Amasa than he was of Abner, whom he murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done, hee pursued Sheba, and finding him inclosed in Abel, assaulted the Citie with that fury, that the citizens by the perswasions of a wife woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba his head, and stung it to Joab over the walls: which done, hee retraited his Armie to Jerusalem, and commanded, as before, all the Host of Israel.

The next act of David, was the delivery of Sauls sons or kinsmen to the Gibeonites, whom those citizens hung up in revenge of their fathers cruelty. David had knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three years, came by reason of Saul and his house, to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore he willingly yielded to give them this satisfaction, both because he had warrant from God himself, as also, if we may judge humanely, to rid himself of Sauls line, by whom he and his might, as well in the present as in the future, be greatly molested and endangered; only he spared Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan, both for the love he bare to his father, and for his oath and vow to God.

2 Sam. 21.

Now whereas it is written in the Text, The King took the two sons of Rizpah, whom she bore unto Saul, and the five sons of Michol the daughter of Saul, whom she bare to Adriel, and delivered them to the Gibeonites: Junius calls this Michol the sister of her that was David's wife, the whom Saul married to Phaltiel: but Michol here named, had Adriel to her husband; the same which is named Merab in the first of Sammel the eighteenth, who was first promised to David when hee slew Goliath in the valley Raphaim: and because it is written that Michol loved David, which perchance Merab did not, whether David had any humane respect in the delivery of her children, it is onely known to God.

Now where the Geneva nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here used, having an eclipsis or defect, and signifieth, as I am informed, one of the same kindred, as in the 19. verse of the same one and twentieth chapter it is said of Goliath, whose spear was weighthe as a Weavers beam, when as by the same eclipsis it must be understood by the brother of Goliath; Goliath himself being formerly slain.

As by the death of Sauls children God secured the house of David, leaving no head unto rebellion: so did he strengthen both the King and Nation against foreign enemies by the valour of many brave Commanders, the like of whom, for number and quality, that people of Israel is not known to have had at any time before or after: Thirty Captains of thousands there were, all men of mark, and great reputation in warre. Over these were six Collonels, whose valour was so extraordinary, that it might be well held as miraculous. These Collonels had some difference of place and honour, which seemeth to have been given upon meer consideration of their vertue. For Abishai the brother of Joab, who in the war against the Ammonites and Aramites was Lieutenant, and commanded halfe the armie, could not attain to the honour of the first rank, but was faine to rest contented with being principall of the three Collonels of the second order, notwithstanding his nearness of blood unto the King, the flourishing estate of his own house, and his well approved services. All these Collonels and Captains, with the Companies belonging to them, may seem to have been such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readines for any occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawn out, if need required, into the field, very farre exceeded thirtie thousand, yea, or thirty times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Sauls time, and been hardened with his adversities. Others there were very many, and principall men in their severall Tribes, that repaired unto him after the death of Saul, but these Captains and Collonels, (who with Joab, that was Generall of all the Kings forces, make up the number of 37.) were the speciall men of warre, and reckoned as David's Worthies. The long reign of David, as it is known to have consumed many of these excellent men of warre, so may it probably be guessed to have wasted the most of those whose deaths we find no where mentioned. For the sons of Zeruya, who had been too hard for David, were worn away, and only Joab left in the beginning of Salomon, who wanted his brother Abishai to stand by his side in his last extremity.

2 Sam. 23. 39.

By the actions forepassed in the time of David, it is gathered, that he had reigned now 33. years or thereabouts, when the posterity of Saul was rooted out, so that he enjoyed about seven years of entire quiet and securitie, wherein it pleased God to remove all impediments that might have troubled the succession of Salomon in his fathers throne. In this time also David having established all things in Juda and Israel, and the borders thereof, he again displeased God by numbring the people, as in ostentation of his power: in which hee employed Joab, with other Captains of his Armie, who after nine

nine moneths and twenty dayes travell, returned with the account and register of all the people, able and fit to bear Arms, and they amounted to the number of thirtie hundred thousand, besides Levi and Benjamin, whereof in Juda, and the cities thereof, five hundred thousand, and in Israel eight hundred thousand. 2 Sam. 24. 1 Chr. 21.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himself to which he pleased; to wit, seven years famine; three moneths warre, wherein he should be unprosperous in all attempts, and be chased by his enemies; or a generall pestilence to last three dayes: David made choice to bow himself under the hand of God only, and left himself subject to that cruell disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished 70. thousand. And hereby hee hath taught all that live, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof he giveth this divine reason, For his mercies are great. 2 Sam. 24.

Of the last acts of David; Adonijahs faction; the revenge upon Joab and Shimei.

Lastly, when he grew weak and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of women, hee was yet advised to lie in the arms of a young and well-complexioned maiden, to keep him warm. In this his weak estate of body, when hee was in a manner bed-ridden, Adonijah his eldest son (Amnon and Absalom being now dead) having drawn unto his partie that invincible, renowned and feared Joab, with Abiathar the Priest, began manifestly to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdome after his father. For being the eldest now living of David's sonnes, and a man of goodly personage, Salomon yet young, and born of a mother formerly attained with adulterie, for which her name was omitted by S. Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others suppose) hee presumed to carry the matter without resistance. Hereof when David had knowledge by Bersabe the mother of Salomon, who did put him in mind of his faithfull promise, that Salomon her son should reigne after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the same thing unto the King, and seconding her report of Adonijah his presumption) the King calling unto him Zadok the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, and Benajah the Captain of his guard, gave charge and commission to anoint Salomon, and to set him on the Mule whereon himself used to ride in his greatest state: which done, Salomon attended, and strongly guarded by the ordinary and choice men of warre, the Cherethites, and Pelethites, shewed himself to the people. These tidings being reported to Adonijah, he presently abandoned his assistants, and for the safety of his life, he held by the horns of the Altar, whom for the pretent Salomon pardoned. After this, David had remaining two especial cares, whereof he was desirous to discharge his thoughts; the one concerning the peace of the land, which might be disturbed by some rebellion against Salomon; the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he fought by all means to advance, and make the business publick. To bring these intentions to good effect, he summoned a Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Israel, the Princes of the severall Tribes, all the Captains and Officers, with all the mighty, and men of power; who did repair unto Jerusalem. 2 Reg. 1. 1 Chr. 28. 1.

In this assembly the King stood up, and signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approved the motion. Herein he took occasion to lay open his own title to the Crown, shewing that the Kingdome was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Juda (as Jacob in his blessing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himself was pleased to make choise of him among all his fathers sonnes. In like manner he said that God himself had appointed Salomon by name to bee his successor; whereupon he earnestly charged both the people and his sonne to conforme themselves unto all that God had commanded, and particularly to goe forward in this work of the Lords house, which Salomon was chosen to build. Then produced hee the pattern of the work, according to the forme which God himself had appointed; and so laying open his own preparations, hee exhorted all others to a voluntarie contribution. 1 Chr. 29. 9.

The Kings proposition was so well approved by the Princes and people, that where-as he himself had given three thousand talents of gold, and seven thousand of silver, they added unto it seven thousand of gold, & ten thousand of silver, besides brasse, iron, and and Jewels, heartily rejoycing in the advancement of so religious a work. This business being so well dispatched, a solemn feast with great sacrifice was made, at which time Salomon was again anointed King, and received fealty of all the Princes and people of the Land, and of all the Princes his brethren, the sons of King David. Salomon being thus established King, his Father David finding himself even in the hands of death, first exhorted his son to exercise the same courage and strength of mind, which himself had done in all his attempts: and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning of all his enterprizes, he uttered these mighty words, Take heed to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walk in his wayes, and keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgements, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moses, &c. to the performance of which, God fastened the succession, and prosperity of his issues. For this done (saith God himself) Thou shalt not want one of thy posterity to sit upon the Throne of Israel.

Secondly, he advised him concerning Joab, who out of doubt had served David from the first assault of Jerusalem to the last of his wars, with incomparable valour and fidelity, saving that he fastened himself to Adonijah (his master yet living) and thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath never left cruelty unrevengeed, so was it his will that Joab should drink of the same cup, whereof he hath enforced other men to taste, & suffer the same violence which himself had unjustly strooken others withall, Qui gladio percussit, gladio peribit: for he had bereaved Abner & Amasa of their lives, having against the one the pretence onely of his brothers slaughter, whom Abner had slain in the time of war, and could not avoid him: against the other but a meere jealousy of his growing great in the favour of David. And though Joab assured himself that Abner and Amasa being dead, there was none left either to equal him, or supplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked men) raised up Benajah the son of Jehojadah, to pull him from the Sanctuary, and to cut him in peeces. For David giveth this cause to Salomon against Joab, that he slew the Captains of the Host of Israel, and shed blood of battell in peace; and to this apparent and just cause, it is not improbable but that David remembered the ill affection of Joab towards Salomon, which Joab made manifest by the untimely setting up of Adonijah, David yet living. Some other offence Joab had committed against David, of which in these words he put his son Salomon in mind; Thou knowest also what Joab the son of Seruiab did to me, &c. Now whether this were meant by the killing of Abshalom, contrary to the Kings desire, or by the proud words used to him when he mourned in Mahanaim for Abshalom; or whether it were the publishing of David's letter unto him for the killing of Uriah, thereby to disgrace Salomon as descended of such a mother, the Scriptures are silent. True it is, that those great men of warre doe oftentimes behave themselves exceeding insolently towards their Princes, both in respect of their service done, as also because they flatter themselves with an opinion, that either their masters cannot misse them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kind of pride hath overthrown many a worthy man otherwise deserving great honour and respect.

He also gave order to Salomon to rid himself of Shimei, who not long before had cast stones at David, and cursed him to his face. And albeit by reason of his oath and promise David spared Shimei all the time himself lived, yet being dust and in the grave, he slew him by the hand of Salomon his sonne. Hence it seemeth that King Henry the seventh of England had his pattern, when he gave order to Henry the Eighth to execute Pool as soon as himself was buried, having made promise to the King of Spain, when he delivered Pool unto him, that while he lived hee would never put him to death, nor suffer violent hands to be laid upon him.

And yet did not the execution of Joab yeeld unto Salomon any such great profit or assurance as he hoped for. For he found a young Adad of Idumea, and Resin of Damascus to vex him: who, as the Scriptures witness, were emboldened to enterprize upon Salomon, hearing that David slept with his fathers, and that Joab the Captain of the Host was dead. Now when David had reigned in all fortie years, to wit, in Hebron 7. years, and in Jerusalem three and thirty, he died.

For his person, he was of small stature, but exceeding strong. For his internall gifts and graces, hee so farre exceeded all other men, as putting his humane frailtie apart, hee was said by God himself to be a man according to his own heart. The Psalmes which hee wrote, witness his pietie, and his excellent learning: of whom Hierome to

Paulinus:

Paulinus: David Simonides noster, Pindarus, & Alcæus, Flaccus, quoque Catullus, & Serenus, Christum lyra personat, & in dechachordo Psalterio ab infirius suscitatur resurgens: David (saith he) our Simonides, Pindarus, Alcæus, Horace, Catullus and Serenus, hee playeth Christ on his Harp, and on a ten-stringed Psalter hee raiseth him up rising from the dead. And being both a King and a Prophet, he foretelleth Christ more lightly and lively than all the rest.

The book of the Psalmes, saith Glycas, was divided, ordered and distinguished by Ezekias: but whether all the Psalmes were written by David, it is diversly disputed. For Athanasius, Cyprian, Lyranus, and others conceive divers Authors answering the titles of the severall Psalmes, as Moses, Salomon, and the rest hereafter named; and that only 73. Psalmes were composed by David himself, namely, those which are intitled ipsius David. For the 50. and the 72. with the ten that follow, are bestowed on Asaph the son of Barasiah, eleven other on the sons of Korath; and eleven are ascribed to Moses, to wit, the 89. and the ten following, and so they are intitled in the old Hebrew Copies, though the vulgar and Septuagint (three excepted) stile them otherwise. The supposed nine Authors of these Psalmes which David wrote not, Sixt. Senensis nameth as followeth: Salomon, Moses, (whom Aben Ezra, contrary to Hierome, maketh one of David's fingers) Asaph, Ethan, Ezra, Eman, Ezaiara, Idithum, and the three sons of Chore. But S. Chrysostome makes David the sole Author of all the Psalmes, and so doth S. Augustine onely to David, which are over-written ipsius David, and the rest intitled ipsi David, to others, this opinion (saith he) Voce Evangelica Salvatoris ipsius refutatur, ubi ait quod ipse David in spiritu Christum dixerit esse suum Dominum, quoniam Psalmus 109. sic incipit, Dixit Dominus Domino meo, Sede a dextris meis, &c. The voyce of the Gospell refutes this opinion, where it saith, that David himself in the spirit called Christ his Lord; because the 109. Psalm begins thus: The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, &c. Lastly, his testimonies are used both by Christ and the Apostles, and hee was as a pattern to all the Kings and Princes that succeeded him.

His Story, and all his particular actions, were written by the Prophets, Samuel, Nathan, and Gad, as it is in the first of Chron. 29. vers. 19. For the severall parts of the books of Samuel which intreat chiefly of David, were, as it seems, written by these three holy men.

Constantine Matassess hath an opinion, that the Trojans during the time of the siege fought for succour from David, and that he stayed neuter in that warre. But it seemeth that Matassess did miscast the time 'twixt David and the Trojan warre. For it is generally received that Troy fell between the times of Abdon and Sampson Judges of Israel, about the worlds year 2848. and David died in the year 2991.

S. IX.

Of the treasures of David and Salomon.

Is treasures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22. of the first of Chronicles, that he left Salomon for the building of the Temple a hundred thousand talents of gold, and a thousand thousand talents of silver, and of brasse and yron passing all weight, which is more than any King in the world possesse besides himselfe, and his sonne, to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirty & three cartload, and a third of a cartload of silver, allowing two thousand weight of silver or six thousand pound sterling to every cartload, besides three score and seventeen millions of French Crowns, or of our money twenty three millions and a thousand pound: a matter, but for the testimony of the Scriptures, exceeding all belief. For that any riches were left him, it doth not appear, seeing that the Judges had not any treasure, nor any sovereign power to make levies: but when they went to the wars they were followed by such voluntaries as the severall tribes by turns gave them: seeing also that Saul who was of a mean parentage, and perpetually vexed and invaded by the Philistines, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his Territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part possesse by his enemies.

Therefore it were not amisse to consider how David within the space of not very many years, might amasse up such mighty treasures. For though parsimony be it selfe a great great revenue, yet needs there must have been some other great means. It seems that he made the uttermost profit of all that he had, that was profitable. Eusebius in his 9. book and last chapter de Preparatione Evangelica, citeth the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that David, among other preparations for the Temple, built a Navie in Melania (or, as Vallalpandus corrects it, Achana) a city of Arabia, and from thence sent men to digge for gold in the Iland Urpe, which Ortelius thinks was Ophir, though Eupolemus is in this place of Eusebius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this Iland is in the red Sea: from whence, saith this Eupolemus, they brought gold into Jury, Pineda l. 4. de Rebus Salomonis, c. 1. thinks that David did this way also enrich himself, and citeth this testimonie of Eupolemus: and yet certainly David had many other wayes to gather riches. Much land doubtlesse he gained by conquest from the Canaanites and Philistines, besides those fruitfull vallies neer Jordan in Trachonitis and Basan, and the best of Syria, and other countries bordering the Israelites. These demaines belike he kept in his own hands, and with his infinite number of captives, which he took in his warres, which were not able to redeem themselves, husbanded those grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written, 1 Chro. 17. that Sehuanathan was over his treasures in the field, in the villages, in the cities, in the towns; that Ezer was over the labourers that tilled his ground; Simei over the vineyards, and Sabdi over the store of the wine; Baal Hanan over the olive trees, and Joash over the store of the oyle: also that he had herd-men that had charge over his cattell, both in the high lands and in the plains, over his Sheep, 20 Camels and Asses. And this custome of enriching themselves by husbandrie and cattell, the ancient Kings every where held, both before and after David's time. For we read of Pharaoh, that hee spake to Joseph to appoint some of his brethren, or of their servants, to be rulers over his cattell. Wee read of Uzias, that he loved husbandrie, had much cattell, and plough-men, and dressers of Vines: likewise wee read it in all Greek Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did specially consist in their Herds and Flocks; whereof it were needlesse to cite Augas and Admetus, or any other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning David it is not unlikely, but that those captives which were not employed in husbandrie, were many of them used by him in all sorts of gainfull professions, as the ancient Romans in like manner used their slaves.

To these profits (besides the tributes and impositions, which doubtlesse were great, and besides the innumerable presents which yearly were brought him, or extraordinarily sent him, by Tobu and others) wee may adde the great spoiles which hee found in the Cities and Countries which hee conquered: also the head money which was gathered per legem capitacionis, By the law of capitation, or head money, every man rich or poor paying half a sicle of the Sanctuary, which is about as much as fourteen pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous summe in that Kingdome: wherein one thousand thousand five hundred and sevenie thousand fighting men were numbered by Joab. Now although this law of capitation bee thought by some very learned, not to 40 have been perpetuall (which opinion of theirs nevertheless they confesse is against the Hebrew expositions) yet David upon this occasion is not unlikely to have put it in practise. And by these means might hee be able to leave those huge treasures to Salomon. Yet it may seem that of this great masse of gold and silver left by David, the least part was his own in private; and so will it appear the lesse wonderfull that hee left so much. Of his own liberallitie wee find, that hee gave to the building of the Temple three thousand talents of gold, and seven thousand talents of silver: a great summe, but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to consider, that the treasures of the Sanctuary it self were exceeding great, as needs they must have been, having received continuall encrease, without any losse or diminution ever since the time 50 of Moses and Joshuah. The revenues of the Sanctuary (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defrayed the daily expences, and maintained the Priests and Levites) were partly raised out of the head money before mentioned; partly out of the spoiles gotten in warre. For all the bootie was divided into two parts, whereof the Souldiers had one, and the people which remained at home, had the other half; whereby all the country received benefit of the victory, yet so, that the Souldiers had a farre greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiving more for every single share,

Qu

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fiftie, of that which the people received, and one in five hundred, of that which was given to the Souldiers; namely, one hundred and one thousand part of the whole bootie. So in the spoil of Midian, thirty two thousand women being taken, the Armie had sixteen thousand of them for slaves, and the Congregation had other sixteen thousand; but out of the sixteen thousand given to the Armie, were exempted two and thirty for the Lords tribute; Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twenty. By this means, the lesse that the Armie was which had exposed it self to danger, the greater profit had every Souldier; but when it consisted of many hands, they who remaining at home were faine to undergoe more than ordinary travell in domestick affaires, did receive by so much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was alwayes certain, yea many times it was increased, either by some speciall commandement, as when all the gold, and silver, and other metalls found in Ferico, were consecrated unto God; or by the thankfulness of the Rulers and People, as when after the victorie obtained against the Midianites without the losse of one man, all Jewells, Bracelets, Earrings, and the like, 10 were offered up, as voluntarie presents. Num. 31. 56.

Now howsoever the Israelites were many times oppressed, and troden down by other Nations, yet were not these treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies never got possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that the wealth of the Sanctuary must have been exceeding great; as containing above one hundredth part of all the money and other goods found by the Israelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many victories, as they obtained against the bordering Nations. For that this treasure was not defrauded of the due portion, it is evident; seeing that before the time of David and his Lieutenant Joab, it is recorded that Saul and Abner, and before them Samuel, had used to dedicate of the spoiles obtained in war, to maintain the house of the Lord: the like whereof may be well presumed of the former Judges and Captains of other Ages. Certain it is, that the Conquest of David brought into the Land far greater abundance of riches, than any former victories had purchased, those of Joshua perhaps excepted: but these vast summes of an hundred thousand Talents of silver, may seem rather to have been made up, by the addition of his winnings and liberallitie, to the treasures laid up in many former Ages, than to have been the meer fruits of his own industrie.

Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them; for he received yearly revenues with his tributes 666. Talents of gold, besides the Customs of Spices. He had also six rich Returns from the East India, which greatly increased his store. For his ships performed that voyage every three years, and he began that trade in the two and twentieth year of his reign, and ruled fortie years. Besides this, all Judea and Israel were now mastered to his hands; all the Arabians his borderers, the Syrians of Zobah, of Damascena, of Palmyrena, of Ituraa; all of Idumea, Mo- 40 ab, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Hittites, who with the Perizzites, Hivites, Sebulites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet extinguished, though subjected.
